twenty years these youths will be mature in judgment and will be the means of bringing about the regeneration of their country. One generation will have to undergo all sorts of risks and the next generation will enjoy the pleasure of swaraj . . . . The ancestors of our present rulers, risking their lives for once, made conquests and left them to be enjoyed by their descendants . . . . We do not wish to suffer in the least for the sake of any of our brethren: it is then but an idle dream to think that we should risk our lives. If our present awakening continues and if we are not maimed, it is possible that within a few years, nationalism, the precursor of swaraj, may come into existence. The rise of nationalism is the first step towards swaraj. The time for gradually going up the ladder is now approaching, when what is to be done should be executed forthwith."

HINDI PRADIP, March 1908.

Mistakes of the Government.

27. "There is no doubt," says the Hindi Pradip (Allahabad), for March (received on the 23rd May), "that Government acquired India by a very clever policy, but it has been committing mistakes from the very beginning. These mistakes were not accidental slips but part and parcel of the same policy, as the saying goes, 'man proposes God disposes.' If they happened to commit a mistake, it was solely from the point of view of their own advantage. For example, the Educational department was established in order to provide capable clerks on small salaries. But the seed of education so sown, grew and developed to such an extent that Indians distinguished themselves in every branch of learning.

Now attempts are being made in all directions to restrict education in India and the internal idea seems to be to drag back Indians to the state of ignorance in which they (the English) found them in the beginning, but that is an impossibility. Measures are being taken in every part of the country to found National schools and colleges, and the time is near when people, after receiving education on national lines, will raise their motherland in the scale of progress.

Railways were run from one end of the country to the other so as to afford facilities to Ralli Brothers to export as much corn to bilayet (England) as they could, and with the object of taking away a portion of the country's wealth in the form of railway fares and for strategic purposes. Such were the objects kept in view in introducing railways into this country. But who imagined that the introduction of railways would bring about union and harmony between the inhabitants of the different parts of India?

At the outset, they (the English) raised an army of Indians and with their help conquered India, but later on they became anxious lest awakening should also affect the sepoys and they should come to realize their rights and privileges, as this would be detrimental to their (the English) own position.

Recently Lord Curzon added fuel to the fire by partitioning Bengal. He did not anticipate the evil consequences of his crooked policy. It would have been better if, having regard to popular feelings on the subject, the partition had been set aside as a mistake, but that was not to be, inasmuch as they (the English) never admit their mistakes. They lost a magnificent country like America, but adhered to their obstinacy. They do not think it a wise, but rather a foolish policy to ensure possession of half of a thing by yielding the other half to their adversaries. They have set their heart on this country of gold. They seem to think that they should go on milching this cow as much as they can, depriving its calves of its milk. In accordance with this line of policy, they kept Indians on false hopes and assurances for years. Now they (the English) want to gain their ends by threats and by a show of force, but they would never admit that they repeatedly committed and are still committing mistakes."

HINDI PRADIP, March 1908.

The growth of the movement.

28. "The movement," says the Hindi Pradip (Allahabad), for March (received on the 23rd May), "has been going on (with all its accompaniments)—swadeshi, boycott, swaraj, and National education. For some considerable time, however, there was a lull in this movement. But as Providence would have it, Lord Curzon thought of partitioning Bengal. As soon as the partition of Bengal was accomplished, the solid foundations of this movement were laid. Lala Lajpat Rai and Ajit Singh were arrested and deported to Mandalay with this very object that the movement might be stopped. But why was it to stop? The Risley circular was issued and the Act prohibiting meetings of twenty persons was enacted. But all this had no effect on the movement. It has been going on all the same. Bepin Chandra Pal was sent to jail for six months. The editors of the Sandhya and Yugantar got into trouble. A riot took place at Tuticorin and a punitive police force was quartered there. Detectives are to be found on every inch of ground. No sooner does an occurrence take place than wicked detectives poison the ears of the authorities with their tales. All this was done in the hope that the movement might be stopped, but it was of no avail and the movement went on as usual. Arabinda has been arrested on a charge of being an accomplice of the bomb-throwers, but what signifies one Arabinda? Even if a hundred Arabindas are arrested and sent to jail, the advance of the movement is in no way retarded. In the beginning, the Bengalis helped in establishing the sway of Government in this country, they are now engaged in subverting it—the movement is going on."

ABHYUDAYA, 29th May 1908.

Repressive measures.

29. Criticising an article in the Pioneer in which it urges the necessity of the "real moderates" supporting Government in adopting repressive measures to suppress the anarchist movement, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 29th May, remarks that those who advocate the adoption of repressive measures are not only injuring the cause of the country but also that of the Government, inasmuch as their advice will betray it and place it in a more difficult situation. The editor urges that repressive measures cannot restore real peace and order in a discontended country as is evident by the course of events in Russia; and that repression is not only futile but harmful withal, for it provokes mutual reprisals and places both Government and the people in an unnatural position, destructive of all ordered progress and civilization. He suggests that Government should deal severely with those concerned in the anarchist movement, but should at the same time take measures to eradicate that discontent among the people that led these desperadoes to perpetrate such a horrid crime.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 31st May 1908.

The test of severity.

30. Referring to the clamour for repression and drastric measures, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 31st May, says that the test of severity of any measure is to be judged by the feeling of those who are affected by it. Preventive and punitive measures have been resorted to freely whenever necessary in India, and there can be no more damaging condemnation of any enlightened Government than that it employs Russian methods. Such a condemnation is now general in the case of the Government of India. He then refers to the measures taken last year in Bengal and in the Panjab and remarks that instead of restoring order and respect for the law, these repressive measures have led to the appearance of a form of crime which it was hoped would always remain unknown in India. The offenders have no personal motive, they do not expect any personal advantage and yet they risk their lives in a cause that appears to them sacred and demands every sacrifice. He concludes by saying that the repressive measures that have been taken so far are not wanting in severity and severer measures may be now introduced, but they will not have the effect of suppressing the revolutionary movement.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 31st May 1908.

The new spirit.

31. Referring to the warning given by the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta to the accused in the Yugantar case while passing sentence, the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 31st May, remarks that this warning was unnecessary, for men who dare and die cannot be moved from their purpose. Sedition is preached even in Russia. The number of those who will dare and die is not yet large, but the number of those who admire them without imperilling their own lives is growing. The spirit of defiance is certainly growing with alarming rapidity.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 31st May 1908.

"The Domination of Race."

32. Under the heading "The Domination of Race", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 31st May, refers to the panic that has been created by the unexpected appearance of anarchism in India and to the prevalent feeling that strong measures must be taken at once to suppress this new evil. He says that the talk of an Explosives Act and of a new Press Act, that the concomitants of the present situation gave rise to by violent writings and speeches, is quite natural. He compares the subject race to a child, and says that the maxim: "spare the rod and spoil the child" is equally applicable in the present case.

He concludes by saying :—

"To accuse the Government of weakness is to prefer a false charge. But those who twit the Government with weakness are not content with a display of strength. They want the 'tiger' instincts to be awakened. Besides the blow that fells the victim there must be the mauling, growling, roaring, the crunching of bones, the sickening ferocity that fills the onlooker with horror. Is not that what the Anglo-Indian press demands, and is the Government to yield to such a demand ?"

33. One Sital Prasad of Bombay contributes an article entitled "Potency of Thought" to the Jain Gazette (Deoband), of the 1st June, in the course of which he remarks :— JAIN GAZETTE, 1st June 1908.

"Potency of Thought."

"Under the impression that they have no power left in them and that their regeneration is impossible owing to their living in servitude for centuries, Indians are gradually degenerating and the chains of servitude are becoming tighter upon them day by day. If these very Indians were to regard themselves as the descendants of the ancient, adventurous, emperors and were to harbour this firm conviction in their heart that they are all-powerful and that they can break the chains of servitude by promoting education, trade and industry among themselves this thought would strengthen them mentally and physically, would constantly create energy in them and would surely accomplish their cherished hope one day or other."

34. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), in its combined issue of the 25th May and 1st June, while commenting on the references made by Mr. Keir Hardie to the poverty and misgovernment in India, remarks that what he says is true. People are dying of famine and the Government is doing nothing to relieve their misery. The number of the school-going population is very small. The editor thinks that much of the discontent in India is due to the fact that British officials do not remain in touch with "public men" and thus do not become aware of the grievances of the people. He complains that they see only those who call them "huzur". JEDD-O-JEHAD, 25th May and 1st June 1908.

India and Mr. Keir Hardie.

35. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 3rd June, while referring to the sedition prevailing in the country, remarks that it is very strange that anarchism should break out in India, where in the past kings were worshipped as gods, and disobedience of a king was supposed to be little short of godlessness. The editor thinks that sedition has sprung into existence as the people have become exasperated. He ascribes this to the aloofness of the higher officials from the people, and their dependence for information on the subordinates who misuse their authority. He hopes that the higher authorities will take the question in hand, and look into the doings of their subordinates. NASIM-I-AGRA, 3rd June 1908.

Sedition.

36. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 4th June, publishes another instalment of the letter of Mr. Myron H. Phelps (of the New York Bar) on the "Economic Decline of England." The writer says that besides the exhaustion of coal, to which he referred in his last letter, the following are the other causes of the economic decline of England :— CITIZEN, 4th June 1908.

"Economic Decline of England."

(1) The spirit of conservatism which binds the English to antiquated and unprofitable methods, while their competitors, of whom America is the chief, are free from the shackles of tradition and are ready to adopt those methods, which though they may be new, are the most suitable.

(2) An increasing relaxation of attention to work and business and a giving way to self-indulgence and a tendency increasing somewhat rapidly towards a high if not an extravagant standard of living. This lack of frugality leads to deterioration of character, which is a sure sign of decline in the industrial efficiency of the nation.

(3) A gradual decline in agriculture which is not being made up for by in increased productive energy.

(4) Greater time devoted to games and recreation, and the shirking of work on the part of British workmen and tradesmen.

Mr. Phelps promises to continue the subject in his next letter.

ADVOCATE, 4th June 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

37. Referring to the turn that the question of Indians in the Transvaal has again taken, the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 4th June, observes :—

"It is a pity that having spent more than three-fourths of his life in that Colony Mr. Gandhi could not read the Colonists' character well enough, but ran away with the simple nod of reluctant assent to his terms which, it seems now, were not well, not to say fully, discussed between him and the Government at the time the settlement was effected. Thus the few Indians who did not approve of the compromise and went to the length of expressing their views in ways other than by mere words, appear to have been wiser than the whole lot who were satisfied with what may, in the light of the latest events, be characterised as but lip sympathy, better still to say, a promise by word of mouth with no intention of performance at heart. Thus are manufactured by the State mills, Extremists and anarchists. This move on the part of the Colonist will certainly not enhance the prestige of the Empire in the eyes of the Indians. Be on the track of so-called Indian revolutionaries in India, New York and Vancouver and run them to earth when found out and proved guilty. But so long as the official mill grinds in the way it does, it cannot but produce discontented people, some with minds ill-balanced enough to be led astray."

ADVOCATE, 4th June 1908.

The Jamalpur damage case.

38. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 4th June, refers to the proceedings of the Jamalpur damage case, which is being heard by Mr. Justice Fletcher in the Calcutta High Court and remarks "in view of the disclosures made in this case, is it wonderful that the relations between the people and officials in East Bengal have got highly strained and that a trial of strength is going on. These riots and disturbances of the peace have given birth to a desperate class of people who are on a look-out for a chance to sow seeds of hatred and enmity between class and class. The first condition for establishing peace is to make a thorough enquiry into the facts of cases like those that occurred in Jamalpur and to severely punish the officials who have betrayed their trust and instead of keeping their balance of mind and impartially doing justice have taken sides and thereby given unnecessary provocation."

II.—Afghanistan and Trans-Frontier.

AL HADI, 31st May 1908.

The Amir.

39. Al Hadi (Samrauta, Rae Bareli), of the 31st May, referring to the constant vilification of the Amir by the Anglo-Indian press, remarks that the perverse and imprudent policy of these papers has well-nigh exasperated the people of India, and may have the same effect on Afghanistan. The editor is afraid that the Amir may interdict the export of grain from his territories into India, and thus stop a sure means of support for the people in time of famine.

III.—Native States.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 1st June 1908.

Bharatpur State.

40. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 1st June, complains that attempts are being made by the Arya Samajist officials of the Bharatpur State to forcibly convert some three lakhs of Musalman Rájputs living in the state to Hinduism. The compulsion employed by these officials would have led to a serious riot on the part of these Musalmans had not Mr. Blanchette, the Superintendent of Police, appeared on the scene by the orders of the Agent to the Governor General and punished these officials severely.

BHARAT JIWAN, 1st June 1908.

The reinstatement of the Maharaja of Bilaspur.

41. The Bhárat Jiwan (Benares), of the 1st June, applauds the action of the Government in reinstating Maharaja Bijai Chandra of Bilaspur to his State.

IV.—Administration.

(a)—Judicial and Revenue.

SWARAJYA, 30th May 1908.

Europeans and Indians.

42. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 30th May, referring to the acquittal of a European soldier who killed an Indian carriage-driver at Farrukhabad, remarks that notwithstanding this the British Government claims to be just and justice-loving and expects loyalty and fidelity from the people.

43. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 31st May, referring to the case that was tried on Monday and Tuesday last by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Knox in the local High Court, in which a European soldier of Farrukhabad was accused of causing the death of the driver of a hackney carriage, remarks that one black man, more or less, probably does not matter very much, but in view of what the eminent Judges of the local High Court have in the past said about Allahabad juries it is time for the Government to consider whether in future further waste of public time and public money over trials like these should be allowed.

The Allahabad High Court.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 31st May 1908.

44. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 3rd June, says that the laws framed by the Government are generally in the interests of the people, but its officials put their own interpretations on them, by which the beneficent purpose of legislation is very often frustrated. Subordinate officials do not take into consideration the merits of the case, but decide it generally on the facts. Criminal cases generally produce dissatisfaction among the people, as the Judges, who also possess executive powers, are partial to the police and overlook their shortcomings. The press, says the editor, is very useful in bringing gross travesties of justice to the notice of the Government, and if it is gagged, the Government will be deprived of one of its chief sources of information.

Law and Justice.

OUDH AKHBAR, 3rd June 1908.

(b)—Police.

45. A Sub-Inspector of Police writing to the Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 1st June, complains that :—

Police.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 1st June 1908.

(1) Sub-Inspectors are posted at a great distance from their homes, and so they have to incur large expenses when going home on business.

(2) They have been ordered by the Inspector General of Police to wear hand-tied safas instead of made-up turbans (of sola). The safas are very heavy and are unsuitable for persons doing mental work.

(3) They have to stand on duty in thoroughfares in many districts, which is highly derogatory to their dignity and lowers their prestige.

(4) Many police stations have been abolished under the new scheme, and they have to make big rounds every day, which tells upon their health, and is injurious to the interests of the public.

46. The Maha Vidyalaya Samachar (Hardwar), of the 1st June, referring to the appointment of a Secret Police to unearth political conspiracies, remarks that the people have now found out these secret agents and are always on their guard against them. The editor is of opinion that the Government should repose confidence in its subjects and should not exasperate them by searches and secret inquiries. A policy of conciliation, he thinks, will be more useful than one of repression.

Secret Police.

MAHA VIDYALAYA SAMACHAR, 1st June 1908.

(c)—Finance and Taxation.

Nil.

(d)—Municipal and Cantonment Affairs.

47. The Agra Akhbar, of the 28th May, again refers to the insufficient supply of water in Agra. The editor says that the time during which water can be had has been reduced by half and the stand posts have not been doubled, so that those that are feeble find it very difficult to get water. He, moreover, says that it is rumoured that the shortage of water is due to corruption in the municipality. In conclusion, he says, that it is not prudent to entrust the welfare of two and a half lakhs of people to a single man (the Secretary-Engineer ?)

AGRA AKHBAR, 28th May 1908.

48. The Bhárat Jiwan (Benares), of the 1st June, complains that now-a-days people in Benares are supplied with pipe water only for about one hour in the day. The editor expresses a hope that the municipality will take early steps to increase the supply from the water-works.

Water-supply at Benares.

BHARAT JIWAN, 1st June 1908.

HINDUSTANI, 3rd June 1908.

Vaccination.

49. A correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 3rd June, complains that since the Vaccination department has been placed under the District Board, vaccinators are being degraded and transferred to other districts, without being given an opportunity to defend themselves. He requests the Government not to leave them at the mercy of the head clerks (of District Boards ?)

(e)—Education.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 31st May 1908.

The Aligarh College.

50. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 31st May, referring to the address presented to the Viceroy by the Trustees of the Aligarh College on the occasion of His Excellency's recent visit, remarks that it followed the usual lines of such addresses and had all their characteristic faults, self-praise and advertisement, disparagement of others, and "toadyism of the Anglo-Indian official." He accuses the trustees of parading their loyalty and in a way trading upon it, and says that many earnest Musalmans prefer to send their sons to other colleges as they mistrust the religious education given at Aligarh. He condemns the copying of English manners by the Aligarh students and expresses his dissatisfaction with the residential system in vogue in English colleges and at Aligarh. He thinks that students should have nothing to do with politics, and the professors, too, should refrain from taking an active part in them. The college, he says, cannot be raised to the status of a university as long as no attempt is made to engage competent teachers and to have well equipped laboratories.

In conclusion he says :—

"Cease to flatter officials; cease to praise yourselves; cease to disparage others; cease to advertise; attend to your own work and leave politics alone. If you follow these rules of conduct, you may not please the Anglo-Indian officials so much, but you will rise in the estimation of all sensible Muhammadans."

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 1st June 1908.

Education in India.

51. The Sháhna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 1st June, referring to the debate on Education in India in Parliament, remarks :—

"Mr. Laidlaw's proposals were very fair, but he was ridiculed. The Educational department in India is good-for-nothing. Primary education is almost discouraged. Fees are being increased, but the schools remain open for only six months in the year. Educational officials are growing fat on public money and have no sympathy with students. The scheme for making primary education free has been set aside, on the plea of want of money, although the Government finds money for military expeditions."

MASHRIQ, 2nd June 1908.

The Government and the Nadwat-ul-Ulama.

52. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 2nd June, referring to the request made by the Nadwat-ul-Ulama to the Government for the grant of a site for its Arabic College, remarks that as the Government professes to patronise Arabic studies it should accede to the request of this venerable body.

MASHRIQ, 2nd June 1908.

The Muhammadan Educational Conference.

53. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 2nd June, while reviewing the report of the Muhammadan Educational Conference held in December 1907, remarks that it is highly satisfactory that it has entered upon a practical stage, and is doing something instead of passing resolutions. The Conference should not depend entirely upon the Government, but should send a detailed statement supported by facts and figures whenever it wants to bring anything to the notice of the Government, and should not compel the Government to make enquiries. The editor dislikes the idea of asking the Government to give special scholarships to Musalman students.

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 3rd June 1908.

Musalmans in the Educational department.

54. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 3rd June, makes the following suggestions for attracting Musalmans to the Educational department :—

(1) Musalmans should be admitted into the offices of the Director and Inspectors of Schools, and placed for training under European or Eurasian officers, otherwise they will not stick to their posts.

(2) The Muhammadan Educational Conference should keep itself in touch with the Musalmans who are already in the department or who may join it in the future, so that their future prospects may not be marred. It is a well-known fact that many Musalmans in the department have not been promoted to higher posts, although they are diligent and hard-working.

(3) The appointment of another Musalman Inspector and several Assistant Inspectors should be recommended.

(4) According to the new scheme, several posts of head master will be created. Some of these must go to competent Musalman graduates who should be sent to the Training College later on.

(5) The number of Musalman students who join Normal Schools is daily decreasing: the Director should take steps to prevent this.

(6) The Registrars of all public examinations should be either Europeans or Eurasians.

(7) A suitable number of Musalman examiners should be appointed. The number of Musalman members of the Text Book Committee should be increased and the arrangement of Urdu, Persian, and Arabic courses should be entrusted entirely to Musalmans.

(f)—Agriculture and questions affecting the land.

55. The Hindi Pradip (Allahabad), for March (received on the 23rd May), says that in opening famine relief works Government does not seem to be moved by compassion or by a real desire to relieve the distress of the famine-stricken population, but by considerations of self-interest, to wit to save its empire from internal commotion that may have its origin in the all-devouring hunger of the starving millions, if not satisfied even partially. Had Government been actuated by genuine compassion, it would have provided for the maintenance of the people and would not have given them one or one and a half annas a day on which it is impossible to keep body and soul together.

HINDI PRADIP March 1908.

The object of opening famine relief works.

The editor urges that if Government really wants Indians to be saved from falling victims to ever-recurring famines, it should make permanent settlement throughout the country; it should interdict the export of food stuffs from India; it should heartily encourage the swadeshi movement so as to improve the material condition of the country permanently; and lastly, it should impart education to the masses.

(g)—General.

56. In the course of an article on "Noble Parentage" the Hindi Pradip (Allahabad), for March (received on the 23rd May), remarks that the world has as much to gain from a person of noble parentage as it has to lose through one of humble origin. As long as the system of competitive Civil Service examinations did not exist in England, the officials who came to India were of noble families. Since the introduction of this system the kind of officials who come to India is but too obvious. No month passes but the newspapers have to publish the doings of such officials and editors find full scope for the display of their faculties for criticism.

HINDI PRADIP, March 1908.

"Noble Parentage."

57. A correspondent of the Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 28th May, suggests the advisability of making arrangements for post mortem examinations in branch dispensaries, as many corpses are decomposed when they reach the hospitals at the headquarters of districts.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 28th May 1908.

Post mortem* examinations.

58. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 31st May, has the following:—

ADVOCATE, 31st May 1908.

The Medical College.

"The grounds for the building of the Medical College in Lucknow have been levelled and they present a very attractive appearance. Roads are being constructed and arrangements for laying water pipes are being made. But there is little or no activity as to construction of buildings. One does not know why. We understand that this is due to some differences between Captain Cruickshank, the Engineer in charge of the works, and the Chief Engineer. Captain Cruickshank, who worked hard in levelling the grounds, is gone on three months' leave. He may not return to the works. Captain Cruickshank is, it is said, in favour of utilizing the local contractors, and the Chief Engineer is in favour of employing large Calcutta firms, and the name of Martin and Company is freely talked of as being the fortunate recipient of the contract. We do not know how far the rumour about a serious difference of opinion is well founded. But we feel that preference should be given to local contractors. We may not have very large contractors willing and ready to take up the entire contract, but the work can be divided and given to a number of small contractors. These local contractors have a better claim on the patronage of the Local Government than Calcutta contractors, whose only recommendation is their great resourcefulness which surely can be made up by the provincial contractors if they only combine. In the early part of the year, when there was every apprehension of a severe form of famine in Lucknow, when arrangements were about to be made for opening relief works, thousands of men were kept engaged on the grounds by Captain Cruickshank, who managed to save people from having to live on famine relief wages. If Captain Cruickshank is allowed to entertain the services of small contractors they may find work for hundreds of people living in Lucknow and its suburbs. We think it will be advantageous to employ local contractors, and if the wishes of the members of the Medical College Committee were consulted they would surely take the view expressed by us."

Backwardness of the United Provinces.

59. The unfortunate United Provinces, says the Árya Mitra (Agra), of the 1st June, are the most backward of all the provinces of India. At the time when even the women of other provinces are affected by the national awakening, the leaders of these provinces want to live in purdah. What can be the state of the inhabitants of that province, the leaders of which are so weak-minded? The United Provinces afford a living example of that state. They are lagging behind all other provinces in every respect in general and industrial education, in politics and in social and religious life. The cause of this state of affairs can be found only in the weakness of the leaders of these provinces.

MASHRIQ, 2nd June 1908.

The Urdu press.

60. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 2nd June, referring to a statement (?) in the Pioneer that the Government should deprive the Urdu press of its liberty, remarks that papers published in English are the greatest defaulters in this respect and that the Urdu press is on the whole loyal. The editor is, however, disposed to think that the statement is incorrect.

HINDUSTANI, 3rd June 1908.

Kayasthas.

61. A Kayastha writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 3rd June, complains that the Government has very unjustly debarred the Kayasthas from its service, although they have been always loyal to it, and have faithfully served it for a long time. They have been fairly honest, and have kept themselves away from all political agitation.

AL BASHIR, 2nd June 1908.

The Government and the press.

62. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 2nd June, notes with satisfaction the Government's intention to send copies of the reports of all departments to Urdu papers.

V.—Legislation.

JADD-O-JEHAD, 25th May and 1st June 1908.

The threatened press legislation.

63. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), in its combined issue of the 25th May and 1st June, refers to the threatened press legislation, and remarks that it would not be very prudent to crush all newspapers, as this would cause a blank which it would be difficult to fill. He thinks that the punishment of seditious journalists under the existing law is quite sufficient.

OUDH AKHBAR, 2nd June 1908.

The threatened press legislation.

64. The editor of the Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), in the issue of the 2nd June, says that it is very likely that the Government of India is going to make the press laws more stringent with regard to Vernacular papers, as the whole Anglo-Indian press and Anglo-Indians as a body are demanding it loudly. He thinks that if Lord Lytton's Act is revived under a Liberal ministry there is little chance of its being repealed by Conservatives, and he is afraid that the English papers conducted by Indians may be subjected to the same law. In the end he says that if a heavy cash security is demanded, not more than 10 per cent. of the papers will survive.

65. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 3rd June, referring to the threatened press legislation, remarks that the press now occupies the same place in India that it does in Europe, and newspapers which freely criticise the Government and express their views fearlessly on current topics are read with avidity by the people, and it would be very hard on them if they are deprived of an innocent means of enjoyment and self-improvement. It is wrong to think, says the editor, that the discontent in the country is due to the baneful influence of the press.

66. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 3rd June, referring to the various proposals about curtailing the liberty of the press, remarks that of these the confiscation of presses in which seditious newspapers are printed and the taking of sureties from journalists guilty of sedition, would be fatal to the cause of Indian journalism.

68. A correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 3rd June, suggests the advisability of connecting Etawah and Kanauj by railway, as the cotton trade has become very brisk in the district and people in the interior of the district find it very difficult to send their cotton to Etawah. Besides this it would be very convenient to litigants, as the Munsifi of Kanauj has jurisdiction over an area of fifty miles through which the proposed railway line would pass.

71. Now that the Government of India, says a correspondent in the Jain Gazette (Deoband), of the 1st June, have upheld the decision of the Bengal Government to construct bungalows on the Parasnath Hill, Jains should appeal to the King-Emperor in the matter and His Majesty is sure to do them justice and prohibit the construction of bungalows on their sacred hill as wounding their religious susceptibilities.

72. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 2nd June, referring to the earnest efforts that are being made by the Hindus to re-admit Musalman Rájputs into the fold of Hinduism, remarks that the real motive of this is to gather a body of brave men who will be helpful when the Hindus make a bid for swaraj. The Rájputs are the bravest of the Indian races, and if they return to Hinduism, the Hindus think that they will experience very little difficulty in attaining swaraj.

74. A correspondent, while communicating his impressions of the Gurukul at Hardwar to Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 2nd June, remarks that although an attempt was made to instil into the minds of young ascetics all that is purest and best in literature and in religion, yet he found that they were little better than ordinary mortals and were swayed by the same passions and that they were very envious of others and were extremely intolerant.

The Gurukul mela was attended by some fifteen thousand persons, two-thirds of whom were women. Most of them were from the Panjab, with a sprinkling from other provinces. Books were sold in large quantities and they were all of a controversial nature, mostly against Islam. Lectures were delivered in tents, people were exhorted to take up arms and to plant the flag of the Arya Samaj in Europe and in Arabia. Women were advised to rear up their children and make them brave, as the mother of Sivaji did. He concludes by saying that nothing is left undone to create a militant spirit and to deepen the hatred of Islam among the Arya Samajists.

HINDI PRADIP, March 1908.

75. The Hindi Pradip (Allahabad), for March (received on the 23rd May), contains a humorous article entitled "The Malady of too much Wisdom" in which the writer says that there is no one who does not suffer from this malady. Indian youths have this malady in the form of their contempt for persons of the old school, whereas the latter, too, are not without it, inasmuch as they are proof against the spirit of the times. The Government, too, is subject to this malady with the result that the bureaucracy has no sense of justice and generosity and is imbued with racial partiality. Again, the police force is the very personification of this malady which, besides being discreditable to the Government, also leads it to oppress the people. God, too, is affected with the malady of having too much wisdom, for had it not been so, why should there have been floods in Orissa and practically no monsoon in Northern India?

3. The Agra Akhbar, of the 7th June, remarks that "a man named Hoti Lal, by caste Jat, resident of Handawan, police circle Maunt, district Muttra, an ex-student of the Agra College, who had recently returned from his travels in France and other foreign countries, was arrested in connection with the Calcutta conspiracy. It is said that a number of papers were recovered from his possession which showed that he knew the art of bomb-making. The district authorities having suspected a number of persons of giving him assistance, issued search warrants and several houses have already been searched. The houses of a respectable Honorary Magistrate and a well-to-do Banker and Municipal Commissioner were searched, and this has caused panic in the city and different sorts of rumours are afloat. The local police are enquiring into the matter, and the result of their enquiries is anxiously awaited by the public. As the facts connected with the enquiry are kept confidential no opinion can be formed, but the district authorities are requested to remember that the people of Agra, both Hindus and Muhammadans, are loyal and peace-loving, and until something definite is proved by a thorough enquiry, it is not desirable to disgrace them on mere suspicion."

AGRA AKHBAR, 7th June 1908.

House searches in Agra.

4. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 7th June, remarks that "after the arrest of Hoti Lal Varma eight houses, including two belonging to Bengalis, were searched by the police, and it is believed other search warrants have been issued. Nothing whatever of an incriminating character was found. Hoti Lal is an ex-student of the Agra College, but it is well-known that he has only recently returned from Europe, and no one at Agra knows much about him. He has been arrested on suspicion, but, as we have said, he has not been placed before a magistrate formally and charged with any particular offence. Does the fact of his presence at Agra justify the suspicion that some residents of that city are concerned with the terrorist conspiracy? The most unlikely places are being searched for evidence of a conspiracy which most certainly has not affected every part of the country. As regards the manner in which the searches were conducted our information is that where Deputy Magistrates accompanied the police there was no violence or incivility, but where a Police Officer alone headed the search party, there was gross incivility and offensiveness. No bombs or unlicensed arms, and not even a scrap of paper was found anywhere, but a number of peaceful and probably loyal subjects have been subjected to unnecessary humiliation and will swell the ranks of the discontented. When a man finds he is treated as a suspect and disgraced without reason he may fall an easy prey to designing or seditious people."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 7th June 1908.

House searches in Agra.

5. The Árya Mitra (Agra), of the 8th June, reports that a number of house searches were made in Agra on the 1st June which, it is said, was due to suspicion in connection with the bomb conspiracy. Among others the house of Kunwar Kanhai Singh was searched. Considering the position of the Kunwar Sahib and his staunch fidility to Government it is unaccountable why his house should have been searched. It is equally mysterious what need there was to search the house of Seth Jaswant Rai, one of the most loyal subjects of the Government. The house of Ganpat Lal, an ordinaryclerk of the office of the Árya Mitra, was also searched. The editor requests the local authorities to stop all such house searches, for Agra is not the place congenial to the growth of the bomb cult. In conclusion, he remarks that Agra is drifting to the same state as was found in Etawah after the deportation of Lala Lajpat Rai.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 11th June 1908.

House searches in Agra.

6. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 11th June, complains that a panic has been created in Agra by the searches for bombs made in the houses of respectable merchants, raises, and professional men of Agra, and remarks that the District Magistrate, if he had any suspicion, ought to have warned these men instead of openly insulting them.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 11th June 1908.

The evil of house searching.

7. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 11th June, has the following :—

"Even the Bengal Government has realized the danger and unwisdom of promiscuous and indiscriminate house searches. An official letter was written to the Hindu Patriot by the Under-Secretary to the Bengal Government asking for specific instances of house searches without reasonable suspicion, or which were harassing. Eight such instances have been mentioned and are under enquiry. When a large number of houses are searched without any results, when it is known that there is nothing against the owners of the houses, it must be inferred the search business is being overdone. If there is very strong reason for suspicion in Bengal there is none in these provinces, and the searches at Benares and Agra are not only improper but positively dangerous, for they will produce the very thing that is sought to be found out. The zeal of the Criminal Investigation Department has to be restrained, for it is neither discriminating nor very intelligent. To treat the whole country as a land of suspects would be to bring about the identical danger that has to be prevented, for a man who is suspected, and suspected without cause, will not be inclined to be very loyal. If there are suspects everywhere, is the Secret Police free from them, and may it not be a part of the conspiracy to encourage indiscriminate house searches so that indignation and disaffection may increase and the position of Government be weakened? This view may appear exaggerated to-day, but it will come true if the campaign of groundless suspicion is carried on with vigour."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 11th June 1908.

Hoti Lal's case.

8. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 11th June, referring to Hoti Lal Varma's arrest and prosecution, remarks :—

"What was the object of his travels, what profession or trade he has learned, and what may be his antecedents will doubtless be known in good time. In the name of commonsense, however, a protest must be made against the wicked attempt of the Times to make out that all young Indians in foreign countries are revolutionists."

ABHYUDAYA, 29th May and 5th June 1908.

Origin of the bomb.

9. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), contains an article in the issues of the 29th May and 5th June in which the editor attempts to trace the origin of the bomb in India. He says that from the commencement of British rule in India down to the year 1904, no trace of disloyalty could be perceived on the part of Indians towards the Government, and that Indians only wanted to see reforms gradually introduced into the administration of the country, but they never even dreamt of the idea of subverting the Government. In 1887 Bepin Chandra Pal, who is now regarded as the most notorious of the opponents of the Government, expressed his gratitude to it in the strongest terms and his feelings were shared by all his countrymen. But in 1904 Lord Curzon partitioned Bengal in utter disregard of public opinion and thereby caused intense discontent among Indians, especially amongst the Bengalis, so much so that the latter lost all faith in constitutional agitation, became vehement advocates of boycott and adopted extreme views. However, when the Liberals came into power and Lord Morley was appointed Secretary of State for India, the Bengalis relaxed their agitation in the hope that on their representing the state of public opinion to the latter he would undo the partition, but they were cruelly disappointed in their expectations and in despair they again took to the boycotting of foreign goods. If after the partition, Government had followed a conciliatory policy it is probable that much of the opposition and excitement would have subsided, but on the contrary Government adopted a policy of repression and of preference of Muhammadans to Hindus. The Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal, taking advantage of the indulgence and favour shown to them, committed indescribable outrages upon the Hindus. All this produced resentment and estrangement of feelings on the part of Hindus towards the Government. Under the circumstances, it was no wonder that a few misguided Bengali youths, goaded by despair and hatred, took to iniquitous anarchist practices, though that they had reason to do so was deplorable. An impartial judge of the course of administration in Bengal from the partition day to the present time will feel no hesitation in saying that the causes of the origin of the bomb in Bengal are, the partition of that province, the refusal of the Government to set it aside, the favour shown to one community at the expense of another, and undue severity in awarding sentences to editors in sedition cases. The statement of the Pioneer that the Indian Members of the Legislative Council and of the Congress, both Moderates and Extremists, are the cause of the origin of the bomb cult and of anarchism in the country, is utterly false. The bomb outrages which are entirely contrary to the spirit of "our" religion cannot in any way help forward the cause of the country, but on the contrary will retard its progress. "We" wish it from the inmost recess of our heart that this anarchist movement may be uprooted for the reason that it will interfere with our cherished progress and will sacrifice the lives of many an innocent person. But "we" are as helpless in putting it down as in bringing it into existence. Just as it was the result of a Government policy of indifference, so it should receive its death blow from beneficial and conciliatory measures on the part of Government. The first step of that beneficent policy is that Government should guard itself against the advice of such Anglo-Indian papers as the Pioneer and the Englishman, which are the enemies of Indians, and should punish offenders according to their deserts and should adopt such measures as are likely to remove the legitimate grievances of Indians and to foster a feeling of real loyalty in their hearts. This is possible only when the administration of the country is carried on in accordance with the advice of its representatives, and when the British Government, in accordance with the proclamation of the late Queen Victoria, deals with Indians in the same way as with British subjects in England.

"The Bomb and the Bengali."

10. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 6th June, reproduces from the Kesari (Poona), an article headed "The Bomb and the Bengali." SWARAJYA, 6th June 1908.

The bomb outrage.

11. The Árya Mitra (Agra), of the 8th June, condemns the bomb outrage as an iniquitous, diabolical and atrocious act of violence, and says that the Bengalis have committed a most foolish mistake in having recourse to the bomb as a means of bringing about the regeneration of India, inasmuch as far from achieving their desired end, it will retard the natural progress of the country, and will further embitter the relations between the rulers and the ruled, a state of affairs that can never be beneficial to the best interests of the Indian people. ARYA MITRA, 8th June 1908.

Anarchism in Calcutta.

12. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 30th May, referring to the anarchist conspiracy in Calcutta, remarks that it is the result of the repressive policy of the Government and that anarchism cannot be rooted out of the country unless the Government is prepared to adopt a policy of reconciliation. The editor quotes the example of Russia and Italy to show that anarchism becomes more vigorous under persecution. MUSAFIR, 30th May 1908.

The anarchist conspiracy.

13. The Almora Akhbar, of the 31st May, condemning the bomb outrage at Muzaffarpur and the Calcutta conspiracy, remarks that it is more than deplorable that these incidents have cast a slur on the peaceful character of Indian subjects. The authors of this conspiracy have not only played false to the Government but also to Providence who placed the English in charge of this country. Such conspiracies can do no harm to the Government, but on the contrary will damage the cause of Indians and create distrust between the rulers and the ruled. The unrest in Bengal dates back to the partition of Bengal and to the subsequent high-handedness of the authorities in suppressing the swadeshi movement which was adopted by the Bengalis as a protest against that measure. Had Government kept quiet and let the matters drift in their own way, all the excitement of the Bengalis would have ended in smoke in course of time. However, what is fated must happen. ALMORA AKHBAR, 31st May 1908.

The Pioneer, the organ of the officials, attributes the origin of the bomb, among other causes, to violent writings in the Vernacular press. Even if this statement be accepted to be true, this, too, will not be improper to say that the Pioneer also indulges in false inventions calculated to prejudice the authorities against the people. But the truth is that the accusations of the Pioneer are not based on justice but on prejudice, for firstly, the native papers never speak ill of British rule in India or try to subvert it, although they severely criticise the actions of officials who exceed their powers and oppress the people, in order to bring their conduct to the notice of the higher authorities; and in the second place native papers are held in check by law.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 7th June 1908.

The bomb conspiracy.

14. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 7th June, severely condemns the persons responsible for the Muzaffarpur outrage and the bomb conspiracy in Calcutta, and remarks that such actions are unconstitutional and contrary to the will of God, and can never have the support of society. The editor thinks that there was no need for such precipitate and indiscreet action when the Government itself was prepared to introduce reforms.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 5th May 1908.

The political agitation in Bengal.

15. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 5th May, referring to the political agitation in Bengal, remarks that it is all due to the indulgence given to the Bengalis, and to the fact that no restraint was placed upon their actions. The unrest in the Panjab, too, was due to wire-pulling from Bengal. It was a grave mistake to have deported Lajpat Rai and Ajit Singh without any formal trial, and at the same time to have allowed the Bengali malcontents to defend themselves in courts of law. The Government is trying to deal justly with the people, but the Bengalis cannot appreciate such generosity.

In conclusion, the editor says, it would not serve any useful purpose to curtail the liberty of the press, but seditious papers should be seriously dealt with.

ABHYUDAYA, 5th June 1908.

Government and the Bengalis.

16. The editor of the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), in the issue of the 5th June, disapproves of the tendency on the part of the Government to look upon all Bengalis with suspicion for the offence of a few individuals of their community, and remarks that this attitude of the Government is only calculated to estrange the feelings of even the overwhelmingly loyal majority of the population of Bengal.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 7th June 1908.

The unrest.

17. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 7th June :—

"From Calcutta, Bombay, and Madras comes the same story of a growing spirit of defiance to authority and indifference to consequences. The Yugantar is openly defiant. No sooner is one printer convicted than another is ready to take his place, while the writing grows in violence. In the Tinnevelly cases one of the accused made a statement of open defiance. Elaborate preparations have to be made to prevent demonstrations in court while trials for sedition are going on. In the Bombay Police Court a number of persons shouted Bande Mataram while a case was being heard and on being expelled kept up the shouting outside. Among the men arrested there are very few educated persons, which shows that this dangerous spirit is spreading to the ignorant classes. It is not enough that offenders should be punished, because punishment is meant to operate as a deterrent, whereas it is only too evident that the spirit of defiance is growing the more it is sought to be suppressed. An earnest attempt must be made by the Government and the leaders of the people to reach the root of the unrest and eradicate it. The country is fast drifting to lawlessness and open and persistent defiance of authority and mere punitive measures will only help to aggravate the evil."

CITIZEN, 7th June 1908.

An appeal to commonsense.

18. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 7th June, has the following :—

"Captain Arthur St. John writes as follows in the Daily News of yesterday (May 6th) :—

'How is it to be brought home to the British people that they and their representatives in India are mainly responsible for the manufacture of bombs in India? When the Indian National Congress was started in Lord Dufferin's reign, the secret societies (so one is informed on good authority) dwindled away. Now that the National Congress, constantly disregarded and set upon, has proved, or seemed to prove, a failure, and repression and contumely from the ruling race has increased, secret societies have been springing up again.

Shall we have the courage to adopt the obviously sensible and manly course of restoring confidence by timely (or, rather, all-too-late) measures for consulting the will and feelings of the Indian people in their own affairs, and restoring the old aim of letting them learn to govern themselves?

Public meetings and the press are the only safety valves left, and now we hear cries for their suppression. This way lies mad havoc. The Indians are, after all, human. We cannot expect them all to have the extraordinary patience and foresight of Messrs. Dutt and Gokhale.' "

The present situation.

19. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 5th June, referring to the present situation in India, remarks that Government will not be successful in achieving its object if it contents itself with dealing only with symptoms of discontent and does not discover its causes and eradicate them. ABHYUDAYA, 5th June 1908.

Sir Charles Elliott on the situation in India.

20. Referring to Sir Charles Elliott's views on the present situation in India, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 5th June, says that it is a new discovery that Sir Charles has made that poison has also spread to the Native Army, and remarks that if it be a fact, it must be due to something other than violent speeches and vernacular papers which the Anglo-Indian press allege to be responsible for the sedition in the country, for the sepoys are neither allowed to read newspapers nor attendany political meetings. Referring to Sir Charles' opinion regarding the open disavowal of "the party of crime" by the Congress, the editor remarks that this party can be taken to mean only those who were engaged in the Calcutta conspiracy and about whom the Congress knew nothing, and that the Congress leaders will have nothing to do with excluding them from the Congress, as the law itself will eliminate them from every kind of work of the country. ABHYUDAYA, 5th June 1908.

In conclusion, he says, that it is not a fact that assaults on Europeans by Indians go unpunished as maintained by Sir Charles but that the reverse is the case.

Sir B. Fuller on the situation.

21. With reference to Sir B. Fuller's observation that sedition has grown because the English and the Government are supposed to be apprehensive regarding their position in India, the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 11th June, says that Sir B. Fuller might have added that the scare of May 10th, 1907, undoubtedly gave a great impetus to such a supposition. His own abandonment in a country like India could only be ascribed to cowardice. INDIAN PEOPLE, 11th June 1908.

The editor says that the general impression produced by the letter is that Sir B. Fuller was the one fearless man in the Government and he was deserted and left to his fate. He represented the rod, and when he was withdrawn, the children of Bengal were spoiled. Our own belief is that had Sir B. Fuller been left undisturbed at his post, terrorism would have appeared much sooner. The immediate cause of the resignation of Sir B. Fuller was his insistence on the disaffiliation of two schools. What would have become of the boys if the schools had been closed? Among the young terrorists arrested, there are some who were expelled from school because they absented themselves when Sir B. Fuller honoured their schools with a visit. Would not the recruiting ground have been much widened had the Calcutta University carried out Sir B. Fuller's behest? Whatever his ability, he should never have been appointed the first Lieutenant Governor of the new province. It was the crowning error of Lord Curzon's ill-starred Viceroyalty. Probably no man would have succeeded in conciliating the people, but a local administrator would have avoided Sir B. Fuller's flagrant errors. His open preference of Muhammadans to Hindus, his undignified habit of bullying Hindu leaders, his singularly unwise historical references and his unshaken faith in high-handedness fairly drove the people of East Bengal to the brink of desperation. He could have prescipitated the crisis, but he could have done nothing to avert it.

Adverting to Sir B. Fuller's remarks about the reforms of the Legislative Councils, the editor observes that if the Council of notables and the proposed expansion of the Legislative Council are referred to, then Sir B. Fuller is perfectly right. The proposed reforms are worse than useless, for they are illusory, and will please no one except those who profess to be pleased by everything done by the Government. The last sentence is astounding in its monumental effrontery. "The earnest hope of well-meaning men in India, of whatever caste or creed, is that Government will now take to governing." The Government has so long been playing and trifling, eh? Was not there some real Government in the ten months when Shaista Khan II appeared in Eastern Bengal, when that oriental potentate, following the example of the great Moghul, took unto himself a Hindu and a Muhammadan wife, and wholly succumbed to the charms of the latter, and went strutting about mouthing and fuming, crowing and scolding like a bantam on a dunghill? A man who can speak with such open contempt of the Government with which he was associated, is best out of it.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 11th June 1908.

Sir James LaTouche on the situation.

22. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 11th June, in reviewing the paper read by Sir James Digges de LaTouche before the Royal Asiatic Society of Arts on the United Provinces, remarks that it was the most reasonable and the most temperate discourse on the present situation in India that has yet been made, and the reason for its moderation is the fact that Sir James is yet an official and it would be unbecoming on his part to give expression to violent political expressions.

Referring to Sir James' remarks that "the United Provinces have hitherto escaped the unrest which has agitated Bengal mainly to the superiority of the former's revenue administration," the editor says that there may be a great deal of truth in these remarks, but the agitation in Bengal has nothing to do with the revenue administration of that province. In his opinion, the quiescence in these provinces is due simply to the wisdom of leaving well alone. He says that there is no people that cannot be driven to violence by exasperation: there is no people that cannot be won over to peace and order by sympathy and consideration. However admirable the revenue administration, the United Provinces would cease to be a haven of rest and peace if the caustic of local irritation were constantly applied. For instance, if the High Court were transferred to Lucknow, if the Province of Agra were split up into two provinces, if school boys were whipped like felons, and if the leading men were sent for and scolded in coarse language there would be a different tale to tell in a few years. Sir James LaTouche himself left the High Court question in suspense. Sir John Hewett set it at rest at once. Neither Sir James nor Sir John ever alienated the people. For that matter, the Local Government of Bengal is not responsible for the state of affairs in that province, but a discussion on that point, the editor says, is to be reserved for another day.

Liberty.

23. "Liberty," says the Cawnpore Gazette, of the 1st June, "is all that Indians want and this demand of theirs is perfectly legitimate. Sedition cases are all concocted and there is no one disposed towards rebellion. People who are called rebels in India are respected and even worshipped in other countries.

SWARAJYA, 6th June 1908.

An ode.

24. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 6th June, publishes the following ode written by the editor:—

"Our feet are chained and we are prisoners in our own garden (India). We are ever sunk in misfortunes and troubles."

"We have been ruined by falling into the clutches of foreigners, and we are still a prey to the same arts and wiles [of the English (?).]"

"We are always a prey to famine, plague and cholera, but we think that we are living in peace."

"The foreigners have sucked our blood like leeches. We are alive, but in the world we are worse than corpses."

"How poor we are in our own country!! We are thirsty, although we live at the confluence of the Ganges and the Jumna."

"Our brother has not a rag to cover his body with, while we are solely engaged in foppery."

"Such wealth and power be cursed, when the people are dying of famine and we are growing foppish."

"Narayana, death is preferable to such life, (for) in our own country we are worse off than vagabonds.

SWARAJYA, 6th May 1908.

An ode.

25. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 6th June, publishes an ode by a student named Bhagwati Pershad, of which the following is a literal translation:—

"We shall forfeit our lives, in our love for our country. The country lives in our hearts and we in it."

"The white people are making merry in India, while we are a prey to misfortunes in our own country."

"We shall be hanged and shall go to Mandalay Fort, but we shall not abate one jot of our love for our country."

"Our sole desire is to serve India; we shall not forswear our aspirations even if we go to Turkistan."

"If we be put in chains, we do not care for it, we shall wear these ornaments in our love for our country."

An ode.

26. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 6th June, publishes the following ode composed by Babu Hardwari Singh :— SWARAJYA, 6th June 1908.

"If we suffer any longer in this way, we will rend the old sky by our cries."

"We were born at the very (auspicious) time when national martyrs were born."

"We can make a tyrant forget his perverseness in a minute. If we are put on our mettle, we can bring a foreigner to his senses."

"Now we have to deal with accacia thorns [we have fallen on evil times (?)]. At one time we used to sleep on a bed of roses."

"If the star of our fate rises again, we shall shine like the diamond of Badakhshan in Yemen [our success will dazzle all (?).]"

"India is our home and we live in India, we are born here and we shall die here."

"Are not the lovers of India deft in using their axes (swords). We shall be the breakers of the lines of swordsmen."

"We shall sacrifice our lives in moving on and shall leave a name behind us when we die."

"Our heart is so much affected by the oppression and tyranny of the English that it can send a thrill as far as Washington."

"The fire of patriotism is burning in our hearts. O! people of India, come and be consumed in it."

"Now we are showing our literary merit in an assembly of literary men, but when the time comes we shall show the prowess of our hands."

Loyalty of the Indians.

27. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 6th June, remarks that the people of India have ever been loyal, but only to those kings who were just and good. The names of Ram Chandra, Krishna, &c., are still revered, while those of Rawana, Kans and Duryodhana are loathed. Those who expect loyalty from their subjects should devote themselves to the welfare of the latter and should make their own existence identical with that of the people over whom they rule The latter should not be thought slaves but helpers, as only in that case would they respect their rulers. The editor then proceeds to narrate the story of Raja Janaka, who expatiated for his sins by working as an ordinary labourer and regrets that conditions are now entirely changed, India is being deprived of its grain resources and the Government takes no notice. It cares only for its revenues in order to enrich England. No attention is paid to the ignorance of the people, their insanitary surroundings, their falling a prey to plague and cholera, their heavy load of military expenditure and their cruel oppression by the police. "These are the glorious acts (kartut) of our rulers. This is their protection of the people and still they complain that there is unrest in the country. Every one who sows the seeds of evil and expects good out of it has a cracked brain and is 'building castles in the air.' O, ye! rulers, who want Indians to be loyal and faithful, remember that they will never be so unless you refrain from exploiting India to fill the hellish tomb (lit.) of England. It is another thing if there are flatterers and cowards who call themselves loyal. As long as you do not give preference to India over England, and to Indians over the English, it is impossible that the Indian should become loyal." SWARAJYA, 6th June 1908.

"If you want Indians to remain loyal to you, you should repent of the oppression wrought by you and conciliate them. You have forgotten the days when they served you faithfully and cut each other's throats for you. Those times may be revived, you must make yourself useful to them. Educate them, free them from plague and cholera, and they will worship you just as they do their ancient heroes. Without doing this, to expect loyalty from Indians is a vain thought, an impossibility and madness."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 7th June 1908.

Indians in South Africa.

28. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 7th June, has the following:—

"The relations between the Indians and the Transvaal Government are threatening to become again strained. It was a spirit of compromise that brought the first difficulty to an end. The passive resistance that had been so admirably and successfully organized by Mr. Gandhi and his friends was not broken by coercion. They went cheerfully to jail and would have gone there again if compulsory registration and digital impressions had been insisted on. The Transvaal Government was inexorable, but the Imperial Government wisely intervened. The compulsory registration of finger marks was withdrawn, and the prisoners were unconditionally released. As a proof of their good faith, Mr. Gandhi and the leading Indians registered themselves, giving their finger impressions. On their way to the registration office they were mobbed and severely assaulted by their own countrymen. Mr. Gandhi and his friends certainly understood that the Registration Act would be repealed, but this is now denied by the Transvaal Government. Mr. Gandhi has asked that his registration papers should be returned to him and his example has been followed by several thousand Indians. This is ominous and forebodes fresh trouble. A fair compromise is not an acknowledgment of defeat: Mr. Gandhi himself never looked upon it in that light. But the principle of voluntary registration being conceded, the Transvaal Government ought to go a step further and take out the sting of insidiousness. By their self-respect, the Indians of the Transvaal have proved themselves worthy of the respect of others and ought to be treated as citizens and not outcastes."

Regeneration of India.

29. The Árya Mitra (Agra), of the 8th June, says that it is quite evident from the history of India that its subjection was due to a want of union amongst its inhabitants. Had mutual strife not weakened Prithvi Raj and Jai Chand, India would not have been brought to its present state of degradation . . . . It is owing to this conspicuous absence of mutual love amongst its inhabitants that they have been reduced to the state of slaves. Why should India have fallen on such evil days, had Seth Ami Chand not forgotten national love and been led astray by worldly prosperity? There is no doubt that disunion has been the root cause of the degeneration of India. It was due to disunion after the time of Ranjit Singh that the Sikhs lost their independence and with it their influence, prestige and power . . . . . It is impossible to bring about the regeneration of India without its inhabitants being inspired with an all-loving spirit, which can only be developed by having resort to the Vedic religion.

SWARAJYA, 6th June 1908.

The Englishman.

30. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 6th June, referring to the anonymous letters frequently published by the Englishman purporting to be from Extremists or from some of the accused in the bomb conspiracy case, remarks that the letters are all forgeries and are published in order to excite racial hatred between Indians and Europeans. The editor requests the Government to forbid the publication of such letters.

AL BASHIR, 9th June 1908.

The frontier campaign and the Congress papers.

31. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 9th June, referring to the sympathy shown to the Government by the Congress papers in its difficulties on the frontier, remarks that this sympathy was not real, but that it was displayed in order to hoodwink the Government. The people are not warlike and have not been trained in the use of arms, so it is very foolish on their part to say that they will help the Government. It would be better for them to keep peace within the country.

Unrest in schools and colleges.

33. Mrs. Annie Bessant, in the Central Hindu College Magazine (Benares), for June, writes in continuation of her article on the subject of unrest in schools and colleges (vide paragraph 49, Selections No. 20 of 1908) and refers to the Risley circular which has been characterized as an unfair restriction on the liberties of students and of school and college staffs. She says that the tendency of both teachers and pupils to associate themselves with political movements is quite undesirable and that the objects of education are frustrated by their doing so.

In her opinion the restrictions laid down in the circular seem to be eminently reasonable and she believes that if masters encourage students to join political movements they fail in their duty as teachers. She says that in England no master would dream of thus abusing his position, and that no country could afford to have its educational centres turned into whirlpools of political excitement.

The Ajudhya Nath National High School.

34. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 6th June, referring to the desclaimer issued by the Moderate leaders of Allahabad re the Ajudhya Nath National High School, remarks that it was issued after the Muzaffarpur outrage and was simply meant to convince the Government that they had no sympathy with Extremists and that their actions had nothing to do with the school.

SWARAJYA, 6th June 1908.

II.—Afghanistan and Trans-Frontier.

The Mohmands.

35. Referring to the Mohmand expedition, the Sipáhi (Cawnpore), for May, advises the Government to punish the Mohmands severely for their unprovoked incursions into British territory, as they are incapable of appreciating leniency and take it to be a sign of weakness on the part of the Government.

The editor expresses the opinion that Government should now change its policy towards the frontier tribes and should adopt measures calculated to teach them a lesson, otherwise its prestige is sure to decline in their estimation.

SIPAHI, May 1908.

The Mohmand expedition.

36. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 7th June, says that like other recent expeditions, the Mohmand expedition has also come to an end, but there is, of course, no knowing whether the trouble with the tribesmen is now really at an end. The editor says that it is somewhat difficult to understand the policy followed in dealing with these hill men. He says, would it not be better to stop their allowance for a number of years, guard the frontier carefully and summarily punish raiders? Clemency is useless in the case of men who fear nothing and keep faith with no one.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 7th June 1908.

"The End of the Frontier War."

37. Under the heading "The End of the Frontier War—its Meaning", the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 7th June, says:—

ADVOCATE, 7th June 1908.

"Does it mean that peace has been assured on the frontier and that for some time to come? But how long is the lesson taught to these tribesmen by these punitive expeditions to be kept in mind? What is the guarantee that the mild, submissive maliks of to-day will not turn into savage freebooters to-morrow under the influence of the jehad-preaching and kafir-hating mullahs? May not a hint come from across the Durand Line and undo the work done at the expense of more than twenty lakhs of rupees spent on Mohmands and twelve lakhs on Zakka Khels?" But, the editor says, it is the unexpected that always happens on the frontier, and that at the most unlikely hour. Moreover, the Afghan factor is a new aspect in the situation and this naturally leads one to look into the causes of the expedition. The cause of discontent in Afghanistan is said to lie in not consulting the Amir with regard to the Anglo-Russian Convention and in denying him the title of His Majesty in the text and in the anti-British feeling among the Afghans and intrigues in the Kabul court. He then refers to the raid on the Torawari Border Military Police outpost on the 28th of May and in concluding his leader on the subject remarks "after this one cannot but be tempted to think that these counter raids are no good, and are veritable costly tamashas at best but afford training for troops in mountain warfare. What is wanted is some measure not so much to prevent raids—now almost an impossible task—but to make it possible for nemesis to swoop down upon the raiders and strike terror in the hearts of them and their neighbours. In addition to a well-armed effective police, the people must be allowed to possess arms so as to be able to pay the scoundrels off as far as possible in their own coin. It is a patent fact that the Border raiders come for two things: arms and ammunition and plundering Hindu houses. The former they possess now in a pretty large quantity. So their main objective is the houses of rich Hindu people. Hence all the more need of arming these Hindus and making them to some extent self-protective."

KANAUJ PUNCH, 8th June 1908.

38. The Kanauj Punch, of the 8th June, referring to the frequent disturbances on the frontier, advises the Government to punish the tribesmen severely, otherwise they will again repeat their depredations on the frontier. The editor thinks that a policy of conciliation can never subjugate them.

The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 9th June, referring to the constant attacks on Afghanistan in the Anglo-Indian press, remarks that although the policy of the press is generally sane and moderate yet for sometime it has been set upon sowing the seeds of discord between different communities. The Anglo-Indian papers, says the editor, should have some regard for the feelings of their Indian readers.

ABHYUDAYA, 5th June 1908.

41. Referring to the acquittal, by the Allahabad High Court, of William Rogers, charged with murdering one Baldeo of Farrukhabad, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 5th June, says that it is not the first time that European jurors of Allahabad have given the public cause for grief and indignation by their verdicts which several of the Judges of the High Court have on more than one occasion condemned as partial and unjust. The editor condemns the silence of the Anglo-Indian press on this matter.

Acquittal of William Rogers.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, May and June 1908.

42. Mr. G. Subramania Iyer remarks, in the combined issue of the Hindustan Review for May and June, that to talk of applying economic laws to the present condition of India is, in the case of the land revenue of the Government of India, adding insult to injury. The theory of Anglo-Indian administrators that land revenue was more of the nature of rent than of a tax, which could be enhanced according to the will and pleasure of the state, which is the landlord, is, like the question of permanent settlement, an old fallacy. Because the compensation made to the owner of the land by the farmer who occupies it for cultivation is called rent in Western countries, the same name is given to the share of the produce, which the Indian farmer pays annually to the State. The writer then compares the Indian farmer with the Scotch farmer and the British Government of India with the Scotch landlord and points out several fallacies involved in the application of Western economic theories to the totally different conditions of India, and remarks that this application has done, and is doing, great mischief. In his opinion the Western farmer is a capitalist who invests his capital in land profit and is not necessarily a hereditary cultivator, but a free lease-holder, moving about from estate to estate while the Indian lease-holder or the ryot is nothing of the kind. As a rule, the Indian has no capital except his own labour and knowledge; he does not cultivate for profit but for subsistence; he is attached from generation to generation to the same property and does not move from place to place seeking better terms from some other landlord. Besides, the private landlord is a different person from the British Government which does not spend the land revenue on the improvement of the land or within the limits of the country, thereby affording encouragement to local industries. The money squeezed out of the ryot is spent for the maintenance of the armies on the remote frontiers of the country or on salaries for foreign officials. Very little of the money paid by the ryot, the writer says, returns to him for his own benefit and the rackrenting private landlord is therefore not the same mischievous person as a rackrenting Government.

Is Indian Land Revenue tax or rent?

The writer next gives an account of how this theory of regarding the land revenue as rent came into existence. He then gives a brief summary of the development of rent in England, which he points out was originally a tax on the profit of the cultivator and says that the British rulers of India, in adopting the system of their predecessors, should not have adopted it in the deteriorated conditions in which they found it, but should have applied those conditions to India under which she had flourished in former days. They forgot that what answered the purpose of the former rulers of India could not be suitable under rulers who aimed at establishing a permanent empire in India. He then says that the British Government started with a system of crushing oppression, and though it may be admitted that the burden on the cultivator is less oppressive at the present day than it was in the first quarter of the nineteenth century, still, during the interval, the cultivator has been so squeezed that before he can be emancipated from his lot of chronic famine, the burden resting on his emaciated and feeble frame will have to be a good deal further lightened.

After describing the English idea of rent, he says that if only the disposition of the ryot did not involve the absolute starving of himself and his family, he would not mind throwing up his holding and betaking himself to another occupation, especially when he is, like the Irish farmer, no more than a labourer paid in land. It is because the ryot is helpless that the burden on him is increased from time to time by an unsympathetic and extravagant landlord. The rents are worse than famine rents; they do not allow the ryot any savings and scarcely leave him enough to exist on.

The result is, what Sir Louis Mallet described: a marked absence of any adequate accumulation of capital upon the soil and (as a consequence) of any sufficient appropriation of such capital to purposes of agricultural improvement, efficiency of stock, of manure, of roads, of tanks, often of seeds and implements. These deplorable characteristics of the agricultural industry in India, the only industry to sustain nearly 200 millions of human beings, have become since greatly aggravated and are growing worse in consequence of a rigid enforcement of a Western theory, inapplicable to India under her entirely different conditions.

Murder at Allahabad.

43. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 6th June, referring to the murder of a dalal in broad daylight in Allahabad, complains that the police can no longer preserve peace in the country as they are always on the look-out for imaginary rebels and thus have no time to devote to their legitimate duties.

SWARAJYA, 6th June 1908.

The Railway Police.

44. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 7th June, complains that the Railway Police are almost entirely worthless and serve no useful purpose. While the Civil Police are ever engaged in the work of investigation and maintaining order in the country, the members of the Railway Police lie quietly in their barracks while thieves and robbers are making away with passengers' luggage and breaking into railway waggons. There would be no need for the existence of the Railway Police if the railway premises were to be put under the jurisdiction of the Civil Police and a few literate men were to be sent with every train. At present Railway Police constables make their appearance before the booking office when tickets are being sold and make a show of work by striking poor people with their bludgeons and earning a few pice by buying tickets for the more ignorant or timid.

Public health in the United Provinces.

45. Mr. C. Y. Chintamani, in an article in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for May and June, remarks that no feature of the administration in recent months has been more satisfactory than the increased attention which the Government, both Imperial and Provincial, have begun to bestow on sanitation. He says that it is perhaps a profitless reflection whether, under national Government, much more would not have been done, during the last ten years, to improve the public health and the conditions of living of the people than has been accomplished by the present Government, who spent only Rs. 5,62,235 on sanitation in the United Provinces during a period when plague was rife in the country. It is superfluous to say one word on the utter and the lamentable inadequacy of the expenditure on sanitation. He says that a sum of Rs. 30 lakhs for the whole country and Rs. 5 lakhs for the United Provinces cannot be considered anything like an adequate grant for sanitation, however one need not hesitate to join Mr. Gokhale in expressing one's sense of satisfaction that this special grant has been made. He hopes that the amount allotted by the Imperial Government, to which Rs. 4 lakhs will be added by the Provincial Government, will not be frittered away on sundry small unconnected objects unproductive of any permanent good to any locality but that it will be devoted to the furtherance of some project of lasting utility. He regrets that the Financial Secretary did not take the public into his confidence and give them some idea of the measures on which the Local Government propose to spend this sum of Rs. 9 lakhs. In his opinion the problem of the housing of the people is of much greater importance than the supply of pure water and the adoption of a scientific drainage system, and that both the leaders of the people and the Government have failed in their duty to the masses in not having tackled this problem which involves the greatest difficulty and is of surpassing importance. He suggests a detailed sanitary survey of the whole province with a view to obtaining a requisite data for the preparation of schemes of improvement of the urban and rural areas.

The next suggestion he makes is that the improvement or deterioration in the physique of the people should be tested by means of medical inspection of school children such as is done in several European countries, including Great Britain.

This enquiry will elicit facts, and if it should prove that physical deterioration has set in, its causes will have to be sought and remedied.

Another step which he commends to the favourable consideration of the Government is the establishment of small boards or committees for looking after village sanitation and the appointment of a Health Officer under the District Board. He observes that sanitary improvements carried out with the willing consent of the people are worth a hundred that are thrust on them.

The revenues of both District and Municipal Boards, he says, are inadequate to meet the claims on them, and unless Government make annual grants proportionate to the needs of each city, town and district, sanitary reforms cannot he successfully and efficiently carried out.

He concludes by saying that it is the duty of the Government to retrench and economize in the unproductive department of public services without producing misery and widespread discontent among the people, and to devote more of the peoples' money to objects which intimately affect the peoples' lives. In conclusion he expresses the hope that those who have the power of the purse and are responsible for the good government of the country will not contest this proposition.

ADVOCATE, 7th June 1908.

Public health in the United Provinces.

46. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 7th June, in reviewing the article in the Hindustan Review on "Public Health in these Provinces" by C. Y. Chintamani, says that from the funds allotted by the Imperial and Provincial Governments for providing for the sanitary needs of the people, permanent sanitary improvements will be carried out, and that it is a matter of no little satisfaction that the Local Government recognizes the necessity for such improvements. The editor hopes that the question of sanitation will receive careful consideration at the coming Sanitary Conference.

As regards the suggestion of Mr. Chintamani about the medical inspection of school children, he says it is an excellent idea and, if carried out, will indicate the steps that should be taken to prevent physical deterioration.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 11th June 1908.

The poll tax at Benares.

48. Referring to the question of the imposition of the poll tax at Benares, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 11th June, says that such a tax cannot be justified in any way unless we agree to say that the Municipal Exchequer has run down and that, in spite of every objection, a tax of some sort must be levied to keep the municipal concern going. He says that the proper way to go about this business in a city like Benares where the gross income of the Municipality is about six lakhs annually and where the annual expenditure does not exceed Rs. 2,75,000, is to consider how expenses can be cut down rather than how fresh taxes can be imposed. For the present state of things the city fathers are responsible, inasmuch as they have in the past accorded sanction for expenditure without either knowing that the expenditure would be profitable or that the municipality had funds to spare irrespective of the question of profits. It is, therefore, doubly their duty to see if any fruitless expenditure is still being continued and whether the large establishment it has the pride to maintain cannot be reduced consistently with efficiency.

He says that the fact is that in their efforts to equip Benares with up-to-date city conveniences, in the shape of costly drainage and water-works, the authorities went beyond their depth, and the fiscal policy of those originally responsible for these costly schemes has not been consistently followed by those succeeding them in office. The municipality of Benares is apparently suffering from the financial error which has retarded the progress of every harbour and town in India, namely, the fallacy of expecting the income to be sufficient to pay interest on the initial outlay, to keep the works in good order and at the same time to refund the money originally invested by raising loans. Such a policy will ruin every private enterprise and has proved a failure in the hands of corporate bodies where responsibility is divided, and no one has any interest in preventing the expenditure of money which belongs to everybody. Added to this is the danger of any scheme getting expanded and altered with every change of the officer in charge. The result is that a particular scheme which, at its inception, was calculated to cost a certain sum, will be found to have far exceeded the original estimate when put into practise. What is apparently necessary is to abolish certain highly-paid officers and to make the municipal commissioners themselves do certain inspection work, which they at one time used to do, and also to suspend the operation of the loans fund and to execute no more capital works out of the municipal revenues until all necessary improvements have been completed from the existing loan funds, and thereafter to utilize the surplus revenue, if any, for redemption purposes. To try to make a poverty-stricken and highly-taxed generation provide a prosperous posterity with drainage and water-works and other city conveniences, practically free, is an ambitious feat, and this luxury it is impossible at present for the Benares Municipality to indulge in.

The Agra Municipality.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 11th June 1908.

49. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 11th June, contains the following notes on the Agra Municipality :—

(1) The annual audit of the accounts of the municipality is going on, and the public hope that the extravagance (of the officials) will be brought to light. For instance, it must be explained for what public purpose Secret Service money is being spent, and what benefit accrues to the municipality from this expenditure.

(2) There was no necessity for wasting the tax-payers' money in the decoration of the Municipal Hall, and they consider this expenditure sheer waste of money.

(3) The Chief Octroi Post was constructed at a great cost. Now it has been demolished and is being built again. What has the municipality gained from this, and how much better off are the octroi officials now ?

(4) Has the Commissioner, who likes economy, ever taken notice of municipal affairs of Agra ?

University examinations.

EDUCATIONAL MAGAZINE, May 1908.

50. The Educational Magazine (Ghazipur), for May, complains that students are put to great trouble by the holding of university examinations in the hot weather, as it is impossible for them to work hard in such trying weather, and their health and eyesight generally get impaired by hard study at such a time.

The editor suggests the advisability of holding these examinations towards the end of the cold weather.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 4th June 1908.

51. The Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 4th June, notes with satisfaction that a gentleman named Amir Khan, of the Jodhpore-Bikanir Railway, has offered his services to the Aligarh College to teach young men the different branches of railway work. The editor hopes that the college will soon be able to prepare a corps of efficient railway men.

MUSAFIR, 30th May 1908.

52. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 30th May, complains that the Ahl-i-Hadis (Amritsar), of the 8th May, contains obscene passages of the same nature as those published by the Musáfir last year, and for which the editor was punished.

Obscene passages in the Ahl-i-Hadis.

The editor of the Musáfir hopes that the Local Government will bring this to the notice of the Panjab Government.

SWARAJYA, 6th June 1908.

53. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 6th June, referring to the repeated prosecutions of the Yugantar, remarks :—

The Yugantar.

"The Government should know that imprisonment and fines have no effect on self-sacrificers (lit. head-sellers). Now it should hit upon some other mode of punishment. We think that even the hanging or the burning alive of journalists will not tend to allay the discontent (lit. to stop the conflagration), for their blood will serve as kerosine. This fire can be put out only by conciliation and kindness. So as long as the amrit (panacea) of kindness and mercy is not sprinkled on this fire, it cannot be extinguished, and as long as it is not extinguished, Indian young men will not refrain from jumping into it like moths."

CITIZEN, 7th June 1908.

54. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 7th June, has the following :—

The Public Service and Kayasthas.

"If the Kayasthas, says a contemporary, can boast of a large number of their class serving under the Government than any other class it is not, we suppose, due to any insiduous influence they might wield over the officials, but it must be due to the culture and intelligence which they possess as a class and the superior enterprise they display in all spheres of public activity. So it is not their fault if they are able to obtain for themselves a larger share of official loaves and fishes, and it is unjust to close the door against them for no other reason than that they have shown superior capacity and worth. If the principle implied in the reply of the United Provinces Government should be generally accepted, the efficiency of public service will greatly deteriorate and be the cause of a great deal of injustice and unfairness. The only test for entrance into the service of the Government is the fitness of the candidate and the Government have absolutely no right to regulate the admission. The policy which has hitherto found favour with the Government has proved most beneficial, and any change in it will be to the detriment of the efficiency and popularity of service under the Government."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 7th June 1908.

55. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 7th June, says that in every age and in every clime there is to be found a multitude of men who are unemployed, but the unemployed in India have not as yet learnt to agitate or to make demonstrations. But, the editor says, so many undreamt of things happen in India, who knows if the unemployed will not begin to agitate in the near future? He says that it behoves us then to give them some sort of education, to make them emigrate from one part of the country to another, and to make them more regular and more efficient in their work.

ADVOCATE, 7th June 1908.

56. Referring to the proposal of a statue being raised to Mr. Butler by the Lucknow public as a token of their gratitude to him, the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 7th June, makes the following observations :—

Mr. S. H. Butler and Lucknow.

"Regard for Mr. Butler's service to the province is genuine and the place which he occupies in the affections of the people is high. Hence the movement to commemorate his name in Oudh will, we hope, prove successful. We are, however, averse to any personal memorial of the form of a statue. Mr. Butler's name should be connected with some improvement in Lucknow, and the memorial should be of a utilitarian nature. We think the great need of Lucknow is its industrial development and better lighting of the town, especially its several parks.

The admirers of Mr. Butler cannot do better than connect his name with an electric installation in the town to supply power for lighting public places and for the development of small industries. The Municipal Board, the Hussainabad Endowment and the Nazul department can contribute towards the maintenance of the installation and Mr. Butler's name can be thus immortalized with the greatest possible advantage to the citizens of Lucknow."

Mr. S. H. Butler and Lucknow.

57. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 10th June, reproduces the suggestions made by the Advocate, of the 7th idem, in connection with erecting a memorial to Mr. S. H. Butler in Lucknow. HINDUSTANI, 10th June 1908.

Swadeshi and panchayat.

58. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 12th June, referring to the swadeshi movement and the panchayat system, remarks that the regeneration of India depends upon their universal adoption in the country, and although there are many obstacles in their way, they can be all overcome if the people persevere in their efforts. OUDH AKHBAR, 12th June 1908.

V.—Legislation.

The press legislation.

59. Haji Ismail Khan Sahib contributes the following to the Aligarh Institute Gazette of the 10th June :— ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 10th June 1908.

"The threatened press legislation has aroused a storm of protest and indignation in a certain section of the press, which shows that these papers do not think that they should be deprived of the unbridled license they now enjoy.

Papers with a peaceful policy have nothing to fear, it is only the seditious ones which will suffer. It is a mere bluff to say that by restricting the liberty of the press, the Government will be deprived of its sole means of information.

The Pioneer some time back remarked that sedition originates with the Indian members of the Legislative Council and this statement was met with a storm of vituperation and abuse. But the speeches of many members of the Legislative Council are calculated to produce estrangement between the people and the Government and may even excite disaffection. The writings of the newspapers have a great influence with the people, and many papers are unfortunately creating a gulf between the Government and the people.

The British Government maintains order and peace in the country; the people must appreciate it and must make efforts to perpetuate it. They must try to introduce reforms into their country, and by their practical work, show that they are in earnest. They must cultivate the good will of the English, instead of throwing bombs at them."

In conclusion he regrets that the people have taken to criticising the English in season and out of season, instead of reforming themselves.

Enactment of repressive laws.

60. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 11th June, has the following :— ADVOCATE, 11th June 1908.

"After the deplorable crime in Bengal, all that has been written by Anglo-Indian writers and by a section of the English press, and by eminent Anglo-Indians, such as retired Lieutenant Governors, however intolerant, reactionary, and ill-informed they may be, and the mischievous writings of a section of the Bengali press represented by the Yugantar, have not gone for nothing. For the fault of a few Indian papers, who exceeded all bounds of criticism and even decency in discussing Government measures, the entire Indian press and the Indian community have been humiliated by enactments which show that the Government has actually been affected by the rabid writings of a few newspapers. Two repressive measures have been passed in extraordinary haste without even so much as giving a chance to Indians to give expression to their views, though the measures affect their interest most seriously. It is this extraordinary haste which the oriental people cannot understand. It can mean only two things: either utter contempt for the opinion of Indians, whether friends of law and order, or such as are anxious to subvert the Government, or unwillingness to face the opposition that the passing of the measures is likely to create. Whatever may be the motive of this extraordinary haste, it seriously compromises the position of the Government. Surely Lord Minto could have taken the well-meaning section of the community into his confidence by giving it an opportunity to discuss the measures without in any way endangering the stability of the Empire. Instead of passing the measures at one sitting, they could have been delayed for a fortnight, and the public opinion of the country could have been enlisted on their side; but this was not done and measures of far-reaching influence were passed in a few hours at the Council meeting at Simla in the absence of prominent Indian members who could have spoken out with authority the minds of their educated countrymen. As to the measures themselves, it is useless to say that they will not affect honest citizens and that they are not of a very drastic nature. In the Explosives Act the Government has done well to protect the people from harassment at the hands of the police by the provision that no person will be prosecuted without authority from the Local Government. This provision will act as a deterrent against turning the present law into an engine for wreaking vengeance. In the same manner no newspaper will be prosecuted for incitement to violence without an application being made on behalf of the Local Government. When the Local Government does move, the fate of the newspaper will be sealed as far as the magisterial proceedings are concerned, because it will often happen that the same District Magistrate will report against the violence of a newspaper to the Local Government in his capacity as district officer who will also sit as a magistrate and order the confiscation of the press. The Government of India would have given a greater judicial appearance to the measure had it laid down that the offence will be cognizable only by Sessions Judges. The measure, however, will affect newspapers of the type of the Yugantar which are incorrigible and are published with the sole object of bringing the Government into contempt.

In passing the two measures Lord Minto made a speech which is in every way worthy of him. His utterance is free from the feelings of anger and annoyance which had been the distinguished features of Anglo-Indian writings for several weeks. Lord Minto refrained from making any general insinuation or following the footsteps of a section of his countrymen who having lost their balance of mind, make the entire educated community of Bengal responsible for the misdeeds of a few misguided youths who—we have the authority of His Excellency the Viceroy for the belief—have joined a conspiracy which emanated from a source found outside the confines of India. Lord Minto rose to the high pitch of statesmanship when he refused to keep before the British Government in India any ideal other than that of justice to the people. Indians do not want anything more or less than even-handed administration of justice, and whoever falls from this ideal, be he Indian or European, fails to do his duty by the State and the people. There is no question that any measure which goes to strengthen the hands of the Executive against evil-doers without jeopardising the personal liberties of the people, shall have the support of all law-abiding citizens of the Empire who are no less keen about the removal of the defects of the administration in order to secure a better form of Government. We however do not know how far the measure is likely to prove successful. Criminally-inclined newspapers can still defy the Government even at the extra risk of a loss of a few hundred rupees on a printing plant. Those who preach violence when not prevented by section 124A. will not hesitate in spreading sedition or inciting to violence in spite of the present measure. But as long as the present law which gives extraordinary powers to the Local Governments is worked with fairness and justice, there is little risk of any serious danger to the liberty of an 'honest journalist' who might look on it with unconcern."

VI.—Railway.

SIPAHI, May 1908.

Railway accidents.

61. The Sipáhi (Cawnpore), for May, says that now-a-days a journey by rail in India has literally become an almost certain path to destruction and it is more than deplorable that notwithstanding several railway collisions during the year, no steps have been taken to ensure the safety of the lives of Indian passengers. The editor holds the railway authorities entirely responsible for the mismanagement which leads to such collisions and asks the Government to take steps to improve the railway administration in the country.

AGRA AKHBAR, 7th June 1908.

Railway collisions.

62. The Agra Akhbar, of the 7th June, says that railway collisions have now become very frequent and that it is high time for the Government to take into consideration the pitiable condition of the relations of people killed in such occurrences. Railway companies, the editor says, earn a good deal and it will not be too much to ask them to have their lines doubled, a measure that would put a stop to such accidents, restore prosperity, render life secure and save the companies as well from the heavy loss which they incur in case of accidents. He says that it is a patent fact that if the tracks are doubled there will be no chance of collisions and people will travel peacefully and without any fear of losing their lives.

63. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 8th June, notes that a society has been formed at Delhi for rendering legal aid and otherwise helping persons or their relatives injured in railway accidents. Syed Hyder Raza is the secretary of the association, and Babu Rup Ram its legal adviser.

OUDH AKHBAR, 8th June 1908.

Railway accidents.

64. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 11th June, has the following :—

CITIZEN, 11th June 1908.

Railway disasters and the authorities.

"The ghastly railway catastrophe at Ghaziabad has already passed into the limbo of oblivion, as such occurrences usually do in this country where the railway companies are all supreme, the voice of the Indian public is powerless and the Government are not particularly sensitive in matters affecting the security, convenience and comfort of native passengers. Such a blood-curdling disaster, if it had occurred in England, would have been the subject-matter of interpellations in Parliament : probably elicited expressions of sympathy from the royal family and resulted in numerous claims for compensation. The Anglo-Indian press has remained content with the bare announcement in big head-lines that the victims were mostly natives. We feel absolutely sure the press in England would have known its duty better. The Railway Board were good enough to issue a circular to the railway administrations asking them to supply particulars of accidents to the press with promptitude. But the circular seemed to have been drafted in the course of official business by some routine-loving departmental machine and not by a human being with a tender heart for the terrible sufferings of the victims or the anxieties and sorrows of the bereaved. The Indian railway administration is marked by the same defect as characterises the general administration. The indifference and callousness with which such an awful disaster was treated in this country remind one of the appalling railway accident that took place at Braybrook in Australia on Easter Monday and of the promptitude and humanity shown by the Commissioners in relieving distress by sending an officer round to profer financial help to those who were in need. In the Braybrook accident fifty persons were killed, twenty were seriously injured and over four hundred claims were sent in to the department for compensation. Indian passengers are poor and helpless. But it must not be supposed that the people at large do not feel keenly on the subject or do not expect the Government to intervene with promptitude not to extenuate the action of railway companies but for the protection of helpless and voiceless passengers."

VII.—Post Office.

65. The Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 4th June, referring to the frequent complaints in the press regarding the new Value Payable Forms, remarks that the Postal authorities have as yet taken no notice of the vehement protests of the people in this matter, and that the latter are disposed to think that the authorities do not want their new forms to become so much waste paper. He hopes that they will either explain the utility of the forms or revert to the old system.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 4th June 1908.

V. P. Forms.

66. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 9th June, remarks that it sometimes happens that the stamps on newspapers drop off, and the paper is treated as if it had not been stamped and the addressee has to pay one anna for it. The editor suggests that such papers should be returned.

MASHRIQ, 9th June 1908.

Postage stamps on newspapers.

67. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 11th June, complains that as there is only one delivery on Sundays it causes great inconvenience to the public, and suggests the advisability of having two deliveries at least.

VIII.—Native Societies and Religious and Social matters.

SIPAHI, May 1908.

Religious instructions to sepoys.

68. The Sipáhi (Cawnpore), for May, suggests the desirability of an association being formed like the Christian Soldiers' Association which recently held its annual meeting in Belgium, to impart religious instructions to sepoys.

MUSAFIR, 30th May 1908.

The Arya Samaj.

69. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 30th May, referring to the attempt made in the Pilibhit district to stop the meetings of the Arya Samaj, notes with satisfaction the prompt action taken by the magistrate, but thinks that the subordinate officials responsible for the matter have not been adequately punished.

CAWNPORE GAZETTE, 1st June 1908.

Widow marriage and rioting.

70. The Cawnpore Gazette, of the 1st June, publishes a letter from a correspondent who complains that the Joint Magistrate of Bareilly did not allow the promoters of widow marriage to take a procession through the city on the plea that it was "thrusting" principles down other peoples' throats and was likely to lead to a row. The editor remarks that the ceremony was quite a harmless affair and would not have led to a row.

AGRA AKHBAR, 7th June 1908.

The pardah system.

71. Hakim Shaikh Farid-ud-din of Bulandshahr sends a long letter to the Agra Akhbar, of the 7th June, on the subject of pardah system in which he condemns the abolition of the time-honoured system of pardah in vogue among the Muhammadans, and tries to refute the arguments advanced in its favour. He says that the abolition of the system will not help to create and develop any social intercourse with the European community, and that their religious books do enjoin such restrictions on them.

JAIN GAZETTE, 8th June 1908.

The Parasnath Hill.

72. With reference to the letter dated the 16th May from the Private Secretary to the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal to Rai Manilal Nahar Bahadur in regard to the Parasnath Hill, Sital Prasad of Bombay writes in the Jain Gazette (Deoband), of the 8th June, that there has been no misunderstanding on the part of the Jains about the orders passed by the Government of India and that they perfectly know that only the central ridge was reserved for them while bungalows were to be built on the outlying ridges. He says that Jains cannot be satisfied unless it is clearly declared that bungalows will not be built on any part of the hill for the Jains regard the whole of the hill as sacred.

HINDOSTHAN, 9th June 1908.

An All-India Shuddhi Sabha.

73. The Hindi Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 9th June, reports, on the authority of the Patrika, that an All-India Shuddhi Sabha has been formed at Dhami in the Simla Agency under the presidency of the Rana of that State with the object of reclaiming into the fold of Hinduism such Hindus as have been outcast or converted to other creeds. The editor urges the desirability of influential personages taking an interest in the Sabha so as to ensure its success.

AL BASHIR, 9th June 1908.

Caste prejudices.

74. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 9th June, referring to the highly objectionable treatment of the Musalmans by the Hindus on the grounds of caste, remarks that the Musalmans should open their own shops for the sale of eatables, so that they may not be obliged to buy such things from the Hindus.

AL BASHIR, 9th June 1908.

Arya Samaj.

75. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 9th June, commenting on a statement in the Prakash (Lahore), that swaraj was the ideal of Swami Dayanand, the founder of the Arya Samaj, and that he maintained that a foreign Government can never be superior to a national one, remarks that this statement clearly shows that the Arya Samaj is a political body, and that any assertions to the contrary are false.

1. A correspondent, who signs himself "A Musalman Student of Aligarh", contributes the following to the Urdu-i-Mualla (Aligarh), for April (received on the 12th June) :— URDU-I-MUALLA, April 1908.

The educational policy of the English in Egypt.

"The English have a strange knack of ruling over foreign races. When they first occupy a country, they win over the hearts of its people and then attempt to prevent them from making efforts to rouse themselves ; and create discord among the conquered races. No governing power has ever made so many efforts to destroy the national consciousness of its subject races as England and the progress of her subject races is checked by imperceptible means. It is well known that when the governing power is bent upon anything, it will certainly accomplish it. The Musalmans have a great regard for Turkey, but the English, with a few noble exceptions, have always tried to undermine Turkish influence. It is the English who are ever ready to interfere in the affairs of Crete and Macedonia and who have threatened the very existence of the Moslems in Egypt and Turkey. How have they treated Arabi Pasha ? Although he has been released from prison in Ceylon, he is spending his last days in a boat on the Nile on a miserable pittance. They promised to evacuate Egypt in 1890, but they have never fulfilled their promise and are ruining that country in every way. They had no sooner set their feet on Egyptian soil, than the number of schools and scholars began to decrease, and now the state of that country is deplorable. A country's state of civilization is gauged by its progress in education, but notwithstanding this, Lord Cromer increased the fees in schools and reduced the sum spent on education. But he could not check the popular demand for education and freedom. The Educational department is entirely manned by English. Persons ignorant of the language of a country cannot understand its educational needs. The English, after living for hundreds of years in India, have not been able to understand Urdu; how can they be expected to master such a difficult language as Arabic ?

Attempts are now being made to cripple the educational system of the country by trickery. Mr. Dunlop, the Minister of Education, has decided that sciences should not be taught in Arabic, as it is wanting in modern scientific terms. But this is very foolish, no one can believe that the language that contained so many scientific works of literary merit a few centuries ago, is now wanting in scientific terminology. The system of education is very defective, but it is an encouraging sign that young men are going in large numbers to European countries, and it is hoped that the teaching of Mustafa Kamel will have far-reaching effects. May the sun of Islamic renascence rise on the banks of the Nile, and illuminate Asia, Europe and Africa.—Amen."

Referring to this article the editor of the Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 3rd June, remarks that as far as he knows it has not been written by any student of the Aligarh College, and that he does not think that there can be any Musalman, no matter where educated, who can criticise the educational policy of the British in Egypt in such a bitter and hostile spirit.

2. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 17th June, notes with regret that the young man who wrote an article in the Urdu-i-Mualla (Aligarh), on the "Educational Policy of the English in Egypt", was a student of the Aligarh Collegiate School and has been rusticated for a year, and will be re-admitted only on condition that he changes his ideas for the better. House searches at Agra.

5. The following is an extract from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 14th June :—

"Among the houses searched at Agra are those of (1) Kunwar Kanahi Singh, Honorary Magistrate and an important zamindar, whose father received the title of Raja and jagir for services during the Mutiny; (2) Seth Jaswant Rai, banker, house owner, zamindar, and Municipal Commissioner; (3) Professor Dutt of St. John's College; (4) Babu Akshay Kumar Banerjea of the Salt Revenue department; (5) Narain Singh of Gokulpura; (6) the medical hall of Dr. Ramkishen; (7) Pershadi Lal, and two others. Not one of all these men is known to be an agitator, or to be connected with any political propaganda. The majority of them render the usual periodic homage to the local authorities. Of what were they suspected, and what did the police expect to find in their houses? Hoti Lal was not found in any of these houses. He had only just gone to Agra. If he had gone to see some of the persons whose houses had been searched, was it supposed that they had all turned conspirators? The whole city was set in a tumult of indignation and consternation without a shadow of justification. Wild rumours are afloat that other houses are about to be searched, perhaps because the first search revealed nothing. Is it difficult to realize the feelings of those whose houses have been searched and who had never dreamed of conspiring or scheming against the Government? They have seen that they are entirely at the mercy of the police and the ban of suspicion rests on all alike. Their loyalty will doubtless be stimulated by the treatment they have received."

House searches.

6. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 14th June, while referring to house searches at various places in the United Provinces, remarks :—

"Every single house may be searched and all licenses may be cancelled. But it will not strengthen the position of the Government at all. Inflammatory writing has converted the timid Bengali into a ghazi, unjust suspicion and police raids may convert a loyal and law-abiding people into a bitterly disloyal body. There is an Indian saying that you dig the goolend (?) for an earthworm and find a snake. Too industrious a search for suspicious things may result in the creation of a more serious danger."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 14th June 1908.

Events at Aligarh.

7. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 14th June, has the following :—

"Hoti Lal was placed before the District Magistrate of Aligarh on the 9th instant and was charged with being the author of the telegram that appeared in 'Bande Mataram.' He admitted that he did send the telegram, but he said that his original message was in milder language and it must have been edited in the office of the newspaper. As the original telegram can be easily obtained, there will be no difficulty in testing this story. We ourselves took strong exception to the telegram, but our impression was that it was a moral offence. If it is treated as sedition surely it would be wrong to prosecute Hoti Lal without instituting proceedings against 'Bande Mataram,' for there would have been no sedition in this case without publication. If Hoti Lal's version is correct and his message was manipulated in the newspaper office, it enhances the liability of the paper, which regretted having published it. Some witnesses were examined to identify Hoti Lal, who was sent back to Agra to be tried on some other charge, the Aligarh case having been postponed to the 22nd instant. The same day (9th) about nine houses were searched at Aligarh. The searches were made simultaneously, each party being headed by a magistrate. Unlike Agra, therefore, there were no complaints of police insolence in the searches made on account of the presence of the magistrates. Some of the persons whose houses were searched have nothing to do with politics and Aligarh is not noted for political activity, except in the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College. Of course nothing incriminating was found and only some pictures and letters were taken away to keep up appearances. Other searches are supposed to be imminent, and the town is in a state of great excitement."

INDIA OFFICE LIBRARY & RECORDS

8. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 14th June, says that "persistent rumours are current in Allahabad of impending house searches and the names of several prominent citizens are mentioned. This may be a scare, though after what has happened at Benares, Agra, and Aligarh, we shall not be surprised at anything and any house may be searched any day. But something else has happened here which is not a mere rumour. All license-holders for keeping arms have been called upon by the District Magistrate to state their annual income and their social position. We forbear to mention names because they would startle the public and give rise to general indignation. It will be enough to say that among them are some leading advocates of the High Court and other men of wealth and position. When licenses to keep arms are given, inquiries are made about the applicants. Is it necessary to refer to them to ascertain their annual income and social position? What is the police for if not to give such information? Even their help is not necessary for obtaining information that can be had from the income tax office and the bazar. The issuing of such a notice at the present time can have but one meaning, namely, either a stricter control over licensed arms, or the cancellation of a large number of licenses. This may be done on any pretext and on as reasonable suspicion as the searching of houses. Sir James LaTouche was wrong when he said there was no unrest in the United Provinces. When such precautions are being taken there must be serious unrest."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 14th June 1908.

Affairs at Allahabad.

9. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th June, has the following with reference to the article that appeared in its columns on the 14th June and which is referred to in paragraph 8 (supra) of the current Selections :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th June 1908.

An amende.

"In our last issue we wrote that the District Magistrate of Allahabad, or the Tahsildar under his orders, had called upon a number of persons holding licenses for arms to state their annual income and social position. Among them are some of the foremost citizens of Allahabad. We are very pleased to learn that the District Magistrate has now written to a number of these gentlemen that the first letter was sent to them by mistake and need not be replied to. The incident may now be regarded as closed. Every one, even a District Magistrate, is liable to err, but the acknowledgment of an error by a district officer is rare and must be praised on that account. The other serious mistake is the searching of houses in these provinces. If that is stopped, the even tenor of life will be resumed and the irritation will in time be forgotten. It is the very acme of unwisdom to goad these peaceful provinces to become another Bengal."

10. The Cawnpore Gazette, of the 15th June, referring to the report in the Times (London), that the Indian students in America are manufacturing bombs, remarks that the Times does not want Indian students to go to foreign countries to be educated but prefers them to remain in ignorance in their own land.

CAWNPORE GAZETTE, 15th June 1908.

The Times and Indian students.

11. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th June :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th June 1908.

Indian students in England.

"It was stated a few days ago that Indian revolutionists in New York were being shadowed by British detectives. We now learn that a similar espionage is being maintained in England also. An English paper writes :—'In England itself private letters are opened, Indian students are watched, detectives abound where these students congregate for food or society, and in the universities to which they are attached reports have been asked for as to how they spend their time.' By the way, has the special reporter of the Times been able to get the speeches that were made at the Mutiny celebration that was attended by one hundred Indian students? A list of their names would very much simplify the work of the detectives. Schools and colleges in India are called hot beds of sedition. It does not seem to be an exotic even in England and is evidently flourishing in English schools and universities. The theory that all Indian students in England are revolutionists is an exact counterpart of the doctrine that all Indians are suspects, whose houses should be searched for arms and infernal machines and criminal correspondence. The students who are reading for the Civil Service, or any other service examination should be free from suspicion but they are watched all the same. Will the Pioneer explain why revolutionary ideas are learned so easily in free England."

BHARATBASI, 2nd June 1908.

The Anarchist movement.

12. The Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 2nd June, commenting on an article in the Victoria Paper (Sialkot), in which the editor expressed his astonishment at the appearance of anarchism in India, in spite of the fact that Government does its best to ameliorate the condition of the people and to remove their grievances, remarks that its contemporary simply bags the question, and instead of arguing from effect to cause, makes the unwarrantable assumption that Government has done nothing to create unrest in the country.

The editor thinks that, for the most part, the repressive policy of the Government is responsible for the rise of the bomb cult in this country and urges that Government has had enough experience of the effects of a repressive policy to convince it that violence cannot be overcome by violence and that it will do well now to give a trial to a policy of reconciliation.

SWARAJYA, 6th June 1908.

Babu Profulla Kumar Chaki alias Dhinesh Chandra Roy.

13. The following is a literal translation of an article that appeared in the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 6th June :—

"Babu Profulla Kumar Chaki alias Dhinesh Chandra Roy, who was released from being entangled (in the meshes of) English law by committing suicide at the Mokameh Railway Station, was a native of Bogra. He (áp) was the youngest of the five children of Babu Raj Narayan Chaki Kumar Beharwala. Although his (áp ka) name was Profulla (lit. cheerful) yet from his very childhood he was very taciturn and impressionable. In childhood he very seldom took part in the games of his playfellows. He used to sit alone for hours, pondering on something. Although his complexion was rather dark, yet his features were very proportionate. He had a broad forehead, pencilled eyebrows and a big head, and his features showed firmness. He was one of the eighty students who left the Rungpur school owing to dissatisfaction with the Government of Sir B. Fuller. Although his life was short and independent, yet he belonged to a well-educated and well-to-do family. His elder brother was a B.A., and was in the employ of the Nawab of Bogra. His two other brothers are also well-educated.

Profulla's sister—She is the only sister of four brothers. This Devi (goddess), although of a gentle nature, is very hard of heart. When she heard of the horrible death of her dear brother, who was the pet of the house, as he was the youngest, she only heaved a sigh, but did not shed a single tear. She at once went into her room and began to read the Bhagwad Gita earnestly. When she had done (with the Gita) she began to read the (account of) the death of Abhimanyu in the Mahabharata and so she passed the night. '(Goddess) Devi all praise to you.'

It was meet that such a lion-hearted sister should have had such a brave brother.

India at present wants goddesses (possessed) of the same brains and heart, as you, for it is such women who can bring forth children who can save India from slavery.

Profulla's mother.—Profulla was the pet of his family and everybody loved him. In speech, even in his youth, he retained the simplicity of his childhood. Why he left the lap of his loving old mother, is a secret which no one can tell. It was a year ago when he put his head on his mother's feet and asked for permission to go away; when he uttered these words, the unfortunate old woman could not understand their real import. Even when engaged in his new and dangerous mission, Profulla did not forget his old mother, and during his last days he sent her two letters, which bore no postmark, assuring her that her child was happy and was not suffering in any way and that he had adopted a life of celibacy, which he would adhere to to the end of his days, and that he was making great progress in religious education and that she should not be anxious in any way about him. What mental anguish the old and unfortunate woman must have suffered (what would have passed on her heart lit.) when she heard of the tragic death of her darling son. Our readers can judge of it for themselves; the pen cannot describe it. What must the unfortunate woman have felt when she heard that the head of her worthy son was so cruelly severed from his body and that it was preserved in an unclean thing like wine? How acutely must she have suffered (how much her breast must have been pained lit.), and what a terrible piercing sigh must have come from her heart and gone straight to Heaven.

Fear the sighs of (your) victims for when they pray, the acceptance (of their prayers) comes from God to welcome their (sighs)."

The Bengali.

14. The following is from the Citizen (Allahabad), of the 14th June :— CITIZEN, 14th June 1908.

"It would be altogether erroneous to suppose that the bomb is an absolutely new factor in Bengali life. All that can be fairly said is that the term has been hitherto associated with the card-table, and that its explosions have always taken the form of loud outbursts of hilarity on the part of the winners. This leads up to the more serious question : Have the Bengalis, as a race, lost their old character for meekness ? Two quite opposite schools of theorists are in agreement in thinking that they have. On one side we have bureaucrats of the sun-dried pattern, like Sir Charles Elliott and Sir Bampfylde Fuller, who assert that the gentle and effeminate Bengali has been suddenly transformed into a blood-thirsty Bashibazouk and that stern measures of repression have become necessary in order to keep him under control. On the other hand, the fanatical preachers of Swaraj pretend to believe that every man, woman and child in the country is fired with the patriotism of a Kosciusko, and that nothing remains to be done but to elect members for the great Republican Parliament of Calcutta. It is needless to state that the views of both these classes of men are equally preposterous."

Threats and their effect.

15. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th June, referring to the threatening letters that were sent to the officials, pleaders, and others in Bengal after the discovery of the anarchist conspiracy in Calcutta and elsewhere, remarks that "if the terrorist movement were to spread and have followers in every part of India, the conditions of life would be entirely changed. No European could move about without an armed guard. To live in the country, as in a land of enemies, would make life almost impossible for Europeans. So long as the people are either afraid or friendly it is easy, but when they are neither, life will become very difficult. This is a state of things that cannot be contemplated with equanimity, but there is no likelihood of its being realized unless the country is driven to it by repression. Nothing is, of course, impossible—of that we are reminded by the miracle, even if an evil one, that has happened in Bengal—but terrorism may yet disappear and officials may go about in safety if the reliance on force alone is relaxed. The legislation that has been introduced will not drive out dynamiters, for the laws and the despotism that supersedes the law are much stronger in Russia but Nihilism has not been extinguished, but the establishment of better relations with the people may put an end to crime and restore personal security." INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th June 1908.

Political arrests.

16. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 8th June, referring to (1) the political situation in Bengal, (2) the arrest and subsequent release of the editor of the Frontier Advocate (Dera Ismail Khan), and (3) the arrest of Hoti Lal at Agra, and the searches made in the houses of respectable citizens of Agra, remarks that by such actions the officials are striking terror into the hearts of the people and thus increasing the misunderstandings between themselves and those they rule over. MUSAFIR, 8th June 1908.

Political offences.

17. A correspondent of the Sahifa (Bijnor), writing in the issue of the 12th June, advises the Government not to treat political offenders leniently, but to punish them adequately, so that others may not be encouraged to repeat their offences. SAHIFA, 12th June 1908.

The present discontent.

18. The Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 8th June, repudiates with indignation the two statements made by Sir Charles Elliott that the discontent has spread into the Indian Army and that Indians who assault Europeans are let off without any punishment, and remarks that his advice deserves no consideration by the Government. RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 8th June 1908.

Sir Charles Elliott on the political situation in India.

19. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), in its combined issue of the 8th and 15th June, while reviewing Sir Charles Elliott's article on the present situation in India, remarks that newspapers cannot be put down by repressive measures as has been seen in the case of the Yugantar, which is daily increasing in popularity with the masses. JEDD-O-JEHAD, 8th and 15th June 1908.

Referring to the Congress leaders, he remarks that recent events at Surat have conclusively proved that they have no power over the people, and therefore cannot influence them for good or for evil. In conclusion he says that the Indian Army is on the whole loyal, although it is to a great extent underpaid, and it is very unjust to accuse it of disloyalty as Sir Charles Elliott does.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th June 1908.

Lord Morley on Indian unrest.

20. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th June, in reviewing Lord Morley's speech at the Civil Service dinner, remarks, with reference to "estrangement and alienation between the races in India", that this estrangement and alienation is the root-mischief in India and that it is going on extending. At the present moment things are being done and measures are being adopted which are steadily widening the abyss between the races. People whose sympathy and obedience could be counted on with certainty are being wantonly driven to swell the ranks of the discontented.

Adverting to Lord Morley's observation "that there is a living movement of the people for subjects which we ourselves have taught them to think desirable," the editor says, that the phrase "living movement" recalls the memorable words of Mr. Gladstone, when on the occasion of the expansion of the Legislative Councils in 1892 he spoke of giving "a living representation" to India. Quite apart from the appearance of mad terrorism, the growing intellect and heart of the country are moving to a definite and clear aspiration. There is a resurgence of national wakening, a living, throbbing and palpitating movement of the people to the natural destiny of man, the uprising of a nation self-contained and self-reliant. How can order be reconciled with the satisfaction of these aspirations? Surely not by the laws that have just been passed fringed by the proposed Council of Notables and the queer expansion of Legislative Councils. While the measures for the maintenance of order are cast-iron facts, the proposed reforms are a mockery and an illusion and do not even touch the living movement of which Lord Morley speaks. There must be a living representation to satisfy a living movement, and ghosts and shadows will not be mistaken for living flesh and blood.

Not only is education at the root of this living movement but the ideal of a distinct nationality has flowed straight from England and Europe and is now stirring the dead bones of all Asia.

As to the "day" when India will be devoid of its "reasonable people, educated as well as humble," and when the rulers of the most complex and gigantic State will be confronted with an embarrassing and hazardous situation, he says that besides this one danger the other is the advent of the day when the great body of the people in India will come to believe that there is no likelihood of their aspirations being satisfied. Whether it will be given to England to raise India to the status of a self-respecting nation, or whether there will be a protracted struggle between aspiration and frustration lies hidden in the future.

Repression and conciliation.

21. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 12th June, says that the opponents of the present policy of the Government have exasperated it very much and it is but natural that Government should enact fresh laws, to curb their unbridled license. But repression alone is not only futile but also harmful, and conciliation is the most beneficial means of winning over the hearts of the people. If Government should introduce reforms and measures calculated to increase the happiness and prosperity of the people, it would naturally gag the lecturers and editors who incite them against it.

The editor believes that such action on the part of the Government would also disarm the agitators of their hostility towards it and secure their co-operation in the administration of the country.

SWARAJYA, 13th June 1908.

Laws : Human and Divine.

22. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 13th June, reproduces from the Himalaya (Lahore), an article headed "Laws : Human and Divine."

SWARAJYA, 13th June 1908.

Racial hatred.

23. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 13th June, publishes an article headed "Racial Hatred—A notice to the Lord God", in which the writer says that the British Government allows the different communities of India to attack each other's religious beliefs in the most savage and malignant manner with impunity, but construes the preaching of swadeshi and the crying of Bande Mataram into creating racial hatred and sowing the seeds of disaffection. He criticises the policy of the Government in a sarcastic and humourous way and says that although it is very defective, yet if any one dare criticise it, he incurs its terrible wrath. Then follows a notice to God, intimating to Him that if He does not take immediate notice of the misdoings of the English, the people of India will no longer believe in His existence, and will worship the English as their gods. In conclusion he advises God to go to America and learn bomb-making, otherwise His throne will be invaded by European aeronauts, and it will not be proof against their Maxim guns.

"The Loose Screw."

24. Professor Ferrore thinks "Europe is losing the art of ruling people whom we call barbarians and who possess a civilization different from our own," and this loss, the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 14th June, says, "will grow more and more and the Orient will become more and more confident of developing power if the European and American people continue to regard as savage every nation which has not yet conducted a war, and on the other hand, to treat as a demi-god the nation which has successfully prosecuted a campaign. This is as good as saying that its domination over Asia, Europe bases more on might than on justice, on blind brute force of its own than on respect for the character of the Asiatics. Ultimately it is character that wins and not force; the failure of Europe as a power for good in the East seems to lie in lack of the statesmanship that is the child of wide-spread sympathies and evinces a keen desire to be just at all cost. Our rulers in India no less stand in need of Professor Ferrore's warning voice as against the unadulterated summons to arms from Sir Charles Elliott and Sir Bampfylde Fuller." ADVOCATE, 14th June 1908.

The colour line.

25. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 14th June, has the following:— "The pardah of the East is not easily penetrated by the European. So said Lord Minto in speaking of the anarchist plot in India. The colour prejudice of the West remains unaffected by culture and education. It seems political freedom and industrial supremacy have made the Westerners give the go-by to all sense of international morality and even humane feelings. The anti-Japanese riot in California marks a fresh ebullition of the resentment exhibited by the white people at the presence of the coloured. And this in a Christian land, where new liberal religious thoughts are said to get a congenial soil." ADVOCATE, 14th June 1908.

Rebellion.

26. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 17th June, while referring to the charge of rebellion brought against the people of India, remarks that they have never rebelled against their sovereigns. All that they have done in the past was to rise against some local governor who had made himself obnoxious to them or take part in the wars following on the death of some King. At the present day, too, they are merely agitating for their natural rights, which are denied to them and this agitation of theirs is construed by the Anglo-Indian press into rebellion. OUDH AKHBAR, 17th June 1908.

Inflammatory writings.

27. One K. C. Banerji writes to the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th June, with reference to the remarks of the Pioneer in its leader entitled "The Repression of Anarchy", that "if the produce of the Vernacular press is inflammatory and calculated to excite the sentiments of the people of this country, can it be said that the literature of the Anglo-Indian press as evidenced by such articles as "The Repression of Anarchy" does not tend in the same direction and to the same result, though by different means and by the administration of a different stimulant?" INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th June 1908.

Indians and the Anglo-Indian press.

28. The Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 2nd June, says that had the Anglo-Indian press commented fairly on the legitimate aspirations of the Indians and not prejudiced the authorities against them, the political situation in India would not have assumed such a serious aspect as it has done. Neither would the relations between the rulers and the ruled have been strained so much had Government paid equal attention both to the Anglo-Indian and the Indian press. Reconciliation alone, the editor thinks, can win the heart of the people and repression is not the proper remedy to remove the discontent prevailing in the country. In his opinion those who advise the Government to stick to its repressive policy are not only the enemies of the country but also of the Government. BHARATBASI, 2nd June 1908.

Government and journalists.

29. The Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 9th June, in discussing the duties of journalists, says that they should criticise Government and the people alike in a fearless and impassionate manner, when either of them may be in the wrong, and should place before them the absolute truth regardless of consequences. They should take sides with the party which has been wronged. It is necessary that editors should equally enjoy the confidence of the Government and the people, otherwise the results would be harmful both to rulers and the ruled. Fair, though violent, criticism of public measures should never lead Government to prosecute any editor for through fear of punishment other editors will cease to comment on its mistake which may in course of time lead to dangerous consequences.

There is a section of the Indian press which, like the Anglo-Indian press, professes to be the friend of the Government but in truth it is neither the friend of the Government nor of officials and its only aim is self-aggrandizement. There is, however, another section which equally keeps in view the interests of the Government and the people, and it is the support of the representatives of this section that will help the Government in winning over the hearts of the people. It is high time that Government should now listen to what it says and should pay no attention to toadies and flatterers who have so far been misleading it and have thereby caused unrest in the country.

It is a mistake to assert that sedition prevails in India, for the King does not live in India, and to expose the faults of his servants is no sedition. It is the policy of the Government and not the so-called sedition that is responsible for the unrest in the country, and if the administration is reformed, in accordance with the advice of the representatives of the people, there will be no trace of discontent in the country.

* * * * * * * *

In conclusion, the editor suggests that copies of translations of the articles in newspapers which are submitted to Government should be supplied to every editor so that he may be able to satisfy himself that he is not misrepresented either intentionally or through linguistic difficulties in translation, and that he may be enabled to know what is distasteful to officials and so avoid it.

SWARAJYA, 13th June 1908.

Government and the Indian newspapers.

30. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 13th June, publishes an article headed "Government and the Indian Newspapers", a literal translation of which is given below :—

"The Indian newspapers rankle like thorns in the hearts (lit. eyes) of the tyrannous rulers of India. Why ? Because, like sincere friends they expose to their view their shortcomings, and by exposing their evil deeds advise them to reform their character. Because they disclose to the public secrets which the rulers want to keep air-tight (lit.) and by informing the people of the dangerous consequences of this state of affairs advise them to beware. Because they show the people what their legitimate rights are and how they should demand them and teach them not to bow to, and slavishly accept the oppressive, tyrannical, unsuitable and unconstitutional orders of the rulers, but to stand boldly on their rights and to dauntlessly oppose all laws or orders which have been framed to injure them.

It is the desire of the rulers that they should rule over us just as they like and according to their whims, and no one should interfere with them, take them to task for their doings or question their actions. Why are you acting as a butcher while you are (pretend to be) their protector ? You are a watch-dog, why have you transformed yourself into a wolf ? The Indian papers are obstacles in the fulfilment of their unhallowed and illegitimate desires and (try) to stop the carriage of their selfishness (lit.), and expose (to the public) all their moves on the chess-board (lit.). This is the reason why the rulers view the Indian newspapers in the same ominous and infuriated manner as does the frog and mice-eating snake the mungoose.

This is the reason why ever since the Indian press came into existence constant attempts have been made to gag its mouth and the rulers have been trying to take into their own hands the question of its existence.

It was thirty-eight years ago that the first attempt to gag the press was made. In 1870, Sir James Stephen added section 124A. to the Indian Penal Code and thus prepared a legal shikanja (an instrument of torture) for imaginary sedition. But this law was not framed for the nominally seditious writings of the Indian papers, but for the suppression of such conspiracies and wars against the Government as were being hatched by the Wahabis at that time.

At that time 'disaffection' was clearly defined, and the freedom of the press and liberty of speech were restored by holding criminal intent and inciting to war as necessary for attempts at rebellion (?). The second attempt was made in the shape of the Vernacular Press Act, but this mischievous Act was repealed before it could do any mischief.

In reality (the people) were deprived of the freedom of the press and liberty of speech in 1898, when Lord Elgin's Government defined 'disaffection' as 'want of affection' and disregarded the two necessary conditions, criminal intent and inciting to murder.

From that time onwards the honest criticism of any Government measure which was calculated to injure popular interest, has been construed into contempt of the Government and attempting to create hatred against it, and the (editors of) papers who have done so have been caught in the shackles of law and sent to prison.

Besides this, section 153A. was added to the Indian Penal Code, by which people are being punished for creating hatred between different races, but the Government is not as yet satisfied with all this. Although the very existence of the newspapers depends upon the good will and the mercy of the Government, yet the necessity of fresh legislation regarding them is (keenly) felt. Why? So that they may be empowered to stop the publication of any undesirable paper at any time. And the result of all this rage and fury is said to be the bomb.

Admitted that the rulers have lost their equanimity of temper and that they are infuriated and so are unable to consider political questions gravely and sanely, can they not understand that the liberty of the Indian press is more useful to the Government than to the people, and can they not realize that without giving freedom to the press it is well-nigh, if not utterly impossible, for them to carry on their work?

In 1853, when Sir Charles Metcalfe conferred freedom on Indian papers, he stated that the reason for his doing so was that the Company's Government did not want to keep anything secret, but wanted to place all its actions before the public for criticism and was ever ready to remove its shortcomings and to take into consideration the correct views of others and did not want to rule over Indians as if they were a conquered race of ignorant slaves, but wanted to rule India as a civilized and free nation would.

Reading these lines one would at once ask what has become of the early love of freedom (inherent) in British politicians. The rulers of those days wanted to give out to the world that they considered India to be a free and civilized country. But to-day their successors are in season and out of season harping upon (the fact) that Indians have been conquered and are a race of slaves and they do not let slip a single chance of impressing this unpalatable idea on them.

Which is the better of the two? The English politician of the bygone age, or his present successor? Which is the wiser of the two? Those who founded the English Empire in India and who granted liberty to Indian papers to perpetuate their rule in India, or their successors who, after sixty or seventy years, when the people have made rapid strides in education and civilization, have arrived at the conclusion that for the same purpose, i.e. to perpetuate the good name of the English in India it is necessary to destroy the liberty of speech possessed by the people?

Who were the more far-sighted of the two? The rulers of the bygone days who made the press free in order that they might take instruction from its views and learn the opinion of the people and demonstrate to the world that the Government in India was based on the system of Government in vogue in England, or the present rulers, who are acting on an entirely different policy and are crushing the freedom of the press?

The Indian papers inform the people of the intentions of the Government and bring to its notice the ideas and the grievances of the people.

The most vehement writings of the Yugantar are not devoid of some amount of good. Lord William Bentinck once said that he received more assistance from the Indian papers than from his councils, boards, secretaries and other officials.

The potentiality of a Government depends upon the extent to which it keeps itself informed of the real condition and feelings of its subjects. This information is supplied to the Government by the Indian papers without any compensation and they do the work so well, that even its Intelligence department cannot surpass them. In critical periods these papers render a great service (to the Government) by removing many misunderstandings.

There is no doubt about the fact that sometimes Indian papers give expression to some unpalatable truths which the rulers do not relish, but they should not get into a fury (on this account).

"That doctor is a liar who, for love of money, pronounces a patient to have recovered, when he is still ill. He is a real friend who like a looking-glass tells to your face all your good and bad qualitities."

If the rulers, owing to their want of foresight, gag the papers, the whole aspect (of the question) will be changed. They will not be able to know the inner feelings of their subjects. In the midst of thousands of men they will not know the real thoughts of those all round them. The discontent which is now spreading in India is the result of the want of complete freedom of the press, and we can affirm (without any fear of contradiction) that if the press enjoyed complete freedom, such an unthoughtof incident as the bomb conspiracy would never have occurred.

But the freedom of the people is being more and more encroached upon and we fear that such incidents (as the bomb conspiracy) instead of decreasing will daily multiply. So the Government should leave its policy of shortsightedness, tyranny and oppression, and adopt a policy of farsightedness, prudence, kindness and mercy. Otherwise it will be committing a mistake [rue its fault (?)] and destroy what its predecessors have accomplished."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th June 1908.

An appeal for Aurobinda Ghosh.

31. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th June, publishes the following appeal :—

"Sir,—My countrymen are aware that my brother Srijut Aurobinda Ghosh stands accused of a grave offence. But, I believe, and I have reasons to think that the vast majority of my countrymen believe, that he is quite innocent. I think that if he be defended by an able counsel he is sure to be acquitted. But as he has taken the vow of poverty in the service of the motherland he has no means to engage the services of any eminent barrister-at-law. I am, therefore, under the painful necessity of appealing to the public spirit and generosity of my countrymen on his behalf. I know all my countrymen do not hold the same political opinions as he. But I feel some delicacy in saying that probably there are few Indians who do not appreciate his great attainment, his self-sacrifice, his single-minded devotion to the country's cause, and the high spirituality of his character. These embolden me, a woman, to stand before every son and daughter of India for help to defend a brother,—my brother and theirs too.

Contributions should be sent either to me at 6, College Square, Calcutta, or to my Solicitor, Messrs. Manuel and Agarwalla, No. 3, Hastings Street, Calcutta.—SAROJINI GHOSE."

The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 18th June, also publishes this appeal.

ABHYUDAYA, 12th June 1908.

British Indians in the Transvaal.

32. Referring to the renewal of Indian agitation in the Transvaal, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 12th June, says that this struggle is a part of that wider problem which to-day confronts all thinking Indians as to whether they will live like slaves or free men in their own country and in foreign countries too. Every Indian, the editor urges, who is proud of the traditions and greatness of his country and who aspires to future progress, should try to solve this problem, and it will be solved then and then alone when foreigners think it worth their while to respect "us" for "our" character, prowess, energy, unity and self-respect.

MUSAFIR, 8th June 1908.

The King-Emperor and India.

33. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 8th June, referring to the recent visits of the King-Emperor to France and Russia, remarks that His Majesty is always travelling but never comes to India. He ascribes this to the reluctance of the English to see the King-Emperor in the midst of his loyal Indian subjects, as they are afraid that the people of India may request him to occupy the throne of Delhi, which has been vacant for some time and thus defy the English and prevent them from seeing the face of the King-Emperor for a long time.

34. The Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 16th June, referring to the rumours that Sir A. P. MacDonnell, on whom a peerage has been conferred, will succeed Lord Minto as Viceroy of India, remarks that he will not be able to improve the relation of the Government with the Hindus, and will most probably alienate the sympathies of the Musalmans by his prejudiced policy towards them.

AL BASHIR, 16th June 1908.

Sir A. P. MacDonnell.

35. The Urdu-i-Mualla (Aligarh), for April (received on the 12th June), referring to the Convention at Allahabad, which the editor calls the "Slaves'" Convention, remarks :—

URDU-I-MUALLA, April 1908.

The Allahabad Convention.

"The Advocate (Lucknow), and other Moderate papers now lay the flattering unction to their souls that no one will be able to take his seat in the Congress without signing the so-called creed, and that it is in consequence purged of irresponsible young men. But the Convention has neither the right to call a Congress, nor to foist a creed upon it. The Moderates want to turn the Extremists out of the Congress, but the wave of liberty will wash them overboard and India will be rid of these cowards (Moderates). These contemptible enemies of liberty do everything to please the Feringhees, especially Minto and Morley, the enemies of India. No individual or body can frame rules for the Congress, except the Congress itself. The Parsis have been slaves from time immemorial, and slavery has become second nature with them. It is a pity that brave Maharattas and intelligent Bengalis have joined Mehta and Wacha who hate the Nationalists for they aim at total autonomy and hate slavery. It is a pity that a lawyer of Dr. Ghose's standing has seen nothing incongruous in a small coterie framing laws for a whole country. In this he has followed his ideals—the English—who pay little attention to their much-vaunted ideas of justice when they legislate in their own favour.

The Moderates, if they want to secede from the Congress, are welcome to form an association of their own to worship, 'the kicks of the English' and let the Congress alone."

II.—Afghanistan and Trans-Frontier.

36. The Sháhna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 8th June, referring to the opinion of Dr. Winter about Afghanistan, remarks that its political atmosphere is overcast with dark and dense clouds and that Habibullah has not, like his father, succeeded in dominating his unruly subjects. The editor is afraid that the British Government may be forced to invade the country, if Nasrullah succeeds in asserting his authority, and warns him to be careful and not to bring matters to such an issue that he may be exiled to India like Amir Yakub Khan.

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 8th June 1908.

Afghanistan.

37. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 14th June, says that "the latest punitive expedition has had no effect practically on raiding parties in the frontier. Raids have become every-day occurrences, the result being the looting and murder of inoffensive British subjects, mostly Hindus. Torawari on one side, and Tiarza on the other have been the scenes of the latest forays accompanied with loss of life and limb and more in property. From Quetta the report comes that on the Peshin and Chaman borders bands of Afghans are seen to penetrate British territory, loot and kill and speedily withdraw beyond our external frontier to escape punishment. While the Pioneer is ever busy finding out the Afghan nose poked into the affair, our anxiety is naturally for British Indians living near the administrative border without sufficient provision for self-protection. This aspect of the frontier problem can no longer be neglected without badnam being acquired by the Government."

39. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), in its combined issue of the 8th and 15th June, while referring to the return of the punitive expedition from the Mohmand country, remarks that from the European point of view the Mohmands deserve much praise as they have sacrificed their lives and property to maintain their liberty. The editor hopes that they will retain it.

III.—Native States.

AGRA AKHBAR, 14th June 1908.

Indian Princes.

41. The Agra Akhbar, of the 14th June, referring to the education of young Indian Princes, remarks that it is generally of a literary character and they get no practical lessons in administrative matters, and therefore their states are not well governed. The editor suggests that every prince should be entrusted with the entire charge of a district on leaving school, so that he may get a thorough insight into administrative affairs.

BHARATBASI, 2nd June 1908.

Panchayets.

42. A correspondent in the Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 2nd June, suggests the desirability of discouraging litigation among Indians by establishing panchayets all over the country. Discouragement of litigation, he thinks, will go a good deal towards improving the material condition of India.

Acquittal of William Rogers.

44. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), in its combined issue of the 8th and 15th June, while referring to the sentence of imprisonment passed on Mehdi Hassan, a respectable taluqdar of the Bara Banki district, remarks that the Government should direct the courts to exercise great discretion in passing sentences of imprisonment on persons of such rank. The editor says that if they are found guilty they should not be incarcerated in ordinary prisons, but should be kept in detention in some out-of-the-way place.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th June 1908.

The High Court Government pleadership.

45. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th June, makes the following observations with regard to the abolition of the High Court Government pleadership:—

"In all courts in India, so far, pleaders recruited from the children of the soil have been allowed to furnish a representative of the Crown. The Government pleader's is an office of responsibility, a position of honour and trust, and in some parts of India the leaders of the bar have been proud to fill that position. To deprive the pleaders as a body of an appointment like this is a very serious step indeed. It is taking away from them a privilege which they as a body have done nothing to forfeit. If it be said that the pleader is not as well able to conduct a criminal case as anybody else, we deny that proposition altogether. If it be said that the Indian pleader can no longer be entrusted with a Government post of confidence, we deny that charge too. We would therefore respectfully ask the Government to think twice before it decides to deprive a class of people of a valued privilege which they have enjoyed almost ever since British courts of justice were established in this country."

ZUL QARNAIN, 14th June 1908.

Registration Office, Budaun.

46. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 14th June, complains that the Registration Office at Budaun is not in a satisfactory state, and that the public experience much difficulty in getting their documents registered. The Sub-Registrar is a young man who has not yet been confirmed in his post, and the editor advises him to be more discreet in his conduct, so that the present state of affairs may not be brought to the notice of the higher authorities. In a subsequent note he says that the leading lawyers and citizens of all districts should form societies to suppress bribery and corruption among Government officials.

HINDUSTANI, 17th June 1908.

Copying department of the Lucknow District Court.

47. A correspondent of the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 17th June, complains that there is much corruption in the Copying department of the Lucknow District Court and that people experience great difficulty in obtaining copies of documents.

48. Referring to the re-trial of the accused Durga Charan Sanyal in the Darjeeling Assault Case, the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th June, remarks that "it seems to be a hard case, and one in which the race question unavoidably comes to the front. If the position of the parties had been reversed and the accused had been a European the case would have terminated long ago. Only the other day at Allahabad the jury refused to convict in a case of murder and the Judge had to accept the verdict. The deceased had been done to death, but no one was called to account. Poor Durga Charan Sanyal is a very old man and has already stood the racket of three trials. Would there have been a very grave miscarriage of justice had the Judge accepted the verdict of the jury ?"

The Darjeeling Assault Case.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th June 1908.

49. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th June :—

A sweeping libel.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th June 1908.

"In noticing the termination of the Muzaffarpur outrage case, the Pioneer, while going into raptures over the Englishman's devotion to the rule of law and the fulfilment of all legal formalities, suggests that a foreigner would have been surprised at the delay that has occurred in disposing of the case. "A foreigner" means every one who does not belong to the British race. That is to say, the respect that the Englishman has for law and procedure is not shared by, say the American, Frenchman or German. There is a libel for you, as wide as a word can make it. If the foreigner implied the Afghan or the Russian, the Chinese or the Korean the contrast would be intelligible. The foreigner that recognizes Judge Lynch as the best Judge and the arbitration of the pistol as the most expeditious would be rather astonished at a solemn trial, but there are other foreigners whose judicial tribunals are nowise inferior to the British and sometimes superior. The British system and courts of justice are of slow growth. Jeffries was a Judge; it was by the order of Judges that men were burnt to death at Smithfield. There are foreigners who have abolished the death penalty, because man cannot give and therefore ought not to take life. The murderer of the Empress of Austria is still living as a life-convict. Honest pride and self-consciousness may be a virtue but vanity of the kind displayed by the Pioneer is egregious and unutterably silly."

50. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), in its combined issue of the 8th and 15th June, complains that Government officials are recovering land revenue from the people who are perishing from famine and are obliged to sell their stocks of grain in order to pay the demands made on them.

52. A correspondent of the Hindi Hindosthan (Kalakankar), writing in its issue of the 14th June, applauds the manifold activities of Sir John Hewett in the direction of sanitary and industrial improvements in these provinces. He says that the chronic presence of plague has rendered the problem of sanitary reform of the utmost importance and it is to be hoped that no time will be lost in carrying out the improvement schemes adopted for Lucknow, Allahabad, and Cawnpore. He suggests that Agra, Benares and other congested areas most subject to the depredations of plague should also be included in the scheme of sanitary reform.

ADVOCATE, 18th June 1908.

The Lucknow Municipality.

53. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 18th June, in reviewing the Administration Report of the Lucknow Municipality, says that "the Board has done much to add to the beauty of the city. It will carry on many improvements, but there is a direction, in which little has been done, that is the material and economic development of Lucknow. The executive officers should devise means to make the town a distributing centre of trade for the whole province which it used to be fifty years ago, and there is no reason why a portion of its old prosperity should not be brought back to it and thus the depopulation of the western portion prevented, which unfortunately is still going on."

Paid Chairmen for Municipal Boards.

54. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 18th June, refers to certain remarks in the Modern Review for January last, regarding the Civil Service which practically constitutes the Government of India, and says that these remarks, as far as they state that one of the chief purposes for which the Indian Civil Service exists, is "to find lucrative openings in India for their kith and kin" will shortly find an apt illustration in the action of Government of these provinces in appointing a paid Chairman to control the affairs of the Allahabad Municipality. The editor then points out how the proposal for the creation of this appointment originated, and says that although it was strongly opposed by an overwhelming majority of the members, nevertheless it was sanctioned by the Government in spite of the protests of the Board. He then refers to the question of the resources from which the cost of the new appointment will be met and observes that no arguments, however powerful, which the Municipal Board may urge, can prevail against the arrangement by which some twenty thousand rupees can be drawn every year from the pockets of the Allahabad people and put into the pocket of a member of the heaven-born service. He further remarks that it is scurrilous, if not seditious, to suggest that to strain the resources of an already over-taxed municipality and to starve its public works and improvements to find the Chairman's pay is not very far from making the municipality exist for its Chairman.

He concludes by saying that "the members of the Allahabad Municipal Board are too well behaved to make any public manifestation of their resentment at their resolutions being treated by Government with so little ceremony, and if the Government forces paid Chairmen upon other municipalities, it is not likely that this disregard of people's wishes will result in a resort to any form of passive resistance within the peaceful confines of the United Provinces. If some croakers in the press or on the platform characterize the creation of these posts as an insidious attempt to undermine self-government by making junior civilians sit upon Municipal Boards like nightmares, or as a clever device for taxing large cities to enrich some members of the ruling race, these croakings can be set down to the malice of the 'gutter press' and the 'professional agitators' and if they become over-clamorous they can be easily suppressed by setting the sedition law in motion."

MAHAVIDYALAYA SAMACHAR, 8th June 1908.

Education.

55. The Mahávidyálaya Samáchár (Hardwar), of the 8th June, has the following comments on education:—

"The Government has become very anxious since the education imparted to Indians has culminated in the bomb. The British Government can know no other thoughts but this (?). Those persons who look with suspicion on the love of the step-mother make a mistake. Modern education has produced the germs of disaffection in the minds of Indians, and it would be better now to teach them the lessons of slavery. 'You were slaves and so were your fathers and grandfathers up to the seventh generation. You are still slaves. It is irreligious to leave old customs. So dear children shut your eyes, keep them shut and sleep till your white brethren have eaten the sweatmeats and drunk the milk.' This is all the education that will be imparted in future (?). But the question is, will these mischievous children acquiesce in this?"

INDIAN PEOPLE, 14th June 1908.

Expenditure on education.

56. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 14th June, notes with regret that the debate on Indian education in the House of Commons ended in smoke. The editor says that in this connection the facts are all well-known, and the reforms needed are obvious: it is only honesty of purpose and courage to carry out these reforms that are wanting. Referring to the statement of Mr. Hobhouse that it was impossible to spend more money on education without either increasing taxation, or spending less on equally important public objects, he says that much could be done without increasing expenditure. He complains that much of the money devoted to educational purposes is spent on buildings and their decoration and very little on the purchase of books, &c., and that Englishmen of inferior ability are appointed members of the Indian Educational Service on big salaries, when competent Indians are available on smaller salaries. He ascribes this to the narrow and bigotted policy of the Indian Civil Service men in the India Council. He agrees with Sir Henry Clark that the control of education should be transferred from the Local Government to the Government of India and that there should be a Minister of Education in India. Until then, he says, there is no prospect of the wise and economical expenditure of the money devoted to education.

57. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 18th June, refers to the affairs of the Khalsa College and remarks that "from the fate that has recently overtaken the Khalsa College one cannot but conclude that either the history of the Sikhs having ever ruled an empire, even to the carrying of their flag into the very heart of Afghanistan, was a myth or that the Sikh nation has since the British occupation of the Panjab aged fast and arrived at the stage of senility associated with old age." "Indian statesmen," the editor says, "have not been slow to detect a general emasculation in the people; some suspect that Indians are intentionally held in leading strings and are meant to be kept in a stage of perpetual tutelage, and the story of the changes that have come over the management and constitution of the Khalsa College bears ample testimony of this." He says "the College has thus been rendered into an officialized institution pure and simple and the flower of the Sikh graduates have been given no voice in its management, not to mention complete control over it." He hopes that the education committee of the Khalsa Diwan will carry out its scheme of educational improvement independent of the Khalsa College Committee, which is the best way to establish their reputation as to their capability to manage their own affairs.

(f)—Agriculture and questions affecting the land.

58. The Urdu-i-Mualla (Aligarh), for April (received on the 12th June), contains an article by Ajit Singh, headed "The Real Causes of Famine", in which he says that they are not due either to successive droughts or to over-population, but to the inordinate increase in Government revenue and the systematic destruction of Indian industries by the East India Company and the British Government.

In conclusion, he says that the only measure by which prosperity may be restored is boycott, not political, but commercial.

URDU-I-MUALLA, April 1908.

The real causes of famine.

59. The Hindi Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 14th June, says that in view of the fact that the bulk of the population of India is entirely dependent upon agriculture for their living, it is much to be regretted that the financial condition of the Indian agriculturists is not good. Most of them have hardly one good meal in the day. The editor, therefore, urges the necessity of suitable steps being taken by Indian leaders to encourage the agricultural development of India. He acknowledges with gratitude the steps that Government has been taking in this direction and calls upon his countrymen to co-operate with it in establishing agricultural schools and experimental farms.

The editor thinks that the members of the boards of managements of trusts should not be elected for life, but for specific periods.

ABHYUDAYA, 12th June 1908.

The Explosives Act.

68. Although no advocate of repressive measures, the editor of the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), admits, in the issue of the 12th June, the necessity for enacting the Explosives Act, for anarchism was a new danger in this country and it must be suppressed by all means. But, he says, it is to be deplored that Government passed such an important enactment in such hot haste. It ought to have published the draft bill in the Gazette for public criticism, for it could afford to wait for some time, as is evident from the tenour of His Excellency the Viceroy's speech. Had it done so, two important advantages were sure to follow—firstly, Government would have showed that it recognizes the weight of public opinion; and, secondly, a few useful modifications would have been made in the Bill. The editor urges that the definition of the term "explosive substances" is too comprehensive and is likely to bring even innocent persons into trouble. It is true that the English Explosives Act also contains a similar section. But there is vast difference in the standards of honesty of the English and of the Indian Police. If some unscrupulous persons colluding with the police put any explosive substance in the house of an individual to whom they bear ill-will, how would that individual prove that he had not brought it into his house himself? It is true that section 7 mitigates the chances of an innocent man coming to grief under the Explosives Act. But it does not protect him sufficiently. In view of the present state of affairs in the country, the Explosives Act, in spite of its section 7, is likely to bring innocent persons into trouble and thereby give a fresh cause for discontent. Had Government consulted public opinion and not passed the Bill in a hurry, these defects would have surely been removed. It is to be hoped that Government will accord permission to the institution of cases under this Act only after mature deliberation.

The Indian Explosives Act.

69. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 14th June, referring to the passing of the Indian Explosives Act, remarks that this legislation was extremely necessary, as bombs may have easily taken the place of lathis and might have been used to avenge private grudges. But the editor thinks that undue haste was used in passing the measure. He says that there are at least two sections which may be turned by the police to their advantage, and they may use them to harass the people. Referring to section (5) he says that the police may put some explosive substance in a house belonging to a respectable man or even under his control, and thus get him sentenced. He further says that in the sixth section the words "supply of money" are very wide and innocent persons may be hauled up for helping individuals or societies with money thinking the objects for which money is being collected to be of a philanthrophic nature, but which are in reality for furthering conspiracies against the Government. These defects, he says in conclusion, might have been removed if the non-official members had been consulted.

71. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 13th June, referring to the passing of the Explosives and Newspapers Bills into law, remarks :—

SWARAJYA, 13th June 1908.

"Our Legislative Council has passed these Bills with great vigour and now whatever remains to us of our liberty will be swept away. Up to this time we had the satisfaction of ventilating our grievances amongst ourselves, but now we have been deprived of even this safety valve. The law is becoming daily more rigorous and fresh measures are being enacted to reduce our liberty to the narrowest straits. Such legislation is not calculated to destroy the germs of anarchism in India, but will help in their development. To expect that these germs will be destroyed is to "throw dust on the pages of history." Up to this time it was penal to possess arms without a license, but now a man will be prosecuted for having in his possession powdered saltpetre, charcoal, or sulphur. By the enactment of the Newspapers Act, magistrates have been empowered to prosecute and punish all journalists whom they think opposed to the policy of the Government. This law will make the existence of all independent papers impossible."

The Newspapers Act.

72. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 14th June, referring to the new Newspapers Act, remarks :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 14th June 1908.

"The terms of the Act are not precise. Besides the incitement to murder and any offence under the Explosive Substances Act, a newspaper will be liable to prosecution for incitement to 'any act of violence.' This vague expression will cover wide ground and may be interpreted wrongly. The law as it stands provides for almost everything and any newspaper that incites to acts of violence may be easily bound down. The new power that is taken is to make it impossible for a newspaper to incite to murder. Any violence short of homicide can be amply dealt with by the existing law, nor would it be proper to confiscate a printing press for an incitement to violence of a minor form. In cases of assaults upon Indians by Europeans, the favourite comment of Kristo Das Pal was, 'why did he (meaning the Indian) not return blow for blow?' Would that be an incitement to violence? The other day the Asian suggested the shooting of Indians at sight. Would that be treated as incitement to murder and dealt with under the new law?"

In a subsequent article the editor remarks that His Excellency the Viceroy was wrong in thinking that a general press law would be welcomed by the more sensible papers. Such legislation, on the contrary, would give offence to the more respectable papers, as they would be thereby placed in the same category as the Yugantar and the Bande Mataram. He further says that if the Government had the least regard for public opinion (as expressed in the Indian press) half the discontent in the country would vanish at once. He complains that neither in the administration nor in the legislation of the country is the slightest weight attached to public opinion. As the Government is strong enough to overcome all opposition, it takes no note of the representation of the people, and the result is that there is no co-operation between it and the people. If there is the least indication that the Government is going to set some value on public opinion most of the difficulties of the administration will disappear. If there were more redressing and less repressing, he says in conclusion, the official picture of a happy and prosperous India would have been a reality instead of a chimera.

The Newspapers Act.

73. The Árya Mitra (Agra), of the 16th June, referring to the Newspapers Act passed on the 8th idem, says that it has taken away the liberty of the press. No longer will the newspapers now express their independent opinions. It is an explicable enigma why the entire press has become subject to law for the levity of a few journals. No sensible journalist writes anything calculated to arouse hatred. It is, however, a different matter if he uses strong language in publishing what he thinks to be the truth.

CITIZEN, 14th June 1908.

The new repressive laws.

74. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 14th June, has the following :—

"It may safely be asserted that throughout all India you will hardly come across a handful of men who will conscientiously lend their support to the two violent measures of law introduced by the Supreme Government on Monday last. It is said that the three non-official Indian members present—the Tikka Sahib of Nabha, Munshi Madho Lal of Benares, and Nawab Syed Mahommed of Madras—gave their support to the measures. While we are bound to take this statement with the proverbial grain of salt, we cannot help appreciating the delicacy of feeling which prompted the Hon'ble Tikka Sahib in not condemning the measures in stronger terms than he employed. No other course was in fact open to the Hon'ble Member. After that the Government of India put forward the plea that the passing of the Explosives Bill could not be postponed for a single day, in view probably of the panic that the Bengali bomb-thrower had produced; had the non-official member urged anything to the contrary, surely his motive would have been misconstrued. The Hon'ble Tikka Sahib, of course, drew the special attention of Government to clause 7 regarding restriction on the trial of offences and requested that all the defects of appeal to the higher authorities might be removed. Sir Harvey Adamson, however, met this suggestion with the remark that it was not necessary to insist on special provisions as Tikka Sahib's complaints were fully covered in the Criminal Procedure Code.

Granting that the plea of Sir Harvey Adamson as to the existing provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code is acceptable, may it not be fairly asked whether or not the penal laws of the land were not already sufficient to enable the authorities to deal with the existing circumstances? There is section 124A. of Indian Penal Code under which the Indian journalist may be convicted and transported for life or kept in jail with hard labour, if he writes anything which may create disaffection—the meaning of disaffection being 'want of affection.' Thus, if an Indian journalist writes that he cannot honestly love the alien Government of the land, why his days are numbered and he must pay for it. Then there is section 153A. which provides for the promotion of bad feelings. Section 505 hauls up a journalist if he publishes a false report and cannot prove that he did it in the interest of the public. Then there is section 108 of the Criminal Procedure Code which authorizes a magistrate to deal with a journalist as with a badmash. As though all these fetters forged for the Indian journalist were not in all conscience strong enough, we have now had the Incitement to Offences Act, by virtue of which if we happen to condemn strongly the administration of a magistrate who is incapable or a despot, and if subsequent to that the same magistrate is subjected by some badmash to any—the least—violence, why, the press at which our paper is printed, though it may not belong to us, will be confiscated and our paper extinguished. Severe as the measure is, we submit that it is uncalled for, for under the Penal Code there is already an offence as 'abetting or instigating the commission of an offence by the public,' the punishment for which, as provided in section 117, is three years' rigorous imprisonment. A terrible engine of oppression the present Newspapers Act may prove in the hands of unscrupulous men, but it does not seem to have afforded full satisfaction to His Excellency the Viceroy. Goaded to desperation by Sir B. Fuller, Lord Minto thus cries:—'It is quite possible that the Bills may not be strong enough, and in that case we should not fail to amend them. But the Newspapers Bill in no way ties our hands to the future introduction of such an Act. In my opinion a further control of the press in India is imperatively necessary.'

If we rightly interpret the threat there is the sword of Damocles hanging over our devoted heads, and it may descend on us any moment. But

Let Hercules do whate'er he may,
The cat will mew, the dog will have his day.

The present Bill has already been passed into law, others in spite of us will be equally passed into law. It will do no good to offer mere academic criticisms."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 14th June 1908.

The new Acts.

75. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), while referring to the new Acts in the issue of the 14th June, remarks that it is a fallacy to think that political crimes are the result of newspaper propaganda.

In support of his statement, he says that in Ireland the Nationalist Press is intensely hostile to England, but that crimes of an anarchist nature are rare; while Russia, where the Press is gagged, is the home of anarchy. The Mutiny of 1857, he says, was organized by chappatis and not by newspapers. Secret societies cannot exist in a country where the press is free. The Yugantar itself hinted at the existence of such societies and thinly disguised the locality where bombs were manufactured. In India, it happened by accident that violent newspapers went hand in hand with actual crime, because both were engineered by the same men; otherwise violent writings and bombs are not of necessity consequent, one upon the other.

The provisions of the Explosives Act, in the opinion of the editor, are rather severe, and there would be some difficulty in its application, although it seems to be quite sound in theory.

In conclusion, he says, money may be solicited or supplied for an apparently legitimate purpose and diverted to other uses. Premises may be occupied for a lawful purpose, but may be used for the manufacture of infernal machines. A Kabiraj's shop on Harrison Road was used for storing bombs and explosives. Is the house-owner liable? If the new law is worked in a proper spirit, there will be no complaints, but otherwise it will give rise to a good deal of annoyance and cause a good many enquiries.

ADVOCATE, 14th June 1908.

The new enactments.

76. Under the heading "A Chapter of Versuses", the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 14th June, says that "reflection on the latest measures—forges, one would like to speak of them—come out of the Legislative Council, suggests curious ideas. The very first idea that strikes one is the attempt made by the Government to give their action a show of calm deliberation. Lord Minto made much of the fact that what could be done in the form of an ordinance was enacted as a law in order to consult the Legislative Council—a very laudable frame of mind if the affair was what may be said to be sane legislation."

The editor then asks when a bill is introduced, considered and passed in one sitting, what opportunity is given to members for deliberation? He says "the fact is that Government wanted to give its reasons for taking the steps and not for consulting public opinion and therefore legislated, though in indecent haste and did not ordinance, which procedure would prevent the making of any statement—at least as verbose as the speeches of Sir Harvey Adamson and Lord Minto were. The meeting was a mere formality and the Acts are, all the same, ordinances, for ordinancing would have given the Government more time to reflect and produce better enactments."

He concludes by saying "how soon has the Government been affected by the cry of 'the wolf, the wolf,' raised by the Anglo-Indian press, while the warnings of representative Indians and the sober section of the Indian press fell on deaf ears only."

JEDD-O-JEHAD, 8th and 15th June 1908.

77. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), in its combined issue of the 8th and 15th June, while referring to the passing of the new Explosives and Newspapers Acts, remarks that if the Government had showed the same expedition in introducing reforms, Bengal would not have been turned into a battle-field.

The new laws.

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 17th June 1908.

78. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 17th June, notes with satisfaction the passing of the Explosives and Newspapers Bills into law, and hopes that these laws will help the Government in rooting out sedition from the country. The editor says that those papers which accuse the Government of indecent haste in passing these laws are greviously mistaken and cannot realize the seriousness of the situation. He agrees with Sir J. B. Fuller, who says that the seditious propaganda owes its existence to the conciliatory policy which has been construed by the agitators into weakness and has led them to believe that the Government rests on a foundation of sand, and is in no way more stable than a house of cards. He further says that it is extremely necessary for a Government that rules over a heterogeneous population ever ready to trample on each other's rights, to be just and impartial. So it should encourage its loyal subjects while punishing the disloyal ones, which is the surest means of inculcating loyalty even among the most disaffected towards it. The Musalmans have always been on the side of law and order, and it is meet that they should be rewarded for it.

ADVOCATE, 14th June 1908.

79. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 14th June, says that with the exception of the Pioneer, the English and the Anglo-Indian press generally feel satisfied with the new measure. The Pioneer desired the general amendment and the widening of the scope of the Press Law, as the present law cannot touch the majority of the newspapers. But, the editor says, it would not be necessary to make special representations before the Press Act is amended. The Viceroy has already hinted at the amendment: it only requires the Anglo-Indian papers to go on abusing Indians and for the Vernacular press to retaliate. He says that laws may be framed to put an end to incitement to violence, but what can prevent this expression of violence on the part of the Anglo-Indian press? It is the vapourings of the Asian and the utterances of men like Sir B. Fuller that are responsible to a great extent for racial bitterness prevalent in India but no serious notice is taken of them.

ANAND, 11th June 1908.

81. The Anánd (Lucknow), of the 11th June, in reviewing the Railway Administration Report for last year, notes with regret that it does not mention what relief was given to the relatives of those who were killed in various railway collisions, and remarks that perhaps the lives of passengers are supposed to have no price.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 12th June 1908.

82. The Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 12th June, referring to the railway collision near Ghaziabad owing to the failure of the tablet system, advises the railway authorities to adopt the old line clear system in which there is very little danger.

The tablet system.

AL BASHIR, 16th June 1908.

83. A correspondent of the Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 16th June, referring to the frequent collisions on Indian railways, suggests that the running of goods trains should be discontinued and that a large number of goods waggons should be put on in front of every passenger train so that in case of collision passengers might sustain no injury.

Railway collisions.

VII.—Post Office.

POSTAL MAGAZINE, May 1908.

84. The Postal Magazine (Agra), for May, received on the 18th June, draws the attention of the Postal authorities to the following grievances of the Postal employés :—

Postal grievances.

(1) Subordinates are not granted leave when they suffer from sore eyes or from other minor complaints, unless they produce medical certificates.

(2) They do not generally get leave when they are invited to marriage cremonies or other festivities, and thus offend their relatives.
(3) Transfers should be few and after long periods, as those who are transferred have to incur large expenses when shifting from one place to another. They should be granted concessions in railway fares, and their luggage should be carried free.
(4) They should get uniforms, so that they may be respected when on duty.
(5) Promotions should not be temporary, but must be of a substantive nature.
(6) In all important offices there should be two sets of men, one for night duty and the other for day. No man should be made to work more than seven hours a day.
(7) All men getting less than Rs. 40 a month should get houses free.
(8) Graduates should not be given direct appointments unless they are willing to begin at the bottom, as they interfere with the promotion of the senior employés of the department and are generally inefficient.
(9) The stationery allowance in the Post Office is very small and should be increased.

VIII.—Native Societies and Religious and Social matters.

The flaying alive of goats.

85. The Sháhna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 8th June, notes with regret that the Government of Bengal has forbidden the sacrifice of live goats, and remarks that this is infringing on the religious liberty of the people. (Note.—The editor, it seems, has misunderstood the order of the Bengal Government.)

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 8th June 1908.

Social intercourse between Europeans and Indians.

86. Shams-ul-Ulama Maulvi Zaka-ullah, Khan Bahadur, contributes a series of articles to the Aligarh Institute Gazette, for May and June, on Social Intercourse between Europeans and Indians in India. He examines in detail the various reasons such as—

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, May and June 1908.

(1) the differences of race, language, religion and colour;
(2) the seclusion of women in India;
(3) the customs and prejudices of the two communities;
(4) the introduction of appointment by competition to the Civil Service, and the influx of base-born Englishmen into it, who become overbearing and proud by their sudden elevation;
(5) the advice of retired civilians to the younger ones to be always overbearing towards Indians in their intercourse with them;
(6) the awakening of India, the demanding of their rights by Indians and the consequent strained relations between them and Europeans;
(7) the plea of want of time urged by many European officers; and
(8) the preferential treatment accorded to Europeans everywhere.

He considers these reasons which are advanced to account for the ever-increasing aloofness between Europeans and Indians to be false and fallacious. He maintains that the real cause of this aloofness is the insularity of the Anglo-Saxon and his unwillingness to cultivate friendly relations with foreigners. As an instance, he mentions the fact that the English resented the marriage of the late Queen Victoria with a German Prince. He thinks that there is very little chance that this aloofness between the two races will be removed in the near future, as no nation can get rid of its inherent prejudices, and as this policy of aloofness has prevented the deterioration of character which is the general consequence of intercourse with an inferior race, just as was the case with Musalmans who lost all their good qualities owing to their intimate relations with the Hindus. He thinks that inherited prejudices are so strong and have such a great hold on a nation, that even its most cherished beliefs cannot affect them. Christianity teaches the equality and brotherhood of mankind, but no European Christian puts these sublime principles into practice.

In conclusion, he says that although the English have very high ideals, they cannot put them into practice, owing to the strong influence of their inherited prejudices, and as long as Indians do not reform their society and attain to a high level of civilization, they cannot expect to meet on terms of equality with the Europeans.

RIYAZ-I-FAIZ, 12th June 1908.

Hindus and Musalmans.

87. The Riyaz-i-Faiz (Pilibhit), of the 12th June, notes with satisfaction the laying of the foundation stone of a Hindu temple by the Nawab of Maler Kotla, and hopes that this will draw Hindus and Musalmans nearer.

JAIN GAZETTE, 16th June 1908.

The Parasnath Hill.

88. The Jain Gazette (Deoband), of the 16th June, contains, as usual, a number of articles on the Parasnath Hill from correspondents, one of whom urges that Government has dared to oppress the Jains as it looks upon them as a timid and weak community and that they should show a brave front to it so as to make it evident to the authorities that they (Jains) would rather sacrifice their lives, property and all than see their religion insulted by the construction of bungalows on their sacred hill. Another correspondent impresses upon the Government the dangerous consequences likely to ensue from interference on its part with the religion of the Jains and exhorts their countrymen to seek redress for their grievance by appealing to His Majesty the King-Emperor. A third thinks that a memorial to the Government from a general meeting representative of all sections of the Indian population will carry due weight with it and dissuade it from wounding the religious susceptibilities of the Jain community by the erection of bungalows on their sacred hill. A fourth says that at a meeting held on 10th May at Majguva in Saugor, a number of persons (a list of whom is given in the paper) volunteered themselves to go to the Parasnath Hill and ask the authorities to take their lives before laying the foundations of their bungalows.

IX.—Miscellaneous.

ABHYUDAYA, 12th June 1908.

Mr. Clarke.

89. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 12th June, contains the following :—

"The United Provinces Times, of the 16th May, writes that Mr. Clarke was arrested and kept in the lock-up for being drunk. Before the magistrate he said he could not tell how he came into the lock-up. He was fined Rs. 10. Mr. Clarke is Superintendent of the Court of Wards department of the office of the Board of Revenue."

ADVOCATE, 14th June 1908.

Inspection Bungalows.

90. A "Native Officer" writing to the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 14th June, on the subject of Inspection Bungalows, takes exception to the use of the word "native" and says that it is wrong, vulgar and insulting. He says that an invidious distinction is being made in favour of Europeans, and it is by such means that subordinate European officials treat Indians contemptuously. Indian officers have as much claim to the use of these bungalows, when on Government duty and accompanied by their families, as Europeans. It would have been well, he says in conclusion, if the Chief Engineer had merely ruled that Indian officers, not conforming to English modes of life, should take care not to spoil the rooms when occupying them, and there would have been no unpleasantness in this connection.

1. The Hindi Pradíp (Allahabad), for April (received on the 15th June), contains a poem under the marginally noted heading, in which the writer says:— HINDI PRADIP, April 1908.

"What is the bomb?"

"The 'bomb' is neither the result of the 'swadeshi movement' nor an instrument of 'boycott' or 'Swaraj.' Indians know nothing about it . . . . . Newspapers and orators have not brought it into existence. Neither does it owe its appearance to 'Bande Mataram.' Indians ought not to be blamed for it, since they are incapable of making such things.

'It' is a delusion created by the Anglo-Indian press which unjustly incited the English. It has taken this form for the oppression that was committed on innocent Hindus. Know 'it' for certain to be the tumour of the heart (of the people). It is all due to English education. 'It' is the chief of the miseries to which Indians are exposed and is the venom vomitted by their enemies. Editors in common with others condemn it as a sin . . . . . When kings commit intolerable oppression and the oppressed cry in vain, when the grievances of the poor and oppressed are not redressed, historical facts repeal themselves.

'Madhava' asks who has perpetrated this evil deed? Consider what it is that is called bomb."

2. A correspondent in the Hindi Pradíp (Allahabad), for April (received on the 15th June), says that the Anglo-Indian newspapers allege the swadeshi movement to be the cause of the appearance of the bomb in India and urge the Government to suppress it with a strong hand. But if they were to look closer into the matter they would find out that the universal discontent prevailing in the country is its root cause. Those who advise the Government to adopt a policy of repression and coercion in connection with the bomb outrage are its enemies. It is a fact established by history that such things cannot be put down by repression. As long as the Anglo-Indian papers continue to create racial hatred by their violent writings, as long as the Government persists in disregarding the demands of the people and in considering them to be unfit for the rights which they deserve, and above all as long as they continue to die of starvation, disaffection will not abate in the country. Repression, under the circumstances, is futile, for it will only create desperadoes, who will not grudge the sacrifice of their lives in what they consider to be the cause of their country. HINDI PRADIP, April 1908.

The bomb outrage.

3. Referring to the house searches at Agra, the Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 16th June, remarks that so far there has been peace in these provinces and that His Honour Sir John Hewett should take steps to prevent the police from creating unrest in these provinces by making indiscriminate house searches, such as they did at Agra. BHARATBASI, 16th June 1908.

House searches at Agra.

4. The Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 20th June, referring to the regret expressed by the Hindustani (Lucknow), at the house searches in Agra and Aligarh, remarks that the police cannot be blamed if they searched the houses of respectable people, when attempts were being made to subvert the Government. The police, the editor remarks, must be praised for the admirable manner in which they conducted the searches. RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 20th June 1908.

House searches.

5. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 23rd June, referring to the house searches in Benares, Agra, and Aligarh, remarks that as all these searches proved futile, and as the people whose houses were searched have been publicly disgraced, they deserve some sort of compensation. The editor hopes that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor will prevent the occurrence of such incidents again and will do something for the people who have suffered. MASHRIQ, 23rd June 1908.

House searches.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 25th June 1908.

6. The following is an extract from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 25th June :—

"The house searches that were made at Aligarh on the 9th instant produced nothing of importance. Since then a large number of houses have been searched in villages in the mofussil. In some instances the houses of respectable zamindars were searched but nothing of an incriminating nature was found anywhere. The Vedic Asram has received particular attention. The institution is something like a boarding house built by the Arya Samajists of the district. About forty boys live there. The institution being closed for the summer recess the boys have gone home. The houses of almost all of them have been searched. Some of the boys were brought to Aligarh by the police and it is said they were detained in custody. Some of them, it is further said, made certain statements to the Magistrate. Some boys who had been sent for, went direct to the Magistrate and asked him to take down their statements as they feared ill-treatment from the police if they went to them. The Magistrate took down their statements. One boy while in police custody managed to write a letter to his brother and to send it. In this letter he complained of ill-treatment by the police. This letter has been submitted to the Magistrate. There is a wide feeling of insecurity in the Aligarh district. There is a persistent report that an attempt will be made to implicate six or seven persons, in some conspiracy, and there is an apprehension of a repetition of the Etawah and Rawalpindi dramas. Two police officers have been suddenly transferred. Hoti Lal's case came up on the 22nd instant. Not a single copy of the seditious leaflet has been found at Aligarh."

CITIZEN, 21st June 1908.

Hoti Lal Varma.

7. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 21st June, has the following :—

"A correspondent writes from Aligarh under date 11th :—This town has hitherto been totally free from all sorts of political prosecutions and house searchings, but the authorities have now begun to smell sedition in every movement of every forward resident of the place. The court officers are inhaling the same atmosphere that the Europeans stationed in Bengal are breathing and their suspicion of the seditious character of the educated Indians is gradually assuming proportions equally tremendous. Detectives, to earn the good looks of their European officers, are working in the streets and markets in various garbs with great vigour to prove themselves in no way inferior to Sherlock Holmes. Such being the pervading ideas, it is no wonder that the houses and shops of some innocent persons were searched into on the 9th instant by the order of the Magistrate. He said that the searches were made to find a certain seditious leaflet which it is said was circulated by some mischievous person. But the searches came to no result as the leaflet could nowhere be found. It was not without some pains and loss of time that the authorities came to know the name of the sender from Aligarh of the telegram that appeared in the daily Bande Mataram of the 11th ultimo. Mr. Hoti Lal Varma was found to be the sender and was consequently arrested at Agra. He was brought over to Aligarh and was tried by the Magistrate. The details of the case are still a mystery, as the case was taken up by the Magistrate on the 9th instant which was a public holiday owing to Dasehra Ashnan. Strict secrecy was observed in trying the case.

From another account it appears that Hoti Lal took his trial before the District Magistrate, Aligarh, on the 10th instant. Accused admitted having sent a telegram to the Bande Mataram but disclaimed the wording published. The case was postponed to the 22nd. Meanwhile Hoti Lal was taken to Agra to be tried on other charges. There were others there believed to be implicated in the affair. Several houses have been searched at Aligarh. Among these was the place of Mr. Hasrat, the Muhammadan nationalist poet and editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla. Nothing incriminatory was found."

ABHYUDAYA, 19th June 1908.

Lord Morley on the present situation in India.

8. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 19th June, while reviewing the speech made by Lord Morley on the present situation in India at the Indian Civil Service Club dinner, notes with gratification that he has realized the gravity of the situation and knows the remedy to apply. He fully understands that mere repression will do no good unless accompanied by measures calculated to satisfy the growing aspirations of the Indians.

ABHYUDAYA, 19th June 1908.

Sir B. Fuller on the present situation.

9. Commenting on the views of Sir B. Fuller on the present situation in India, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 19th June, observes that sedition has grown in India owing to the want of firmness on the part of Government in rectifying its mistakes and not owing to its repressing the people, as is maintained by Sir B. Fuller. Had Government set aside the partition of Bengal, Indians would not have looked upon it as done through fear. They would have taken it to be the result of the Liberals coming into power. The editor says that the deportation of Lala Lajpat Rai and Ajit Singh was a very serious mistake and Government acted wisely in releasing them at an early date. Had they not been released, the present discontent would have been intensified all the more. As to the proposed reforms, he says that the people of India do not take them in the light of reforms but only as retrogressive measures, and, accordingly, they do not consider that they were inspired by fear as Sir B. Fuller appears to believe they were.

ABHYUDAYA, 19th June 1908.

Government and the present situation.

10. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 19th June, says that the only way for the Government to relieve the present situation is to adopt such measures for the good of the country as will convince the people that it governs them in their own interests. Belief in a disinterested policy on the part of Government, the editor says, will be far more effective in establishing the security of British rule than the fear inspired by the army, police, and all the secret agents of Government.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 21st June 1908.

Englishmen and India.

11. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 21st June, has the following under the heading "Try It Yourselves":—

"When Englishmen write about the wisdom and benevolence with which India is governed, we are reminded of the following little anecdote: In the old days of slavery in the Southern States of America, a negro ran away from his master and, assisted by sympathizing friends, escaped to Canada. He settled there and prospered. He happened one day to be talking to an Englishman about his former life. It appeared that when he was a slave his master had not been harsh or brutal, but had, on the contrary, treated him kindly. 'Why, then, did you run away?' asked the Englishman. 'Oh,' replied the negro, 'the place has not been filled yet; if you think you would like it you can have it yourself.' So, too, we suggest to English journalists, that if they really admire the Indian system of government they should try it themselves. Every year sixty or more new members of the Indian Civil Service are sent out to govern India. Let them stay at home and govern England. We are sure they would be willing to undertake the work if it were offered to them. Replace Cabinet, House of Lords and House of Commons and Judges by the successful candidates in a competitive examination. Or, at least utilize the talents of those men who have left the service. It seems a pity that the genius and administrative capacity of retired Lieutenant Governors should be wasted in the India Office. Give them in England what they had in India, more than the powers of King and Prime Minister combined. If, as we suspect, the English are not willing to accept this suggestion, we can only say that it seems a little unreasonable to blame others for finding fault with a system of government which they themselves would find intolerable."

SWARAJYA, 20th June 1908.

Arabindo Ghosh.

12. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 20th June, publishes the appeal issued by Arabindo Ghosh's sister on his behalf.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 25th June 1908.

Appeal for Mr. Arabindo Ghosh.

13. Referring to Miss Sarojini Ghosh's appeal on behalf of her brother Arabindo Ghosh, the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 25th June, says that taking into consideration Mr. Arabindo Ghosh's position and his great qualities, his vow of poverty in the service of his country and his spiritual character, there is no question but that Mr. Ghosh's arrest has come as a shock to the whole country and it is impossible not to sympathize with such an appeal couched as it is in judicious and delicate language. The editor says "some people are apprehensive that contributions to his defence fund will be treated as a mark of sympathy with the conspiracy. We do not think so. Those who believe him to be innocent, or admire him, ought to help him. For the rest, the ban of suspicion does not matter, because men are suspected alike with and without cause."

ANAND, 18th June 1908.

Sedition in the United Provinces.

14. A correspondent in the Ánánd (Lucknow), of the 18th June, expresses his surprise that the authorities have scented sedition in the United Provinces, the inhabitants of which have always been known to be the most loyal subjects of the Government and whose unflinching loyalty was only recently testified to by Sir James Digges LaTouche. He urges Government not to suspect the loyal people of these provinces of sedition for to do so would be putting loyalty at a discount.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 25th June 1908.

The position of affairs in Calcutta.

15. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 25th June, reviewing the position of affairs in Calcutta, observes "even Anglo-Indian ex-officials are satisfied that it is not a passing phase but the development of a new birth. Open sedition has been put down for the time and secret conspiracy has also been brought within the meshes of the law, but the conviction is growing that neither the one nor the other can be put out of existence by the application of force alone. There is a call for constructive statesmanship, a frank recognition of the truth that a new and powerful leaven is at work and the old methods of governing will not stand the strain of the new forces that have come into being."

HINDI PRADIP, April 1908.

Future of India.

16. Under the heading "Signs of The Future" a correspondent in the Hindi Pradíp (Allahabad), for April (received on the 15th June), points out that as the world moves in cycles, a fallen nation has everything to gain, for its next stage will be one of progress, whereas a great and exalted nation of to-day will be humble in the dust to-morrow. The present cycle has begun from the east and Japan is its precursor. The seed of nationalism in India will be long in taking root. It requires that manure and moisture which is being supplied, although inadequately, by the growing patriotism and enthusiasm of the Indians, and which will enable them even to sacrifice their lives. Men of the old school cannot be expected to furnish this manure. It will be provided by the rising generation of Indians—school boys and college students. Signs of the future prosperity of India are becoming visible. For the service of the country, volunteers are coming into existence. They provide a very good means of bringing about the regeneration of India and they are multiplying in number day by day. The day is near when volunteers will come into existence in every village, howsoever small. These are very good symptoms for making a subject race fit for independence (Swachhandta).

NAGRI PRACHARAK, May 1908.

Regeneration of India.

17. The Nágri Prachárak (Lucknow), for May, contains a number of verses in which the writer says that "true swadeshists are those who make social reforms, look upon the attainment of swaraj as the goal of their lives and the enforcement of boycott as a means of elevating their country." He calls upon the Indians to be true swadeshists, if they want to bring about the regeneration of their motherland.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 8th June 1908.

Indian patriotism.

18. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 8th June, referring to the ever-increasing litigation and to the reluctance of Indian passengers to accommodate each other in railway trains, and to the mutual hatred and enmity prevalent in India, remarks that in the face of such things, no one can believe that the people of India are patriotic or feel for one another.

CITIZEN, 25th June 1908.

India and sedition.

19. The following is an extract from the Citizen (Allahabad), of the 25th June:—

"The Madras Times suggested some time ago that a Cromwell or a Napoleon was wanted for India to keep down sedition and anarchism. A correspondent to that paper very neatly replied to the demand. Wrote he:—

'It may surprise you to hear that your suggestion that a man of the character of Cromwell or Napoleon should be sent out to govern India has already for some time been under the consideration of Lord Morley by express command of His Majesty the King. Lord Morley and the India Council have, however, sought in vain in England for a man of the requisite firmness of character. There was some hope of discovering the right man in Spain and the name of the present representative of the House of Alba was mentioned. He was found, however, on further enquiry, to lack the great qualities of his illustrious forefather. I am, however, in a position to say that the real object of His Majesty's forthcoming visit to Russia is the selection of a Governor General of the right type. Your recent news that it was connected with the sale of India to the Czar is altogether without foundation. But His Majesty has been led to believe that men of the high character of Ivan, the Terrible, are still to be found among the Muscovites or the Tartars, though the decadent races of Western Europe no longer produce them.' "

Political Freedom.

SWARAJYA, 20th June 1908.

20. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 20th June, publishes an article headed "Political Freedom" of which the following is a translation :—

"There is the cry for swaraj from all quarters of India, and its people are now once more, after centuries of subjugation, inspired with ideas of liberty. Now the question is : 'Do Indians want political freedom, and in what measure ?' Our opponent says that conquered races should not hanker after freedom. They must be content with their lot, and must be thankful for what is done for them by the dominant race. But should the conquered races quietly accept this dictum and make no efforts to rise from their degraded condition ? Before entering into a discussion on political liberty, it is necessary to remember that the highest aim of a man should be to attain perfection.

Education liberalises the mind and makes it impossible for a man to be selfish and to flatter others to gain his own ends. If education does not accomplish this end, then it is quite useless. There is a class of persons in India who are opposed to the force of freedom, but their existence should be ignored and it must be remembered that God helps those who help themselves. Nature itself is moving from lower forms to higher ones and all the Powers of the world are working towards one end—progress. At this time, if the people of India remain stationary and do not move on, it is their own fault.

God never intended that anyone should be a slave, and no human being has the right to encroach upon the birth-right of another. After Adam's disobedience, God made man free to follow his fancies, with the sole condition that he should not interfere with the progress of his fellow men. But if he does interfere with the advancement of his fellows, a time will come when he will rue the iniquities he has perpetrated. This truth is corroborated by history, but it would not do (for a subject race) to depend upon it and abstain from action. An Empire rests on justice and mercy, but if the rulers do not possess these qualities, there is little hope that the Empire will remain stable for a long time.

Noblesse oblige sustains an Empire while repression and tyranny destroy it.

There are some people who are throwing obstacles in the way of our progress, but remember that truth conquers in the end, and the right cause succeeds. (Here follows a long extract from Mill on Liberty.)

But liberty is not attained all of a sudden. As the nation advances in civilization, in learning, and in arts, its power will increase till it attains swaraj, which is its goal.

So the one thing necessary at present is progress and no one can prevent this."

Racial bitterness and unrest.

CITIZEN, 21st June 1908.

21. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 21st June, referring to the racial bitterness and unrest prevailing in India, remarks as follows :—

"To our mind, the present unrest in India is not due to one or two isolated causes. There has been a change in the spirit of the people under the influence of English education, which has led to good results in some causes, and to the contrary in others. At a time like this, it is necessary that the good influence of the best men among Indians and Anglo-Indians should be exerted to counteract the results which are baneful. The worst mistake that can be made is to fan the blaze of racial hatred. For a long time past, it has been a grievance of the people that there is usually a miscarriage of justice in criminal cases in which the issue lies between Europeans and Indians. Indian papers take up these cases, and criticise them with much heat and passion ; and the result is an estrangement between Europeans and Indians. We think it is this racial feeling that accounts, in a great measure, for the prevailing unrest. The Indian to-day is not what he was fifty years ago. He is now a travelled man, and no longer dependent upon the village oracle for the knowledge of the universe. So far as intellect is concerned he feels that he is as good as anybody in the world. It is this consciousness of his own individuality that has given him a certain amount of daring and independence. The European thinks that the educated Indian is arrogant and overbearing, but that is not exactly the case. The educated Indian of the present day looks for equal treatment with the European. The latter resents this attitude, and so there springs up bitterness between both. Instances may be quoted by the score of Indian passengers meeting with rough treatment at the hands of Europeans in railway trains. We heard of a Raja holding a first class ticket being driven from compartment to compartment to find standing room, because the European travellers would not have him. Well, this sort of thing creates racial bitterness, and the latter by accumulation grows into unrest.

The first thing to which attention should be paid, therefore, is to remove the causes tending to racial bitterness."

OUDH AKHBAR, 22nd June 1908.

The English and their patriotism.

22. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 22nd June, remarks that the one admirable trait of the English is their patriotism and their unflinching devotion to the cause of their country and nation. If they extended their sympathies to men of other nationalities under their influence, they would become popular all the world over, but this they cannot do owing to their insular character.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 25th June 1908.

The forces for and against revolutionary conspiracies.

23. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 25th June, has the following :—

"Plots and conspiracies fail oftener than they succeed and they are perpetually in danger of being detected, but very few plots have been so suddenly and completely exposed as the Calcutta plot. The reasons are worth consideration. The making and use of bombs is originally a protest against the tyranny of despotism, the punishment of men and women without trial, the application of torture, ill-treatment and physical degradation and violence. The man who writhes under the knout or howls under the bastinado would naturally gloat on the sweets of revenge and would unhesitatingly fling a bomb at the man who made him suffer such agony and humiliation. Later on the feeling must have become more impersonal, every crowned head and elected ruler of a republic must have been looked upon as a tyrant in the abstract and treated as an enemy whose life was forfeited. Now, in India the brutal excesses of despotism do not exist so that the desire of personal revenge did not introduce the bomb. It was a spirit of bravado and youthful recklessness. It was more fun than anything else. Almost all were boys and they were in high spirits. The danger of the enterprise was fascinating. The concoction of explosives was a very interesting, if dangerous, occupation. Attempts at outrage and murder even, if unsuccessful, had been made more than once and the suspicions of the secret police had been aroused. Some of the conspirators themselves were warned but they did not destroy the documentary evidence in their possession. They had no informers; the police had been watching them for months, but they kept no watch over the police. They were isolated, heedless and devoid of the craftiness of conspirators and when they were caught they hurriedly made confessions even before evidence against them had been produced. Against these conspirators were arrayed not only a Government ready for all emergencies, but the resources and the intelligence of their own people. The best European detective officer could do nothing without his Indian subordinate or colleague. The whole case has been entirely worked up by Bengali detective officers. The informers watched the movements of the conspirators for weeks. The net that closed upon the band of the terrorists was drawn by their own people. So long as these conditions exist there is no fear of any conspiracy being organized on a large scale. When, however, the secret police comes to have conspirators or their friends as members of the force, when among the informers will appear men who really belong to the conspiracy then the position will become truly formidable. It is quite possible, however, that this phase of political crime and conspiracy will pass, though the awakened national instinct will not disappear. We are not very sanguine, however, that we have seen the last of conspiracies and crime, because the causes that gave them birth have not disappeared. They may now go deeper under the ground, but their extinction is doubtful."

HINDI PRADIP, April 1908.

"A dialogue between Zaid and Bakar."

24. The following dialogue appears in the Hindi Pradíp (Allahabad), for April (received on the 15th June) :—

"Zaid : Did you suppose that we would continue blind and ignorant for ever and would not wake up till the end of time?

Bakar: Yes, that was what I wished and I was pursuing a course conducive to that end. I left you in such a maze (of difficulties) that you could never get out of it.

Zaid: It seems that is why you hampered us to such an extent that we ultimately became idle and lazy and found it difficult to move?

Bakar: I gathered from history that you had been subject to slavery for centuries and that you like to remain slaves. Why then should not I have had taken advantage of your feelings on the point?

Zaid: Do you want to upset Nature and her laws? Don't you know that Nature is mutable, that it is ever changing and that it is not guided by the laws of uniformity.

Bakar: Your manners and habits indicated to me that in your case Nature, too, was compelled to change her character.

'The sun moves and so does the moon; the ways of the world change. But immovable as well as uniform is Indian idleness.' Ah! I wonder what you were and what you have come to. Is it possible that the sun should rise in the west and that night should be changed into day?

Zaid: Forsooth, this light we have received from the west. No wonder, then, that the sun rose in the west. Don't you know that God who can bring about impossible phenomena is all-powerful. He makes what is impossible possible. Take this example alone. Those who were always known to be timid, and who from their loose dhotis were never thought to be endowed with bravery—the Bengalis—are now striving to make their entire community brave and valiant and some of them are hazarding their lives even. It shows that it is certainly then some freak (lit. game) of Nature.

Bakar: Do you not want me to remain?

Zaid: No, no; you should remain (here) as our suzerain lord. The heavenly cow (meaning India) belongs to me and you alike. From that heavenly cow we have our very bones and flesh which will in the end again return to it. You come and milch it as far as possible by every possible means and then go way. We get nothing, while you swallow everything. After taking the very kernel, you do not leave even sufficient shell and husk for our bare existence. Doubtless we live, but are lifeless in every way, just as a shameless person that (lit. one with nose clipt) leads a miserable life? And perhaps you do not want them to gain in strength and power lest they should claim equality with you. But that is not to be now.

Bakar: Pooh! the dust beneath the foot aspires to the head! Well, now I depart to tell Lord Minto to increase the number of detectives and to quarter punitive police here and there. And I will do everything else that I can so that you may become maimed and distorted all the more.

Zaid: Well, I also warn you that you may do what you like, but these moves of yours cannot checkmate ours. It is owing to the doings of such narrow-minded people as yourself that the prestige of the Government which has so far been invulnerable has now surely begun to decline (lit. to be eclipsed). It is our belief that good will follow if the Government will pursue a course of justice."

HINDI PRADIP, April 1908.

"Lip-loyalty."

25. The Hindi Pradíp (Allahabad), for April (received on the 15th June), contains the following under the heading "Lip-loyalty":—

"It is not a fact that the officials who rule over us so cleverly, do not know these lip-loyalists. They perfectly understand what is the worth of the professions of such persons. Only recently a number of taluqdars and other gentlemen of these provinces held a meeting in the Mayo Hall to express regret at the bomb outrage. Educated men and Vakils took no part in it. The Pioneer, that caviling and inveterate enemy of ours, published it also. The address which was delivered in the meeting was so clumsy that the educated classes could never acquiesce in it. It also contained a resolution urging the employment of honorary detectives. Had Government respected our wishes and considered the claims of the people for their rights and privileges, such outrages would never have taken place. Where then is the necessity of becoming honorary detectives in a fit of lip-loyalty? We will call those who urge the Government to make reforms in the administration of the country greater well-wishers of British rule than those who boast of doing the work of espionage. There never was so poorly attended a public meeting in the Mayo Hall.

This shows that it was a meeting of mere flatterers. It is owing to the doings of such persons that the United Provinces are the most backward of all other provinces and there is little hope of these provinces bestirring themselves."

HINDI HINDOSTHAN, 19th June 1908.

Violent speeches and writings.

26. The Hindi Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 19th June, condemns the campaign of violent speech-making against the Government. The agitators, the editor says, should clearly understand that violent speeches and writings will not accomplish their object. If they want to make any progress, they, after proving their ability, should respectfully ask the just and kind Government for their rights and privileges and it is sure to grant them.

SWARAJYA, 20th June 1908.

An ode.

27. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 20th June, publishes the following political ode by one Bhagwati Prasad :—

"Tell those who are daily tyrannising over the natives, that they are digging their own graves (lit. cutting their root)."

"They shoot one and rupture another's spleen, and the tyrants say 'why do you complain ?' "

"Remember always that only those will go to Heaven who have forgotten themselves in their love for their country."

"The people of India are dying of starvation, only those will go to Heaven who help them."

"Tell them, O ! Bahár ! (nom de plume of the writer) ye destroyers of exhausted Bharat (India), these are your last days."

SWARAJYA, 20th June 1908.

An ode.

28. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 20th June, publishes the following political ode by Narayana, its editor :—

"Why are you always oppressing us ? Why do you gag our mouths when we complain ?"

"They maltreat us, they make us fret and they wound our feelings. These tyrants are ever oppressing us."

"He is a rebel who opens his lips (to complain) and he is at once incarcerated in a prison."

"Sometimes by holding a man guilty of creating race hatred, they efface (lit.) justice and commit injustice."

"They are inventing things like plague, cholera, railways, motor-cars and telegraphs to subjugate us."

"You must have heard a good deal of the braggings of the huzurs (the English), now control yourself for the sufferers are now going to give vent to their feelings (lit. hold your hearts as men with buried hearts are going to cry)."

"They take away corn from all corners of the country, and we are dying of famine. They are proud of us and they are destroying us."

"They will raise no question if a white man kills a black one, but they are always handing over the black man to the hangman."

"You may maltreat us as much as you like, but remember, sahib, they themselves will be destroyed who are destroying us."

"One day the oppression of the innocent will be avenged. How long will they remain joyful who are making others devoid of joy ? "

"One day the twilight will dawn on the sky by the blood of the martyrs. They will be gathered to dust who are to-day oppressing (others)."

"Courage, O ! Narayana, and be not afraid. For God (Himself) helps the patriots."

SWARAJYA, 20th June 1908.

The Veharee.

29. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 20th June, reproduces the article from the Veharee (Bombay), on which the prosecution of the editor of the paper for sedition is based and remarks :—

"We are blamed, even if we sigh, (while) there is no scandal, even if they commit a murder."

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 17th June 1908.

Moderates and Extremists.

30. A correspondent in the Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 17th June, says that it is strange that Indian politicians should be divided into Moderates and Extremists in spite of there being no substantial difference between the aims and objects of the two parties—both demanding for swaraj on colonial lines. He thinks that this division is either due to the hypocracy of the leaders or to a desire on their part for self-aggrandizement, although it may be ruinous to the cause of the country. He says that hypocrites and selfish persons have never so far succeeded in making any country independent, and that it is why the leaders of the Árya Samaj urge the futility of political agitation. He goes on to say that several narrow-minded persons allege that the Árya Samaj is an obstacle in the way of the attainment of swaraj and discourage political progress of the country, but that the truth is that the Árya Samajist is not only a well-wisher of India but of all the world. The Vedas themselves enjoined a republican form of Government. How is it then possible that the Árya Samaj can be opposed to swaraj in the case of any particular country? The Árya Samaj aims at the real freedom of the country by advocating religious, social and spiritual freedom. Hypocracy and selfishness and secret murders will not give swaraj to any country. Permanent swaraj can be obtained only by coming into the fold of the catholic religious association of the Árya Samaj.

A Council of Notables.

31. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 21st June, has the following :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 21st June 1908.

"The function that will be discharged by the Council of Notables is to a certain extent foreshadowed by the letter that has been addressed to the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal by four Maharajas and the Nawab of Murshidabad about the enactment of a general law for the better control of the press. These eminent and loyal noblemen are anxious for the safety of the Empire, and in their opinion the effective muzzling of the press is the only way of preserving the Empire. They 'urge the Government of India (1) to bring in some press legislation which will be able to deal efficaciously with irresponsible, insensible pressmen, and (2) to hound out all the anarchist centres in India, for from the result in Bengal one wonders what the state of things may be in other provinces.' This language is not very dignified, but it is intended to be forcible. Has the Government ever waited for advice to introduce repressive legislation or energetic executive action? Was it on the advice of a loyal nobility that the deportations were made last year, or the Ordinance was promulgated? Emergencies are recognized by the Government quicker than by any body of noblemen in the country, and action is taken without hesitation. The signatories to the letter ought to be aware that 'hounding out centres of anarchism' is not so easy as they suppose. If the influence of the nobility is to prove of any value it should be directed to tracing out the causes of discontent and moving the Government to remove them. Lord Morley recognizes that pure repression is not possible and the aspirations of the people should be satisfied, but he is after all a statesman while our Maharajas and Nawabs have no ambition to be designated by that name."

Hindi as lingua franca of India.

32. The Mohini (Kanauj), of the 16th June, while putting in a plea for the adoption of Hindi as lingua franca of India so as to give an impetus to the new spirit in the country, notes with gratification that Shriman Shyamji Krishna Varma, has espoused the cause of Hindi in his paper, the "Indian Socialogist" and has announced that he will give a donation of one thousand rupees to open Hindi classes in Calcutta, Poona and Bombay. MOHINI, 16th June 1908.

Tuticorin Steam Navigation Company.

33: The Nágri Prachárak (Lucknow), for May, says that "the Tuticorin Steam Navigation Company will raise its capital to ten lakhs of rupees. The officials supposed that the swadeshi cause would be ruined by their firing on helpless people and oppressing those serving the country, but who can destroy what is protected by God." NAGRI PRACHARAK, May 1908.

II.—Afghanistan and Trans-Frontier.

The Frontier tribes.

34. Referring to frontier raids on Torawari and Tiarza outposts as well as to those on the frontier bodering on Peshin and Chaman, the Ánánd (Lucknow), of the 18th June, asks whether these raids are to be regarded as tokens of friendship on the part of the Afghans or as the outcome of the frontier expeditions recently undertaken. But the wonder is, the editor says, that Government does not seem to mind whether its reputation suffers or not by the frequent repetition of these raids. ANAND, 18th June 1908.

Bijnor District Courts.

35. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 16th June, complains that there is no waiting room for litigants and pleaders in the Bijnor Courts and suggests the advisability of constructing a building for the use of pleaders, &c.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 19th June 1908.

Handwriting.

36. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 19th June, complains that the summons in Hindi or Urdu, issued by the Civil and Criminal Courts, are generally illegible. The editor thinks that this is either due to the carelessness of the clerks or to the press of work in these courts.

He asks the Government to look into the matter.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 21st June 1908.

Pleaders' clerks.

37. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 21st June, referring to the recent ruling of the Calcutta High Court re Pleaders' clerks, remarks :—

"We might mention in this connection that a certain quarter of the city of Allahabad peopled by lawyers is frequented by a number of men who loiter about street crossings. Some of the leading members of this noble profession live in that quarter of the town and if they do not take early steps to remove this evil their fair name and fame are likely to suffer. The evil is not very formidable and it can be rooted out quietly and thoroughly by the united efforts of the Bench and the Bar."

MASHRIQ, 23rd June 1908.

Kishori Mohan Banerjee.

38. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 23rd June, referring to the release of Kishori Mohan Banerjee, remarks that this shows that the Government does not want to prosecute any one unjustly, and in spite of what has taken place lately, does not depart from its old traditions of even-handed justice.

ADVOCATE, 21st June 1908.

Probationary Tahsildars.

39. A correspondent of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 21st June, makes the following proposals about the pay and duties of Probationary Tahsildars :—

(a) A Probationary Tahsildar should always be placed under an English-knowing Tahsildar of approved service for training.

(b) He should be allowed to exercise the powers of a Tahsildar under the guidance of his instructor.

(c) He should, like Probationary Deputy Collectors, have his pay increased on completely passing the Departmental Examination.

(d) He should be given all the officiating appointments in the district in order that he might acquire experience.

(e) And lastly he should be given the same allowance as a Tahsildar since Probationary Deputy Collectors have the same privileges as permanent ones.

Police reform.

40. A correspondent of the Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 16th June, complains that the Government on the recommendation of the Police Commission—

(1) has abolished several grades of sub-inspectors;

(2) has made Europeans and Eurasians eligible for appointment as sub-inspectors, a post which was reserved for Indians;

(3) bestows the new post of Deputy Superintendent on raw graduates who know very little regarding detection, investigation and procedure;

(4) discourages the promotion of constables and head-constables to higher grades.

Paid Chairman for the Allahabad Municipality.

41. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 19th June, says that Indians have now begun to realize that municipalities are not independent and that they are entirely in the hands of officials as is evident by the decision of the Local Government to appoint a paid Chairman for the Allahabad Municipality in spite of the opposition from the majority of its members. The editor urges the Government not to appoint a paid Chairman, as his salary will press very heavily on the already over-taxed inhabitants of Allahabad and will embitter their feelings against the Government.

ABHYUDAYA, 19th June 1908.

The extension of Allahabad.

42. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 21st June, referring to the proposed extension of Allahabad, remarks as follows :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 21st June 1908.

"May we suggest to the Commissioner and the Collector to invite to an informal conference the leading residents in order to find out the real wishes of the people? Such an informal discussion, we may assure them, will be productive of much good. In the light of suggestions made by these gentlemen, they will be able to solve this problem in quite a satisfactory manner. It is always a wise policy to take the public into confidence. Implicit reliance on reports submitted by sub-ordinates in the ordinary course of official routine is not always the best way out of a difficulty. Local suggestion and advice may prove very helpful.

But what is our Municipality doing? Is it not concerned with this matter which so vitally affects the comfort and convenience of so many of the taxpayers? Let it show by its deeds that it is ever watchful of our interests."

The Moradabad Municipality.

43. The Union Gazette (Bareilly), in its combined issue of the 7th and 14th June, complains that the sanitary condition of the quarters occupied by the poorer people in Moradabad is very unsatisfactory, and although cholera is raging in the city, the Municipality does not take any notice of it. The editor draws the attention of the chairman to the matter.

UNION GAZETTE, 7th and 14th June 1908.

The Agra Municipality.

44. The Surma-i-Rozgár (Agra), in its combined issue of the 8th and 16th June, complains that the people of Agra are suffering very much owing to the insufficient supply of water as water can be had only for two hours in the day. But, notwithstanding, this the Municipality recovers its dues very regularly. The editor suggests that the people should be allowed to sink wells on their own account.

SURMA-I-ROZGAR, 8th and 16th June 1908.

The Muzaffarnagar Municipality.

45. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 23rd June, reports that there is only one Musalman member in the Muzaffarnagar Municipal Board, and he, too, intends to resign as he cannot protect the interests of the Musalman community of the town alone and unaided. But it is said, the editor writes, that Pandit Jawala Prasad, the Magistrate of the district, has asked him to withdraw his resignation and has promised that he would nominate some more Musalmans to be members of the Board. These facts, he says, still lack confirmation, but if they are true the Hindus, who are strongly opposed to racial representation in corporate bodies, should pass a vote of censure on the Pandit.

AL BASHIR, 23rd June 1908.

In a subsequent note the editor remarks that he is grieved to see that the Musalmans of Muzaffarnagar are suffering and do not utter a single word in protest. Is this due, he asks, to their lack of moral courage, or are they convinced that their grievances will not be redressed by the Government. Both these reasons, he says, are to be regretted.

The question of space in High Schools.

48. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 21st June, referring to the proposal to limit the number attending all classes and sections in High Schools to thirty-five, remarks that although no objections can be taken to this rule on the grounds of principle, and though it may work well in the larger districts where private effort supplements the work of the Educational department, yet in the smaller districts where there are no private schools, the less brilliant scholars will have to go without education or migrate to some other place, which very few of them can afford to do. The editor says that this question has assumed a very serious aspect at Aligarh, where it is rumoured that the names of some 300 students will be struck off the rolls of the district school at the beginning of the next session. The people of the city were contemplating the opening of a new school, but they have been desmayed by the Hoti Lal incident, and there is little hope of private enterprise coming to the assistance of the Aligarh schools. The editor asks the District Board to open a new Upper Primary School at least if it cannot afford to open a High School.

ANAND KADAMBINI, February 1908.

The swadeshi movement.

51. The Ánánd Kádambini (Mirzapur), for February (received on the 18th June), contains a poem of which the following is a literal translation :—

"Shame on him again and again who did not shed tears at seeing the constant import of foreign goods (into his country) and who did not take the vow of swadeshi.

Shame on him again and again who can do nothing to remedy the oppression that he sees committed in his country.

Shame on him again and again who forgetting the love of his nation does evil to his country for the sake of self-aggrandizement.

* * * * * * * *

Shame on that sovereign again and again who takes no remedial measures at hearing the cry for protection from his helpless subjects oppressed by misery."

HINDUSTANI, 24th June 1908.

Dairy Farms.

52. "A Swadeshi" writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 24th June, advocates the starting of dairy farms and the helping of artisans with money as the surest means of promoting the swadeshi movement.

HINDI HINDOSTHAN, 20th June 1908.

Industrial schools.

53. The Hindi Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 20th June, notes with satisfaction the decision of the United Provinces Government to open industrial schools in certain selected centres to impart instructions in weaving on improved lines and says that this will very much help in bringing about the material regeneration of India.

KAYASTHA HITKARI, 16th June 1908.

Kayasthas.

54. Various correspondents of the Kayastha Hitkari (Agra), of the 16th June, advise the prominent members of the Kayastha community to memorialize the Government or send a deputation to wait upon His Honour the Lieutenant Governor and request him to reconsider his decision about the admission of Kayasthas into Government service.

V.—Legislation.

55. The Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 16th June, notes with satisfaction the passing of the Newspapers and the Explosives Acts and remarks that it will be welcomed by the Indian press also, as it does not place any restraints on its legitimate liberties. RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 16th June 1908.

The new Acts.

The editor pronounces the Viceroy's speech on the occasion to be a masterpiece.

56. Laws, says the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 19th June, depend on those who administer them for their good or evil effects. Good officials establish peace and order with the same laws which the bad ones utilize to oppress the poor and the innocent. The same can be said to be true of the two new Acts. The provision contained in them that no action will be taken under these Acts unless permitted by Local Governments cannot afford sufficient protection, for there will be little hope of protection when Governors of the Fuller type will be at the head of any province, and may include anything they please in the definition of violence. ABHYUDAYA, 19th June 1908.

The new Acts.

57. The Abhyudaya (Allahahad), of the 19th June, says that it would have been much better if ordinances had been framed instead of the two Acts, for an ordinance usually remains in force only for six months and could be converted into an enactment if occasion arose. ABHYUDAYA, 19th June 1908.

The new Acts.

58. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 23rd June, makes the following remarks on the Explosives and Newspapers Acts :— MASHRIQ, 23rd June 1908.

The new Acts.

(1) There is only one objection to the Explosives Act. If any explosive substance is found in a man's house he will be prosecuted and the onus probandi of proving that he is entitled to possess the substance found rests on him.

(2) The Newspapers Act will not put a stop to seditious writings in newspapers, and there was no need for its enactment.

(3) Some people object that drafts of the measures were not circulated and that the Indian members of the Council were not consulted. But they can be easily answered. There was no time for consulting public opinion, and it was the fault of the Indian members if they were not present in the discussion.

(4) Lord Minto's speech was at once sincere and diplomatic.

59. The Kayastha Hitkari (Agra), of the 16th June, while referring to the agitation that is being carried on against the recent press legislation, remarks that the press does not in any country possess unrestrained license and cannot attack with impunity either private individuals or the Government. Many Indian papers have been for some time criticising in a bitter and hostile spirit all the actions of the Government and have ignored all that it did for the good of the people. It was this perverse policy of the press which has compelled the Government to put some restraint on the freedom it hitherto enjoyed, and even this the Government has done very reluctantly. KAYASTHA HITKARI, 16th June 1908.

Liberty of the press.

60. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 16th June, notes with satisfaction the passing of the Press Act and remarks that the Government has done well in giving very little authority to the Magistrate and the Police in this connection. The editor however, advises the Government to be very careful in the application of this Act, as its scope is unlimited. ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 16th June 1908.

The Press Act.

61. The editor of the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), writes in its issue of the 19th June, that he can take no objection to the enactment of the Newspapers Act except that it was framed in such indecent haste. He cannot believe that Government could not wait for even a month or two before passing this measure without making the situation all the more complicated. It is to be deplored that it did not give the public the opportunity of criticising this measure. Such proceedings on the part of Government only mean that it does not pay any attention to public opinion and never expects ABHYUDAYA, 19th June 1908.

The Newspapers Act.

it to be ever in its favour. This is a very serious political mistake for it tends to shake public confidence in Government. He says that the words "any act of violence" are too comprehensive and are likely to bring innocent persons to trouble. It is, however, some consolation that no action will be taken under this Act without the permission of Local Governments, but after what had happened in Eastern Bengal and the Punjab, one cannot expect that notwithstanding this provision, the Newspapers Act will not seriously interfere with the legitimate liberty of the press. He urges that it would have been much better if cases under this Act were tried by a Sessions Judge for the public has greater confidence in him than in a District Magistrate, and that the provision for the confiscation of the press is too harsh. It would have been more politic if for the first offence not leading to any act of violence the press were not confiscated. But as it is the number of newspapers will decline which will be equally injurious to the rulers and the ruled. It is, however, to be hoped in the end that prosecutions under this Act will be permitted only after mature deliberation, otherwise the evil which is sought to be removed will be aggravated. He does not see any necessity for the enactment of a fresh Press Act, inasmuch as the existing law together with the Newspapers Act are adequate to deal with delinquent newspapers.

MOHINI, 16th June 1908.

The Newspapers Act.

62. The Newspapers Act, says the Mohini (Kanauj), of the 16th June, is dangerous to native newspapers. Their position will be very precarious owing to the police and the magistracy being empowered to suppress them. It has been a total mistake on the part of the Government to direct the machinery of legislation against the entire native press for the fault of a few violent newspapers considering that the existence of the press is equally beneficial to Government and the people and its value will certainly be reduced by the curtailment of its liberty. Such being the case, the hurried enactment of the Newspapers Act will not be productive of good results. The adoption of a generous policy rather than that of repression is more conducive to relieve the present situation and restore order and peace.

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 16th June 1908.

The Newspapers Act.

63. The Sháhna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 16th June, referring to the passing of the Newspapers Act, remarks that it will take away the freedom of the press in India and that there was little necessity for such legislation as the Indian Penal Code was quite sufficient to deal with sedition. The Government, the editor says, will suffer the most from this Act, as it will have little opportunity of knowing the real feelings of the people and conspiracies will be hatched without its knowledge.

ANAND, 18th June 1908.

The Newspapers Act.

64. Referring to the Newspapers Act, the Ánánd (Lucknow), of the 18th June, remarks that it will do no harm, provided all newspapers feel its weight. But this is not to be the case. The Asian, the Englishman, and the Civil and Military Gazette have transgressed all bounds of violence and if these papers had received even a warning, no one would have questioned the validity of this repression. It remains to be seen whether a warning is given to them even now.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 23rd June 1908.

Railways in Agra.

65. The Násim-i-Agra, of the 23rd June, complains that passengers intending to travel by the metre gauge line are put to much trouble by the shunting of goods trains at the Agra Fort Station in the morning, which necessitates the level-crossing gates near the station being closed. The editor suggests that the shunting should be done on the other side of the station. He, moreover, complains that there are big holes in the compound of the station.

In a subsequent article he complains that although the city is intersected by railways, there is no arrangement by which people can go from one part of the city to another by rail. He asks the Railway Companies to make arrangements by which this grievance of the people may be removed.

I.—Politics.

(a)—Foreign.

1. The Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 24th June, referring to the rumour that the visit of the King-Emperor to the Czar will have much influence on the Macedonian question, remarks that England and Russia cannot do anything unless they are backed up by the other European powers.

Russia, England and Turkey.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 24th June 1908.

(b)—Home.

2. A special correspondent of the Bháratbási (Allahabad), writing in its issue of the 23rd June, enumerates the various searches that were made at Agra and expresses astonishment that such loyal subjects of the Government as Babu Parshadi Lal Tandon, Kunwar Kanhaiya Singh and Lala Jaswant Rai should have been suspected of having any dealings with Hoti Lal Varma in connection with the bomb incident. He questions the validity of the search of the house of the father of Babu Parshadi Lal, who lives in a separate house from his son and for the search of which a warrant was not obtained. It is alleged, he says, that the houses of those persons were searched whose names were found entered in a diary recovered from the possession of Hoti Lal Varma. It is to be deplored that the officials searched these gentlemen's houses without verifying their connection with Hoti Lal Varma. It is said that Jaswant Rai mentioned in that diary is not Lala Jaswant Rai of Agra but the person of the same name of Lahore who is the proprietor of the Punjabee and who paid Rs. 20 to Hoti Lal for being a correspondent of that paper. He remarks, in conclusion, that it would have been much better if only a warning had been given to the suspects in Agra and no searches had been undertaken. The officials should act more wisely in future in the interest of good relations between the rulers and the ruled.

BHARATBASI, 23rd June 1908.

3. The Union Gazette (Bareilly), in its combined issue of the 21st and 28th June, referring to the expulsion of a student from the Aligarh Collegiate for contributing a seditious article to the Urdu-i-Mualla (Aligarh), remarks that this act will mar the national spirit of the College and will diminish the regard of the students for their alma mater. The editor thinks that some other mode of punishment ought to have been resorted to.

UNION GAZETTE, 21st and 28th June 1908.

4. Referring to the rustication of a student of the Aligarh College for contributing an article to the Urdu-i-Mualla on the educational policy of the English in Egypt, the Tafrih (Lucknow), of the 28th June, remarks that it is very unfair to prevent one from giving expression to what he thinks to be true and to punish him for doing so when everybody is entitled to express his independent views.

The Aligarh College.

TAFRIH, 28th June 1908.

5. The following is from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 28th June :—

Excitement at Aligarh.

ADVOCATE, 28th June 1908.

"Hoti Lal's arrest and trial had not caused so much surprise in the province as the indiscriminate searches at Agra and Aligarh. Because Hoti Lal has given out the names of certain persons as his friends : are all these persons to be disgraced and humiliated by the police ? From Aligarh we learn that searches have been made into the interior of the district, Árya Samajists have received special attention, the students of the Vedic Ashram built by Árya Samajists as a hostel have been harassed. There must be some end to these proceedings. By all means hunt down seditionists. But why should on mere suspicion otherwise respectable people be harassed and their feelings embittered ? And what is the police searching ? It is said some seditious leaflets which Hoti Lal is suspected to have distributed at Aligarh. Well, the leaflet was not any revealed book that young men should have preserved it to learn by rote in their houses. If some copies are lying concealed in some corners of Aligarh, why should the police be nervous about it ? The expert on explosives has deposed before the District Magistrate that a paper found with Hoti Lal contained a recipè of bomb-making ; the publisher of Bande Mataram has deposed to having received a telegram from Aligarh from Hoti Lal. The case for prosecution was to close on Thursday last and it is said that Hoti Lal has not much defence to offer."

HINDUSTANI, 1st July 1908.

Excitement at Aligarh.

6. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 1st July, reproduces a translation of the article in the Advocate, of the 28th June, on the excitement at Aligarh.

ADVOCATE, 21st June 1908.

Appeal for Mr. Arabinda Ghosh.

7. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 21st June, the Tafrih (Lucknow), of the 28th June, the Arya Mitra (Agra), of the 24th June, and other vernacular papers publish the appeal issued by Mr. Arabinda Ghosh's sister on his behalf.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 24th June 1908.

Government and the Bengali anarchists.

8. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 24th June, referring to the spread of anarchism in Bengal, remarks that it is due to a grave error on the part of the Government in allowing the Bengalis to carry on agitation against its very existence with impunity. The editor is of opinion that if during Lord Curzon's time stringent measures had been adopted to crush agitation, such atrocities as are being enacted in Bengal would have never been even dreamed of. It is the unflinching loyalty of the Musalmans, he says, which keeps them from breaking forth into open rebellion. He thinks that it is sheer folly on the part of the Bengalis to dream that liberty can be attained by the use of bombs, as it can only be attained by centuries of earnest work and waiting. In the end he controverts Mr. H. Hyndman's views on the present situation in India, and concludes by saying that a little alteration in the land revenue system will do away with the unrest if there is any.

ADVOCATE, 28th June 1908.

The Calcutta sensation.

9. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 28th June, has the following :—

"The promised sensation in the bomb outrage case has come in the shape of Norendro Gossain, approver's evidence. The statement appears to have been followed by numerous arrests. We think the Bengal police has acted very injudiciously in searching houses of respectable persons and arresting a number of zamindars on the uncorroborated statement of the approver. These proceedings may terrorize a few evil-doers but will surely produce a feeling of indignation at the humiliation and disgrace of respectable persons. Lieutenant-Colonel Nandi's son has been arrested because his three fingers were missing, which the retired Surgeon says can be easily explained. The Raja of Ambicanagore, the Paishkar of the Magistrate of Rungpur, and Babu Monoranjan Guha, have been arrested. Such proceedings alienate popular sympathy from State prosecutions. Great caution has to be taken at this juncture, as it is possible that indiscriminate laying of hands on people without any regard for their respectability and antecedents and refusal to grant bail even when there is not much evidence against the accused, might create a bitterness which ought to be prevented."

NAGRI PRACHARAK, May 1908.

The present situation.

10. The Nagri Prachárak (Lucknow), for May, contains the following under the heading "Topic of The Day" :—

"Very difficult times have come,—difficult because a quarrel has ensued between the lion and the goat. What was impossible, appears now to be possible. Is it true that helpless Indians who have long been loyal (to the Government) are to-day ready to oppose the British Lion! Although it is an incredible fact, yet one cannot deny it in view of the events that have been taking place (for some time past). The other day a well-known loyal Pandit said to me: 'Have the inhabitants of this country turned mad? What are they doing? Can the strong current of a river be stemmed by a bundle of straw? Through constant pressure, the very individuality of this nation will become extinct some day or other, what do you think?'

I said in reply: 'Leave aside this question and tell me what they [English (?)] are doing? Why is it not possible that sedition should make its appearance here when there is so much treachery to the motherland, so many domestic feuds, so many mutual differences, so much disunion, so much ignorance, so much selfishness and such a diversity of races in this country? Why are they then committing such arbitrary acts of repression, retaliation, coercion and harshness? Is there not an individual amongst all this white race inebreviated with the pride of power and so wise that he could open the eyes of all and calm them by driving away the delusion of mistaking a piece of cord for a serpent? When they have got such a strong footing (in the country) why are they startled like children at the dreams of rebellion ?'

That learned Pandit wanted to prove by various arguments that we ourselves were to blame, but he could neither give a proper answer to our question nor could he establish our fault. At last it was decided that if Providence had not so ordained it, it was not only difficult but quite impossible that this (almost) dead nation could have been awakened. This is why such things have been taking place here. Call it the swadeshi movement or an attempt at self-improvement or the means of procuring two handfuls of grain—it all would otherwise have been done away with long ago through the constant efforts of the enemies of the country. But who are they that have kept it alive ? The same insensible Englishmen who are afraid of the plans of (mere) boys. It is what indicates that good days are approaching. . . . . We, day and night, look upon the doings of the English with astonishment and wonder as to what has taken place ? The editors of the Punjabee and other journals were punished severely, Lala Lajpat Rai and Ajit Singh were deported, Bhupendra Nath, Bepin Chandra and other respectable gentlemen went to jail —all this is nothing. Inhuman repression and oppression was practised in the Punjab. (People) were fired at in Madras, Tuticorin and Tinnevelly and arrests are still going on—that is also nothing. Shushil Kumar, a boy of fifteen years of age, endured with a cheerful countenance stripes such as are only inflicted on ordinary criminals—that is also nothing. We, day and night, only wonder what is all this that has taken place. A war between the lion and the sheep has long been considered in the world to be an impossibility. Why such a war is now taking place in India is a question that requires to be answered. People say what is impossible in this world ? There have always been constant changes in the physical as well as in the moral aspect of the world . . . . . There is thus nothing impossible in this world. The sheep can become the lion in course of time. That is our opinion. But others say that subjection for eight hundred years has made brutes of the inhabitants of this country ; their awakening is altogether impossible. What little was left of manliness in India was crushed by eight hundred years of various kinds of oppression. Where is there now any hope of progress or salvation for this country ? But wise men ask how was the pride of the indomitable King, Bali, the oppression of the dreadful Hiranya Kaship and the tyranny of the proud Rawan over Sita crushed ? Our Shastras loudly proclaim that God descends upon earth for making possible what is an impossibility. This is what the world constantly sees. The incarnations of Krishna, Ram, Christ, Buddha and Muhammad are not false and mere figures of imagination. Doubtless we repeat again and again that they have surely no discriminating faculty who regard the present events as due to human agency. Those who will unhesitatingly consider all this to be a divine dispensation, seeing the victory of the unselfish religion with a tranquil mind, will be filled with the love of God and will say that solitude and companionship, prosperity and adversity, beds of flowers and of thorns, embraces and blows are all given by God without our asking for them. To be inspired with joy or fear for what is our destiny is futile. They say that home and jail equally belong to the same being. If God were to kill us who can be our protector and who can kill us if He is our protector ? Those who are engaged in their work under divine inspiration cannot be led astray from their (path of) duty by any conditions of the world.

Who is afraid ? He who has not an independent mind, and he who, moved by selfishness, considers this life, fickle and unstable as it is, like a drop of water on a lotus leaf, and this unsubstantial world to be everlasting. He is afraid who has been enervated by sin and anxiety, who is indulging in all sorts of luxury and who has not been able to realize, even now the importance of altruism. He who is a philosopher takes the whole world to be Brahma, the soul to be eternal and life to be a bubble of water. He who is a humanitarian is always fearless. He has subdued the world and realized God. He is always generous and he is immortal. He regards all conditions (of life) to be in accordance with a divine decree. Realizing the ever-changing character of the world, he does not lose his self in joy and sorrow. He sees, like Prahlad, God present everywhere and thinks himself blessed, and is not upset by the oppression of tyrants. Your Puranas declare that he who wants to slay the devotees of God is himself destroyed. Where are those to-day who killed Christ . . . . . Brethren? Those who write history, themselves forget the lessons it teaches. Had it not been so, there would have been neither degeneration nor regeneration in the world. A moth before being burnt to death in a flame cannot understand that it is the means of its own destruction. Innumerable persons die daily yet we take no lesson. That is why we are intoxicated with the enjoyment of pleasures. While one home is being convulsed with sorrow and lamentations, another resounds with mirth and revelry. One person is being deprived of his life while another is enjoying himself to his best. Those who take delight in seeing others executed do not know that their heads, too, are liable to be decapitated some day. Alas, Aurangzeb! Alas, Cæsar! and Alas, Napolean! who can fathom the deep mysteries of inscrutable human destiny? Who does not know the history of the English? They [the English (?)] have forgotten their history more than any one else. They think that they will lead a comfortable life in this way for ever. It is truly said that a happy man cannot realize the sufferings of a distressed brother. Particularly how can those who have been given to indulgence in luxuries at the expense of other men's riches, sympathize with others in their miseries, for that would decrease their own happiness? Why are they thinking of raising a statue to Clive? How did Clive acquire the empire? Who does not know that story? But the English who glory in politics feel no shame at reviewing that long-forgotten episode. A memorial pillar has been erected at Plassey. A pillar has been raised to commemorate the supposed Black Hole Tragedy. Now an attempt has been made to raise a memorial to Clive. The Muhammadans cannot understand their cleverness even in these days of deceit in preserving the memory of the Muhammadan victory (or of the victory over the Muhammadans). Their hearts (lit. they) are melted at hearing a few sweet words even after suffering hundreds of kicks. These days history is being disregarded everywhere. If it were not so how would this country awaken? It seems that all these unthought of events are taking place only to awaken this country."

Unrest in India.

11. The Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 23rd June, says that the poverty of Indians is the chief cause of the unrest in the country and that it has been aggravated by the present repressive policy of the Government. The editor is of opinion that the discontent prevailing in the country could very easily be removed if the rulers were to adopt a policy of reconciliation and govern India in the interests of its inhabitants. Mildness on the part of the Government will never be construed as inspired through fear, but will be regarded in the light of that generosity and kindness which is shown by the strong towards the weak.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 24th June 1908.

The present situation.

12. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 24th June, is at a loss to understand why Hindus and Muhammadans alike should be holding public meetings in connection with the bomb incident. Will the Anglo-Indians, the editor asks, believe their professions if they will but loudly proclaim them? He goes on to say that an Anglo-Indian newspaper noted that an Indian should be regarded a disloyal subject until he adduced some substantial proof of his loyalty, and remarks that although the authorities avoid making such absurd declarations, yet they seem to share the same sentiment to some extent. But are they not right in their opinion? He thinks that they are. The oppression, he continues, which some of the Europeans are practising upon Indians, has created a panic among Europeans. Millions of the Indian masses are fast asleep and are quite ignorant as to what politics, swaraj or political rights mean. Still, their white rulers dream of their secret societies and are unable to enjoy a sound sleep.

ANAND, 25th June 1908.

The present situation.

13. The Ánand (Lucknow), of the 25th June, says that no good can be expected from the struggle which is at present going on between the Government and the people. The editor suggests that Indians will do better to give up their political agitation and reform the internal condition of the country, while, on the other hand, Government, instead of increasing the number of members of the Legislative Councils, should grant people substantial concessions, e.g. throw important administrative posts open to them.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 1st July 1908.

Government and the present situation.

14. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 1st July, says that the appearance of the anarchist on Indian soil has compelled Government to resort to fresh legislation in order to maintain its prestige. But in view of the fact that the solidarity of Government has been firmly established in India, it would be better if the Government adopted a policy of royal forgiveness and generosity, for repressive measures and legislation cannot strengthen the hands of any Government: on the contrary, it is possible that such measures may emphasise the already existing bitterness and irritation. The editor says he does not mean that the Detective department should be neglected, that public meetings should not be prohibited, and that seditious newspapers should be allowed to go scot free. All that he means is that everything should be done with prudence and after due consideration.

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 24th May to 14th June 1908.

Government and the unrest.

15. The Awaza-i-Khálq (Benares), in its combined issue of the 24th May to 14th June, has the following :—

"No doubt every sane man will agree that if the offence is proved against them, the perpetrators of the bomb outrage and the persons suspected of complicity in their actions must be severely dealt with. But statesmanship demands that the origin of this new method of political agitation should be thoroughly studied and that the causes which favour its growth should be removed."

In the opinion of the editor the following are some of the important causes to which the anarchist owes his existence in India :—

1. The Liberal ministry has altogether belied its professions and has frustrated the high hopes of Indians.

2. The unscrupulous support which a highly corrupt police in India receives from the authorities has emboldened it to commit acts calculated to set the people against Government.

3. The whipping of the students in Bengal, the incarceration of the editors, the muzzling of the press—all this has exasperated the people and compelled them to resort to violent methods of political agitation.

4. The want of cordial and social relations between Europeans and Indians and the disregard of the claims of educated Indians for high posts.

5. The weakness of the Government in its frontier policy, especially in its relations with the Amir of Kabul. If Government removes these causes of bitterness and irritation the present unrest would cease to exist in a short time.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 24th June 1908.

Lord Morley on the Indian situation.

16. Referring to Lord Morley's speech at the Annual Indian Civil Service dinner, the Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 24th June, remarks that it was a hope-inspiring speech and quite contrary to his former utterances on the Indian situation. Lord Morley will lay Indian leaders under a deep obligation to himself if he is fortunate enough to translate his hopeful words into equally beneficial actions. It is, however, a mystery how his thoughts have undergone such a radical change.

CITIZEN, 28th June 1908.

Lord Morley on the present situation.

17. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 28th June, contains the following :—

"Lord Morley, writes a contemporary, looking at the situation in India could not but be struck with what he called 'the rather painful fact of a certain estrangement and alienation between the races in India.' He was somewhat rudely interrupted by cries of 'no' from a body of men who had helped or were still helping to carry on the administration of this country and many of whom had already spent the best years of their lives here. The fact of a certain estrangement and alienation between the ruling race and the ruled cannot be denied, and he who does deny it betrays only his ignorance. What are we to think, then, of the members of the Indian Civil Service, present and past, who did so? Are they blind to an obvious fact, or do they ostrichwise, bury their heads in the sand and will not see what is face to face with them? Lord Morley, however, was not to be put down, but told his hearers that it was idle to deny that there was a living movement among the people of India for objects which Englishmen themselves had taught them were desirable. That Lord Morley has herein correctly gauged the situation and described it accurately is superfluous on our part to point out. How blind are the men who fail to see that the inevitable effect of Western education is to create aspirations for a wider national life and greater freedom. One may as well carefully water a plant and manure it and expect it not to grow and put forth leaves and blossoms."

OUDH AKHBAR, 29th June 1908.

Lord Morley's speech.

18. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 29th June, referring to Lord Morley's speech at the Indian Civil Service dinner, remarks that the race hatred, to which he alluded, does not exist in India, unless the agitation for self-government can be construed into such hatred. Referring to his remark that reforms will be introduced when the agitation has subsided, the editor expresses the opinion that the agitation will not subside until the reforms are introduced.

OUDH AKHBAR, 27th June 1908.

Sir B. Fuller on Indian policy.

19. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 27th June, while reviewing Sir B. Fuller's letter to the Times (London), on the present situation in India, remarks that Sir B. Fuller is wrong in thinking that the Government is not feared as its policy is not repressive. The Government has sufficiently indulged in repression, but repression has served no useful end, as the agitation has persistently increased. Sir B. Fuller, the editor thinks, is chagrined as his policy was not adopted by the Government and so he had to resign. The release of Lala Lajpat Rai and Ajit Singh did not in any way weaken the position of the Government, as Sir B. Fuller thinks, but impressed upon the people the idea that the Government was humane and generous. With reference to his remarks that the agitation in India was due to the English education imparted to Indians, the editor remarks that Indians studied English as they were assured in the Queen's Proclamation of 1857 that all posts would be open to them if they had the requisite attainments. This solemn promise has not been kept, and hence the unrest among the educated classes.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 24th June 1908.

The Arya Samaj and politics.

20. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 24th June, writes :—

"Now-a-days while the Muhammadans on the one hand are trying to make out the Árya Samaj to be a political body, agnostic Hindus on the other warn the leaders of the Árya Samaj against exhorting the Árya Samaj public to keep aloof from politics. Against all these, Árya Samaj writers are trying to prove that the Árya Samaj is not a political body. 'I' in reply to agnostic Hindus, say that the Árya Samaj is what it is. Those who are true Áryas do not care what views particular officials of the Government entertain about them. Death comes only once; what death can then be superior to that suffered while fulfilling the obligations of one's religion? But these Áryas do not like to become dolls in the hands of agnostic Hindus. They are prepared to bear all sorts of troubles for the ideal which Swami Dayanand has placed before them of establishing unity in religion, by sweeping away all the diversity of languages, of education and of manners and customs in the propagation of the catholic Vedic religion. However, they do not like to be made tools in the hands of either Moderates or Extremists or of any other party. The chief object of the Árya Samaj is to produce good, pious and exemplary personages. If the Muhammadans or Christians or followers of any other creed look upon this mission as directed against them, or if the officials taking this aim of the Árya Samaj as injurious to their position, become its enemies, this must be the answer of a true Árya 'wise men do not deviate a step from the right path, although they may have to die to-day or after a full cycle of time.'"

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 24th June 1908.

The Arya Samaj and Government.

21. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 24th June, writes :—

"The Rajputs in their eagerness to flatter the English, used to call them incarnations of God. But no sooner did they see the British Government taking the Rajput college under its complete control than they bestirred themselves and are now making stirring appeals for the opening of a new independent college for their own use.

The Government has brought the Khalsa College, too, under its entire control, and consequently the Sikh gentleman who declared on behalf of Guru Gobind Singh that the raising of Sikh regiments was only to help the English, has now aroused himself and is most earnestly calling upon his brethren to open a new independent college. Lala Lajpat Rai, too, is now trying to get the Dayanand

Anglo-Vedic College out of the control of the Government. All these incidents indicate in which direction the wind blows. Will these communities now admit the wisdom of the founders of the gurukul? Do not the signs of the times point to the Arya Samaj as the sole maker of the present history of India? This being the case, what wonder if the officials in their perplexity should level unfounded accusations against the Arya Samaj.

Muhammadans and the anarchist movement.

MUFID-I-AM, 20th June 1908.

22. Referring to the various attempts made by the anarchists on the life of Anglo-Indian officials, a correspondent writing to the Mufid-i-Am (Agra), of the 20th June, remarks :—

"Such are the deeds of those Bengalis whose strength was said to lie not in the sword but in the pen.

Although the recognized organs of the Indian National Congress have tried to disassociate themselves from the anarchist propaganda, yet it is not difficult to find out their real sentiments from what has appeared from time to time in their columns.

There may be some justification if the Hindus, who as a class are suspected, hold meetings to express their horror and indignation at the Muzaffarpur outrage and the bomb discoveries, but if the Muhammadans, whose loyalty has been always above suspicion and whose national existence depends upon the permanence of British rule in India and upon their complete isolation from the Hindus, commit themselves to any such course of action, their conduct must be held unjustifiable. It is now pretty clear that association with Hindus can be of no use to the Musalmans whatever. No one, therefore, can suspect us of any sympathy with their movement. Consequently we should refrain from making a show of our loyalty. The British Government is not 'such a soft morsel as to be swallowed like rice, by the Bengalis. Nevertheless, we should pause and consider how this new policy of Bengalis affects us. We recommend this question for the consideration of the All-India Moslem League."

Commenting upon the above article the editor remarks that he cannot agree with his correspondent when he says that it is not necessary for Muhammadans to hold public meetings to express their horror and indignation at the anarchist movement. He has full sympathy with the rest of the article.

Indian Moslems and politics.

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 24th June 1908.

23. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 24th June, has the following :—

"Certain aspects of the present condition of India suggest the question whether ultimately the effect of Western education on Muhammadans will be any different from what it has been in the case of other sections of the Indian population. The late Sir Syed Ahmed saw the question looming in the distance and answered it by prophesying that the pernicious influences which seemed so active throughout the country could not possibly find a home in his College. But what enabled the Syed to be so confident? This is the answer. He knew that Islam forbade its adherents to take up arms against their rulers, as long as their property and religious liberty were intact. The present rulers of India have never interfered with the religion of any section of its population, and as long as this policy continues to be acted on, Muhammadans are forbidden to raise a finger against them. Besides, the past history of Islam cannot be blotted out. At its very birth in Arabia, its followers were obliged to take refuge in Abyssinia under a Christian Monarch. In Cicily, Muhammadans lived under their Christian rulers in peace, and in Spain they were content to suffer even persecution, when it was once clear to them that the days of their power were gone by. In all ages Muhammadans have been a patient and a law-abiding people, after Providence has once made their destiny clear to them. Under Christian and Buddhist rulers, they continue equally loyal and contented to-day. 'It was, therefore, a knowledge of the character and the past history of Islam which made the late Sir Syed so confident in his prophecy as to the future of his College. He knew that Islam would live, and that its history would continue to repeat itself in India. The goal before the Muhammadans of this country is education and nothing else. But progress in this cannot possibly make them politically unrestful. The essential condition, however, of their permanently escaping the surrounding contagion, is that their education should never be divorced from Islam. Western education on the basis of a sound religious training, was the ideal of those who founded the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College. It was the consciousness of the existence of this ideal which made the Syed so confident in his prophecy. The practical results of this ideal are to-day clearly visible. The young men brought up at Aligarh can never break through the training which they have received. And they know that it constitutes for them a veritable haven of safety in the midst of the multifarious difficulties and dangers wherewith they are begirt in these unsettled times.

SWADESH BANDHAVA, June 1908.

Hindi as lingua franca of India.

24. The Swadesh Bándhava (Agra), for June, says that Mr. Shyamji Krishna Varma has written a good article in his journal advocating the adoption of Hindi as the lingua franca of India and has given a donation of Rs. 1,000 towards the promotion of the use of Hindi.

SWARAJYA, 27th June 1908.

Commercial relations between Japan and India.

25. The trade of Japan with India, says the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 27th June, is increasing every day, and the wonder of it all is that in spite of being manufactured in foreign countries, imported goods are obtainable at a cheaper rate than indigenous ones.

The more we reflect upon this, says the editor, the more we become sure that our own benevolent Government is responsible for this result. The Indian manufacturer labours under such heavy taxation and disabilities that he cannot withstand foreign competition. Indians should, therefore, realize their own responsibility and strengthen the cause of the economic regeneration of their country by sticking to their swadeshi and boycott vows.

ADVOCATE, 28th June 1908.

The Imperial Cadet Corps.

26. The following extract is from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 28th June :—

"Lord Curzon's institutions, introduced in India with great flourish, are, one after another, coming into disrepute and naturally falling into disuse. When the Cadet Corps was founded, we were told it would open a door to one form of Indian ambition which had so long remained closed. A military career to deserving sons and relatives of Indian ruling Princes and Chiefs was thus opened. After being trained in that body, the qualified man would be given a commission in the regular army. After a few years it was given out that the passed candidate could be attached to a regular regiment in order to do orderly work and run on such other errands of the officer in command but could not expect to get any commission. At once the charm that was round the scheme fell off like the scale of a snake; the parties interested in it lost all love for it. For want of intending cadets from the ranks for which the corps was intended, the field of choice has been widened and sons and relatives of Taluqdars and high officials in Native States are now invited—mark the word—to join the body for military training. And what will they do afterwards? Why, become orderlys to British officers of the Indian Army. Thus, have the rulers begun in this matter—to use Lord Lytton's words,—'breaking to the heart the words of promise they had uttered to the ear,' and that so soon."

RAHBAR, 7th June 1908.

Indians and Europeans.

27. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 7th June, referring to the acquittal of a European soldier charged with the murder of an Indian, remarks that it would be much better if the Government were to frame a new law in this connection, so that the press may not criticise its actions, and white people may not be dragged into courts.

MUSAFIR, 15th and 23rd June 1908.

Indians and Europeans.

28. The Musáfir (Agra), in its combined issue of the 15th and 23rd June, referring to the acquittal of a European soldier named Rogers, who was charged with the murder of an ekkawala, remarks that as the Hindus believe in untimely death [fatalism (?)], it is useless for them to prosecute persons like Rogers. It was ordained by fate that the ekkawala should die, and he has died; Rogers was a mere instrument. He should get some monetary compensation, the editor remarks for the mental worry and anguish he has suffered by being dragged into court.

MUSAFIR, 15th and 23rd June 1908.

29. The Musáfir (Agra), in its combined issue of the 15th and 23rd June, suggests the advisability of changing the sentence of death passed on Khudi Ram Bose into one of penal servitude for life as he is young and inexperienced. The editor thinks that if this were done it would enhance British prestige, instead of lowering it in the eyes of the people.

Khudi Ram Bose.

BHARATBASI, 23rd June 1908.

30. The Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 23rd June, says that the vindication of the dignity of the law would in no way be incomplete if the sentence of death passed on Khudi Ram Bose were commuted into one of transportation for life, in view of the fact that he has had fits of insanity more than once and his behaviour throughout the trial was anything but that of a man in his senses.

Khudi Ram Bose.

OUDH AKHBAR, 27th June 1908.

31. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 27th June, reproduces an article from another newspaper in which the writer advises the Viceroy to change the sentence of capital punishment passed on Khudi Ram Bose into one of transportation for life, for if he is put to death, he may be transformed into a popular hero or martyr.

SWARAJYA, 27th June 1908.

32. A supplement dated the 26th June to the Swarájya, of the 27th idem, contains the following on the arrest of Mr. B. G. Tilak :—

Arrest of Mr. B. G. Tilak.

"God knows what wonders the panic-stricken and bewildered officials may not work out through their imprudence and shortsightedness and what calamities and sufferings they may not inflict on their Empire and their helpless subjects."

MASHRIQ, 30th June 1908.

33. Referring to the prosecution of Maulvi Fazl-ul-Hassan for publishing inflammatory articles in the Urdu-i-Mualla, the Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 30th June, remarks :—

Newspaper prosecution in the United Provinces.

"We note with regret and alarm the adoption of a repressive policy by the Government of Sir John Hewett. It is yet possible to save the situation if prosecutions are given up and a policy of forgiveness is adopted. Prosecutions are of no avail. On the contrary they do a good deal of harm both to Government and the people. Saiyid Fazl-ul-Hassan should be simply warned, and if he is a sensible man, he should realize that if he cannot put forth his demands in a moderate way, extremism, too, cannot bear fruit."

ADVOCATE, 2nd July 1908.

34. This sudden activity against the Vernacular press of the country and the stern attitude of the executive, says the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd July, has caused surprise to the people. But to those who have been watching the course of events during the last six months it was patent that this process of repression was to come sooner or later and that the press would be the first to experience the steel of repression. The Government is under the impression that much of the unrest is the result of the seditious writings of a section of the press, and it must be admitted that a section of the press became so desperate as to forget the limitations under which the press in India can be conducted. There was thus an open rupture between the Government and this section of the press.

The press prosecutions.

The editor then says "these prosecutions, as is natural, create a deal of bitterness and incite racial feeling, and it is here that the Government has to take precaution. We admit that some newspapers exceed the bounds of lawful criticism. But are these newspapers to be found only in the ranks of the Vernacular press? Is not a section of the English press responsible for a deal of abuse and vituperation of the Indians? Then why should not the Government arraign newspapers of the type of the Englishman and the Asian along with the rabid vernacular newspapers? Both deserve the strongest possible condemnation. Much of the racial feeling out of these prosecutions could be removed, if along with Vernacular newspapers that are said to be guilty of fomenting hatred against Europeans and inciting contempt against the Government, some of those Anglo-Indian newspapers are also prosecuted which are guilty of fomenting hatred of Englishmen against educated Indians. The Government of Bombay in prosecuting the two Poona papers would not have lost anything had it instructed the public prosecutor not to oppose the applications for bail, because Mr. Tilak was not likely to abscond. And had he done so, he would have inflicted on himself greater punishment than what a court of law could inflict on him. It was not graceful on the part of the Bombay Government to have moved the High Court that the Kal case should not go before a common jury and that a special jury should be called for it. Now the majority in the special jury list are Europeans. If at the trial, there is a difference of opinion and the majority of the jurors consisting of Europeans vote on one side and the minority of Indians on the other, the fact will lead to another outbreak of racial feeling. We know the situation is very difficult, but we also believe that the Government is not nervous; it is strong and it can dispassionately deal with the prosecutions while jealous of guarding its reputation for justice and fair-mindedness. The way to obtain the moral support of the country in its campaign against sedition lies through its seeing that no cause is given for fanning racial bitterness."

Trivandrum riots.

35. The Musáfir (Agra), in its combined issue of the 15th and 23rd June, referring to the riots in Trivandrum, remarks that the fate of the rioters will be just the same as that of those of Tinnevelly, but the police will not be taken to task for their tyranny. If the Government can free the people from the tyranny of the police, the editor remarks, the incidence of crime will be reduced by half.

ZAMANA, May 1908.

Public health in the United Provinces.

36. The Zamána (Cawnpore), for May (received on the 26th June), publishes an article entitled "Public Health in the United Provinces" by Munshi Ganga Prasad Varma, editor of the Advocate and the Hindustani (Lucknow). He reviews in detail the sanitary condition of these provinces, and shows, by statistics, that the rate of mortality is higher in these provinces than in any other part of India. He makes the following remarks on the present state of affairs :—

(1) Fever is mostly caused by the existence of mosquitoes near water-pipes, so the drainage systems of large towns, such as Lucknow and Benares, should be improved.

(2) Narrow roads in congested areas should be widened and model houses for the poor should be constructed.

(3) As municipalities cannot afford to effect these improvements, Government should cut short its railway programme and spend more money on schemes for the peoples' health.

(4) The excise and income taxes, if necessary, should be made over to municipalities for spending on sanitary improvements.

(5) The Government should advance loans to municipalities on easy terms.

VYAPARI AND KARIGAR, 15th June 1908.

The octroi system in Benares.

37. The Vyápári and Kárigar (Benares), of the 15th June, publishes a letter from Mr. G. S. Arundale in which he urges that in the interests of trade and public convenience the octroi duties charged on goods coming to Benares by rail should be realized along with the railway fare as is done in Cawnpore. The editor in a note supports the suggestion and advises the readers of his paper to address a memorial to the Government on the subject.

ABHYUDAYA, 26th June 1908.

The Agra Municipality.

38. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 26th June, referring to the memorial which has been submitted to Sir John Hewett by the trading community of Agra regarding the restrictions imposed by the Municipal Board on local trade, expresses a hope that His Honour will favourably consider the grievances as laid down in the memorial and will take early steps to redress them.

39. In order to make vaccination more popular, a correspondent to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 1st July, makes the following suggestions:— HINDUSTANI, 1st July 1908.

Vaccination department.

"1. Every headman of the village and member of the municipality should be held responsible for getting children vaccinated in the areas for which they are responsible.

2. The merit of vaccinators should not be judged by the number of persons vaccinated, for this leads to dishonest practices.

3. Lymph should be brought direct from the dépôts where it is stored.

4. Vaccinators should also look to the sanitary arrangement of their halqas and should be provided with medicines for diarrhoea, dysentery and cholera for free distribution among the people.

5. The pay of vaccinators and assistant superintendents should be increased so that they may not do their work half-heartedly."

(e)—Education.

40. The Swadesh Bándhava (Agra), for June, says that times being very hard, general education and service will not suffice to sustain Indians in the struggle for existence. The editor suggests that Indians should now turn their attention to manual work and try to follow independent professions. SWADESH BANDHAVA, June 1908.

Industrial education.

41. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 27th June, reproduces an article on national education by Lala Hardayal of Panjab from the Hindustan (Lahore). SWARAJYA, 27th June 1908.

National education.

42. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd July, notes the most important changes that occur in the curriculum for the session that begins on the 8th instant (published in the last issue of the Government Gazette) in connection with science teaching and manual training and remarks that this is a move in the right direction as it aims at developing powers of observation and comparison, and at training the hand to work with the eye. ADVOCATE, 2nd July 1908.

The curriculum of Anglo-Vernacular Schools.

The editor says that considering "the importance from the educational as well as from the utilitarian standpoint, of drawing, manual training and science, we very much regret the introduction of the troublesome word or between these which should have been linked together by and, instead of three parallel subjects of which only one was to be studied, we would have been glad to see them forged into an indissoluble chain for the brain, the hand and the eye to work together in order to create in our boys "the cultured mind, the skilful hand." For to separate drawing from brush work is basing a distinction on the tool by which some work is performed. Whether you use pencil or brush, you do one and the same work. And in manual training drawing, particularly with the pencil, is of prime importance."

He says that one great defect in our school curriculum is that it is altogether out of touch with the world; and as it were, takes a child away from his natural and ordinary environments, transplants him in a soil, if not uncongenial, at least foreign to him, stuffs him with unsystematised and therefore empirical knowledge that has little bearing upon his present condition and is in ill-accord with his surroundings. To give a scientific turn of mind, the great thing is to rouse interest and instill enthusiasm. This can best be done by drawing attention to events that take place around us and trying to connect them with their causes. And what is the most interesting thing about a man but the weather, the great regulator of mankind in every soil and in every clime?

He expresses gratification on the introduction of manual training and observes that Mr. C. F. de la Fosse has taken care to point out that "manual training is purely educational work and does not aim at trade instruction, i.e. at direct preparation for some special craft."

The editor suggests that it would be well perhaps to send at least two teachers, who know drawing and woodwork, to Mysore to see the Sloyd system introduced there by Mr. Larsson, of America, and to make a beginning with it as the preliminary stage of manual training.

As to other subjects, he says 'we are sorry object lessons are still left in an unsatisfactory state. Broad indications might easily be given to headmasters to select the objects of every day life according to some system. Man's immediate needs may be the central idea and so lessons on things used for food and raiment, dwellings and locomotion, may be woven round it to make a systematised whole. We would much like to see the direct method of teaching English introduced in our schools which of course is only possible when we have got the qualified teacher. We are afraid the Lower Primary Readers, parts I and II, and the Upper Primary General Readers, published in Persian and Nagri characters, will cause some difficulty as the language is neither purely Hindi nor Urdu. On this subject the department would be better advised to consult noted scholars. The course in arithmetic for the lower classes seems to be rather heavy still, more because it is taught rather in an arbitrary method.'

Condition of the Indian cultivator.

43. The Swadesh Bándhava (Agra), for June, gives extracts from Government reports to show that the present condition of the Indian cultivator is the worst possible. The writer enumerates the following as the causes of the poverty of the Indian cultivator :—

(1) excessive burden of taxation ;
(2) want of irrigation ;
(3) inadequateness of the factors of cultivation ;
(4) strained relations between tenants and zamindars and the consequent increase in litigation ;
(5) decrease in the productive capability of the soil owing to its not being allowed to lie fallow ;
(6) sale of the produce at cheaper rates as soon as it is raised, for the payment of debts or rent ;
(7) recurring changes in settlement ; and
(8) the ignorance of the cultivators.

ADVOCATE, 25th June 1908.

Relief during the rains.

44. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 25th June, referring to the relief granted to the people in famine-stricken districts during the rains, remarks :—

"Relief is now needed for three purposes : huts to protect them from the coming downpour ; wherewithal to buy seed, plough and cattle ; and money to live till the harvesting of early kharif. Broadly speaking, help is required under two heads : agricultural work and housing with feeding. There can thus be a distinction drawn as to the agencies that should work without overlapping one another. The State aid should mainly be for agricultural operations and feeding of peasants, and charitable funds devoted towards thatching and supplementing Government relief in other respects as far as possible. Unfortunately there has not been a good start given to an All-India Charitable Relief Fund. Taken in hand early enough and helped on by the officials, the Provincial Famine Relief Fund has given good testimony of the charitable disposition of the Upper Ten of society, and a respectable sum has been collected. But it is no good hiding the fact that the Indian Charitable Famine Relief Fund inaugurated rather late under the presidency of the Viceroy has been a failure. And what strikes one most is that in spite of the sympathy so often expressed in England with our sad plight by the Liberal Government no Mansion House Fund was opened in London. The effect is that for non-official relief which is no less necessary now as it was before the rains set in, we have to depend upon three sources only : the Provincial Charitable Fund, the Indian People's Famine Trust, and the two Samajic Funds, with what little help individuals may render. It is high time that the work of all these agencies should be in full swing under the changed conditions with some change in the nature of relief so long afforded by them.

The main source of help for the people is, however, the takavi advance. We are afraid there has been some delay in affording this relief in certain places. This delay was not because the aid was late in coming, but because of the new rule known as the Zanzirabandi, which means that those who accept takavi make themselves jointly and severally responsible for the whole amount given to a village.

That is to say, if two or more persons fail to pay up because of death, desertion or other causes, the rest will have to make good the deficit. The Commission was strongly of opinion and the Famine Code provides that repayment of takavi advances must take precedence of even arrears of land revenue. The money will thus be recovered from the fruits of the kharif harvest if the rains be favourable."

In conclusion the editor remarks that labourers find it very hard to get work during the rains, as the peasants prefer to work with their own hands at that time. So they deserve relief in a greater measure than the peasants who get takavi.

Famine relief.

45. A correspondent in the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 26th June, complains that the Deputy Collector of Robertsganj, district Mirzapur, did not allow some private famine workers to relieve the distress of the famine-stricken population of the place and told them that they could not distribute money without the permission of the District Magistrate. He also complains that in various centres of relief operations, such as in Banda, the famine-stricken people are not given sufficient to keep body and soul together and that in many instances deserving people were not given any relief at all.

ABHYUDAYA, 26th June 1908.

Famine and Government servants.

46. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 1st July, makes the following suggestions:—

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 1st July 1908.

"1. That famine allowances should be granted to every one without distinction, as famine weighs as heavily on the high-paid as on the low-paid official.

2. That low-paid officials should not be frequently transferred from one place to another, as transfers mean a good deal of extra expense.

3. That steps should be taken to amend the Alexander scheme as it is no longer practical.

4. That persons receiving a salary of Rs. 100 or less should have the right of appealing against orders of dismissal."

Indian jails.

47. The Musáfir (Agra), in its combined issue of the 15th and 23rd June, referring to the frequent transfer of political prisoners, such as Pindi Das and B. C. Pal from one jail to another, remarks that this is not due to the fact that the Government wants to put them to trouble, but to the corrupt condition of the jails. When a man is about to discover the corruption prevailing in a jail, he is transferred to another. The editor thinks that the wretched condition of the jails cannot long be hidden from the people and the Parliament, and in the name of justice be appeals to the Government to reform them.

MUSAFIR, 15th and 23rd June 1908.

An industrial Conference at Madras.

48. The Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 23rd June, notes with gratification the proposal to hold a conference at Madras to discuss measures for promoting the industrial development of that presidency and remarks that all unrest in India would subside if the Governors of other provinces also were to devote themselves to the promotion of the welfare of the inhabitants committed to their charge.

BHARATBASI, 23rd June 1908.

The industrial development of India.

49. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 26th June, says that distress from famine in India is not so much due to dearness of foodstuffs as to the low economical condition of the people. The editor urges that the development of industry and trade in India will not only raise the material condition of the people but also considerably mitigate the distress from ever-recurring famines. He says that wealthy Indians should lead the way by starting factories and workshops and the Government should do everything to afford them facilities in their undertakings. In his opinion the present unrest will subside considerably if the Government and Indian leaders improve the material condition of the country by developing its industrial resources.

50. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 30th June, deprecates the transfer of Dr. Masha Allah Khan, Assistant Surgeon, Agra, to Budaun and says that this transfer has caused general regret in the city. The editor hopes that His Honour will be pleased to consider the memorial that the citizens of Agra intend to submit in the matter and will have an enquiry made into allegations made against the Assistant Surgeon that brought about his transfer.

HINDUSTANI, 1st July 1908.

Hospital Assistants.

51. Referring to the good work done by hospital assistants in the mufassil, a correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 1st July, says that their remuneration is quite insufficient when the amount of the work they have to do is considered. He therefore begs to draw the attention of the authorities to the following grievances set forth from time to time in memorials to the Government :—

1. The standard of qualification for admission into the Medical School has been raised, for only Entrance passed candidates are now admitted.

2. Formerly students had to compete only in a few subjects, but now the course of study has been much increased.

3. Though members of other departments are getting fair salaries even the pay of hospital assistants remains as low as ever.

4. They do not get promotion generally even in their own grade.

5. The scale of pay is the same as it was in former days, although the cost of living has increased very much owing to famine.

6. In every department members of the lower ranks have a chance to rise to the higher ones, but a Hospital Assistant can never aspire to be an Assistant Civil Surgeon.

In conclusion, the writer hopes that Government will take steps to remove the abovementioned grievances of these deserving officials of the Medical department.

V.—Legislation.

MUSAFIR, 15th and 23rd June 1908.

The new Acts.

52. The Musáfir (Agra), in its combined issue of the 15th and 23rd June, referring to the new Acts, remarks that the Acts have been passed in great haste and their wording is very loose and can be stretched easily to include a good deal. The safety of private individuals and the existence of newspapers has been placed in the hands of the police and the magistracy. Repression, the editor says, has seldom proved useful in suppressing sedition, not even in Russia, where the Government is more strict. The result will be that underground presses will spring up as in Russia, and newspapers will be surreptitiously printed.

SAHIFA, 25th June 1908.

The new Acts.

53. The Sahifa (Bijnor), of the 25th June, referring to the new Acts, remarks that no one can object to the passing of the Explosives Act, as the existence of anarchism in the country is a grave menace to the Government, but there was not much necessity for the Newspapers Act, as the existing law was quite sufficient to deal with seditious journalists.

JEDD-O-JEHAD, 22nd and 29th June 1908.

The new Acts.

54. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), in its combined issue of the 22nd and 29th June, referring to the passing of the new Acts, remarks that the Government, in view of the extreme urgency, cannot be blamed for passing the Explosives Act, and the Newspapers Act will affect only newspapers of the Yugantar type and the Government will not molest sensible papers.

NIZAM-UL-MULK 24th June 1908.

The Newspapers Act.

55. The Nizám-ul-Mulk (Moradabad), of the 24th June, referring to the Newspapers Act, remarks that the Government has done well in passing this Act, and no one objects to the spirit underlying it. The editor, however, advises the Government to exert great discretion in having recourse to the new Act. He thinks that the Government was obliged to pass this measure to suppress the militant spirit which has been infused into the Indian press by the Indian National Congress.

VI.—RAILWAY.

56. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 14th June, complains that Indian travellers on Indian railways are not treated well. There are separate carriages for European and Indian passengers. The former are accommodated in new carriages fitted with electric fans and lights while the latter are put in old carriages which are hardly lighted and are not even supplied with water.

RAHBAR, 14th June 1908.

Railways.

57. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 26th June, referring to the frequent railway collisions that have taken place of late, remarks that it is high time that Government should now intervene and compel the various railway administrations to devise means to prevent such railway collisions. The editor says that the recent railway collision at Rasulabad was due to the carelessness of the Driver of the Up Passenger train no. 33, and asks the Government to order a sifting inquiry on this head. He complains that property worth about Rs. 1,000 was stolen in the confusion after the collision.

ABHYUDAYA, 26th June 1908.

Railway accidents.

58. Referring to the frequency of railway accidents, Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 30th June, suggests the advisability of appointing a commission to consider the grievances of railway employés and urges the necessity of doubling railway tracks as early as possible lest railway accidents go hand in hand with the ravages of plague and famine.

AL BASHIR, 30th June 1908.

Railway accidents.

59. Referring to the disastrous scene which followed the collision near Ghaziabad, a correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 1st July, remarks :—

HINDUSTANI, 1st July 1908.

Railway collisions.

"The railway authorities seem to bestow very little attention on the frequent occurrences of accidents on their lines. They are concerned more with suppressing the actual number of casualties than with minimising the chances of accidents. They do not realize that if a feeling of insecurity and danger gets permanently rooted in the mind of the public the result will be simply disastrous for them."

The writer then proceeds to consider who was responsible for the Ghaziabad accident, and comes to the conclusion that if the Assistant Station Master, Ghaziabad, had exercised a little vigilence and prudence the disaster might have been averted. He then makes the following suggestions for the better management of railway systems and hopes that Government and the railway authorities will co-operate in introducing the reforms suggested :—

1. The doubling of railway lines within a period of three years. Railway fares might be increased to meet the cost of their construction.

2. The creation of a staff of supervisors to see that Guards and Drivers are not under the influence of liquor when going on duty.

3. The introduction of a system of telephone connection between Station Masters and gatemen.

60. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 25th June, has the following :—

ADVOCATE, 25th June 1908.

Railway working.

"Lala Lajpat Rai has made a very nice suggestion. Considering the dangerous increase in the number of accidents due to responsible work being exacted from low-paid, under-fed and jaded servants, and the helplessness of passengers, the travelling public should, he thinks, in their own interests and out of consideration of their own safety, have a strong organization to guard their interests and carry on a systematic campaign for reforms in railway administration. The Lala is for provincial organizations to begin with and an All-India movement to control. It would, we think, perhaps be better to make a small beginning and watch the progress of the work before launching into an elaborate scheme. The start may easily be made at Lahore, the head quarters of the North-Western Railway, where Lala Lajpat Rai's advice and guidance may easily be secured."

61. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 1st July, reproduces the comments of the Advocate, of the 25th June, on the suggestion made by Lala Lajpat Rai regarding the working of Indian railways.

HINDUSTANI, 1st July 1908.

Railway working.

SWARAJYA, 27th June 1908.

The East Indian Railway collision.

62. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 27th June, referring to the recent railway collision near Rasulabad, remarks that railway journeys have become quite dangerous now, and that "with the growth of a feeling of horror among Indians at the prospect of death, God has multiplied the chances of mortality among them. Plague, cholera, famine and earthquakes had hardly finished their work when this fresh agent of disaster has come upon the scene. In England they think it proper to grant compensation to the members of a bereaved family, but in India the railway authorities do not recognize any such code of morality. The rulers, too, do not like to have such a code enforced among them—and why should they? Are not the persons responsible for such disasters their own kith and kin? Alas! Can treatment of this kind secure obedience from the Indian people? Our rulers should first deserve and then desire loyalty from us."

United Provinces and the unrest.

1. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 30th June, writes :— MUSAFIR, 30th June 1908.

"We note with regret that the British Government, whose might every power was afraid of, has grown so nervous and lost its senses to such a great extent at the appearance of a few stray bombs in India, that it has permitted unscrupulous house searches in Agra and Aligarh. Persons of position have been humiliated and harassed by the police, and much indignation prevails at the present moment. We know our voice is feeble; yet we hope that if our appeal reaches His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of our provinces he will surely prevent the police from creating bitterness in these provinces."

In a subsequent note, the same paper remarks 'we have always been advocating a policy of reconciliation and sympathy; but Government took to a different course of action: and the result is only too plain. We wish the Government could even now change its policy. But it is vain to hope—when such a sound and prudent statesman as our present Lieutenant Governor has departed from his old policy and has thus created unrest.'

Unrest in the United Provinces.

2. Referring to the rumour regarding house searches in Allahabad and to the Aligarh sedition cases, the Musáfir (Agra), of the 30th June, remarks :— MUSAFIR, 30th June 1908.

"We have to complain on this occasion, not against the Anglo-Indian authorities, but against the Muhammadan members of the police force who are determined to wreak their vengence upon the Árya Samajists. We have every confidence in our present Lieutenant Governor and we trust his Government will act with much prudence and vigilance at this critical juncture. If it pleases God, we shall publish in our next issue details about the Vedic Ashram and Inspector Khalil-ul-Rahman of the Aligarh police."

Sedition in the United Provinces.

3. Referring to the arrest of Saiyid Fazl-ul-Hasan in Aligarh, and of Shanti Narayan in Allahabad, the Musáfir (Agra), of the 8th July, remarks :— MUSAFIR, 8th July 1908.

"We have nothing to do with the political opinions of these two gentlemen; for we hold western politics to be the root cause of all evil. Still we cannot refrain from saying that our cool-headed Lieutenant Governor has at last fallen into the hands of the police. We have not seen the articles on which the prosecutions have been based; but in any case we cannot congratulate Government on the adoption of this new policy, for we hold that our province cannot be affected by seditious writings of any kind. On the contrary, we are afraid that these prosecutions will stir up a dormant people and do much mischief. We request Government to refrain from such actions."

The Partition of Bengal.

4. The following is an extract from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 5th July :— ADVOCATE, 5th July 1908.

"There is no reason why we should disbelieve Lord Curzon when he disowns the authorship of the partition of Bengal in its present form. Lord Curzon does not take the responsibility. Lord Ampthill, who officiated for him, is not responsible for the measure. Mr. Brodrick, now Lord Middleton, Secretary of State, who gave final sanction, disowned the babe. Lord Morley considers it mistaken in its methods. Then why not remove the mistake? Nobody's prestige appears to be at stake. The Government can revise the partition of Bengal without loss of prestige and thus reconcile the large community in Bengal, which may have no sympathy with the bomb-throwers, but which looks with satisfaction on the acts of people who can cause some confusion to the Government which has insulted their feelings and which, in spite of admitting the mistake, hesitates in righting the wrong."

The Partition of Bengal.

5. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 8th July, reproduces the article from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 5th July, entitled "The Partition of Bengal." HINDUSTANI, 8th July 1908.

RAHBAR, 28th June 1908.

Expulsion of a student from the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College.

6. Referring to the case of a student who has been expelled from the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, Aligarh, on the alleged charge of having contributed an article to a vernacular monthly on the educational policy of "Englishmen in Egypt", the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th June, says:—

"We are at a loss to understand why such a step was taken by the college authorities. Had the article been one relating to Indian affairs, their action might have been held justifiable to some extent. However, we trust this expulsion will serve as a lesson to those who, going against the wishes of the people in Indian affairs, side with Government; but hold the same Government to ridicule and criticism when they discuss questions relating to Egypt and Turkey."

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 5th July 1908.

Expulsion of a student from the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College.

7. Referring to the expulsion of a student from the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College on the alleged charge of having contributed a seditious article to a vernacular monthly, the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 5th July, says that to expel a student because his conduct was reprehensible is the greatest folly imaginable and shows that the college authorities are incapable of reforming their spoilt children. Besides, students thus expelled grow desperate and take to the very course of life it is intended to prevent them from. It would be sufficient to warn such students and to make them understand the consequences of their action.

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 1st July 1908.

Political debates at the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College.

8. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 1st July, writes:—"Hitherto students of the College were forbidden to engage in political controversies, but the effect of this prohibition was not wholesome. The Nawab Vikar-ul-Mulk, who is giving his personal attention to everything in the College, has directed that henceforward students be allowed to express their real thoughts on political questions. He has also begun to invite students to his own house, so that they may have the opportunity of expressing their opinions, and having their doubts removed in serious conversation. We are sure the new departure will prove useful in bringing every Moslem student into line with the general policy of the community."

UNION GAZETTE, 21st and 28th June 1908.

Freedom of the press.

9. The Union Gazette (Bareilly), in its combined issue of the 21st and 28th June, reproduces an article from one of its contemporaries, in which the writer, referring to the freedom of the press in India, remarks:—

"Kings, philosophers and historians all agree in holding freedom of speech as of paramount importance for the welfare of society. But Englishmen with all their respect for high principles of administration are often wont to disregard their liberal professions when they are face to face with Indian problems. Liberty of speech and freedom of the press—things which they acquired after so many difficulties and systematic self-sacrifices—are now considered to be dangerous aspirations on the part of the Indian people. They are sincerely told that for their best interests their press should be muzzled and their mouths should be gagged. But pray why did you yourself shed the blood of so many innocent persons for such undesirable things as the freedom of utterance? Why do you even now stick to it with such tenacity? But surely what is sauce for the gander is not sauce for the goose. East is East and West is West. What is good for Englishmen is extremely injurious for Indians. Patriotism may be a spiritual fervour in the case of the former, but with the latter it is sedition. Everything other than that which has the sanction of our rulers is injurious to our interests and should therefore be avoided. Any one who employs his own discretion in this respect is a dangerous man and the society should be purged of him.

Such is the mode of thinking which has got into our rulers' mind. They do not seem to realize that coercion is not the best remedy for every disease. What did coercion do in the case of England herself? It produced martyrs after martyrs till at last the wail of the prisoners and the lamentations of the oppressed had their effect and the redeemer slowly and imperceptibly came down upon the scene. Darkness was dispelled, it was the reign of light once more—and to-day every English child feels proud of the liberty and freedom which has followed the sufferings of their forefathers.

In the face of these facts no one can give the Englishman credit for honesty when he says that liberty is injurious for Indians. We are told that what we have to do we should do within the bounds of law. Agreed. We are told that constitutional agitation should be our goal. Granted. But pray what is this constitutional agitation? Sitting quiet after one has passed a resolution of protest? If so, constitutional agitation can be of no avail at a place where the principle of might is right seems to be in vogue. The Congress has been crying itself hoarse, and members of Councils have been constantly entering their 'protest' against unpopular measures. But! Poor constitutional method! It has been of no avail.

Newspapers, too, are told to moderate their tone. But tell us, please, how is moderation possible in the face of this persistent disregard of their honest criticism? Had the least attention been paid to their clamourings, Bengal would have been spared those disgraceful scenes which followed the bomb discoveries. Even now people do not want a revolution. They want justice. There may be some enthusiasts who advocate violence, but their existence also is due to their constant disappointments in getting justice. Indians do not want to turn out Englishmen. They simply request them to do justice. Revolution is always disastrous in its results. It sweeps away institutions of a thousand years' standing. Hence no one can hold it desirable. Government has prohibited meetings, and secret societies have sprung up. It took to repressive measures and the bomb has made its appearance in India. Now legislation can be of no avail at this critical juncture; for the more you repress, the more it will grow. When one has grown desperate he may do anything he likes. Beware therefore lest the majority of Indians growing hopeless of reforms take to the same course of murder and assassination which has already begun in Bengal.

In short the gagging of the press, we are afraid, will lead to serious complications. Our advice to you, Englishmen, is that you should not be led away by your false friends. The discontent in India has become general and those who advise you to repress, to imprison, to annihilate Indian art and trade, to gag mouths, to take away pens, and to disgrace Indians in every way—remember they are all your bitterest enemies. They want to create opposition of a violent nature by exasperating the people and setting them against you. Such men think that the only means left to them for creating enthusiasm among a subject nation, for making them determined to dare and to die, is to help Government in its task of repression and oppression.

But our voice is very feeble; 'you will gag the press,' for men in authority often become self-willed. Do not get angry at the somewhat excited tone of our writing for really it is a trumpet-call to save you from an impending peril. 'You see the smoke rising. You see the light, too. Still you are lying in bed.' Alas! You have been hypnotised by your enemies and you do not listen to your friends. Well! God may take pity on you and grant you common sense.

Sometimes getting disappointed we, too, want to leave you to your fate—for we, too, are human beings after all, possessed of ordinary mortal weaknesses. But, no! We have a duty to perform! Providence is looking to us. We cannot let you alone: the world is transitory. Why should we commit ourselves to a sinful course of action? If you listen to us so much the better! if not we leave you to your fate."

OUDH AKHBAR, 4th July 1908.

Freedom of the press.

10. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 4th July, says that there was no liberty even before the passing of the Press Act, for newspapers labouring under the fear of local authorities could never freely criticise the action of the "rulers of a town." Freedom there was, but it was limited only to Anglo-Indian papers, whose criticisms were actuated by national selfishness, and such newspapers can well afford, therefore, to ignore the present Act.

We are sorry, continues the editor, that Government has committed a great blunder. The prosecutions of a newspaper usually gives it a publicity which is not at all desirable.

The time of national struggle has come. The Indian and Anglo-Indian press will now be very busy in advocating their respective causes. The incarceration of Indian editors is to become the order of the day. It is very difficult at this moment for European judges to maintain an unbiased mind. Fair play, therefore, demands that Indian judges should also be on the bench to see that justice is properly administered.

Lord Minto referred, to the opinion of public meetings regarding the existence of violent newspapers and said that the passing of the Press Act had also the sanction of the Indian public. It may be. But we want to point out that there is not a bit of independence and freedom of thought left among Indians of the present days.

RAHBAR, 28th June 1908.

The bomb conspiracy.

11. Referring to the astounding disclosures made by Narendra Nath Goshain, who has turned King's evidence in the Calcutta conspiracy cases, the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th June, remarks that Government should be very careful in accepting his statements as correct; otherwise it is feared many innocent persons will fall a prey to the unscrupulous credulity of the Government.

It is rumoured that Jitendra Nath Banerji of Burdwan also wants to disclose certain facts in connection with the conspiracies, provided he too is made King's evidence.

If the Government wants to prevent the baneful effects of the teachings of the Extremists from spreading further it should, the editor says, act with much prudence and foresight at this critical juncture.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 1st July 1908.

The bomb outrage.

12. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 1st July, writes:—

"The Extremists were exulting over the confessions of the bomb anarchists and declared their unity and patriotism to be exemplary. But all of a sudden it was rumoured that Narendra Nath Goshain betrayed the whole thing and his evidence has caused surprise not only to the anarchists themselves but to all the political parties in India. But I do not understand why the people should be surprised at it. It cannot as yet be decided whether Narendra Nath's statement is really true or whether any temptation or intimidation has been employed to make him utter falsehoods in order to implicate Arabinda Ghosh and other Bengali agitators, and to lower the advocates of the Swadeshi movement in the estimation of their countrymen by making them out to be robbers (for this point is still being considered by the court). But there can be no doubt that Goshain has turned out to be the meanest traitor. Does not his statement prove that complicity in sin morally destroys all persons connected with its perpetration? How is it possible that the people can make any efforts for the attainment of such a pure thing as Swaraj when morality in the country is conspicuous by its absence, when its inhabitants have not the power of self-control and when the workers have no faith in the reality of religion? I believe that the demanted youths, who have confessed their guilt in the bomb outrage, were not moved to do so by love of truth but by an overpowering desire to gain notoriety in the world. The writers and public men of India ought at this time to divert the fickle minds of youths from the pursuit of notoriety to the formation of a good moral character. It is still not too late, but if this opportunity is lost it will be too difficult to set yourselves right."

ABHYUDAYA, 3rd July 1908.

"Our present condition and our duty."

13. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 3rd July, says that Indians must fight out their cause, taking their stand on the Proclamation of 1858 and the Parliamentary Act of 1833, which accord them all the rights of a British-born subject: and it is absolutely essential for the development of their physical, moral and intellectual faculties and for the progress of their country that they should have self-government on colonial lines. It is also clear, the editor says, that Indians can make full progress under the British rule, for Government keeps order and peace in the country and ensures security of life and property and the enjoyment of the fruits of one's labour. It is, however, deplorable that Indians do not take advantage of the facilities afforded by the Government for the development of the country's resources. They take no steps to spread education among the masses and encourage indigenous arts and industries, in which Government is ever ready to co-operate with them. It is therefore quite clear that they are more to blame for their present degradation than those responsible for the defects of the administration.

Unconstitutional agitation will not help their cause in the least; bomb outrages will only impede their progress, and moreover violence and secret murders are quite contrary to their religion and have never been known to secure progress to any country; and further it is impossible that Indians should be able to govern their country independently if the English chose to withdraw from it. Under the circumstances, it is incumbent upon every well-wisher of the country that he should see that political agitation in this country is carried on strictly on constitutional lines. But at the same time it is equally necessary that Indians should purge out the various defects from their national character, such as their disunion, ignorance, idleness and sordid selfishness; and should cultivate all the qualities found in a progressive nation. It is only then, and then alone, that Government will attend to their demands and base the administration of the country upon their wishes.

Lord Morley on the Indian situation.

14. Referring to the speech of Lord Morley delivered on the occasion of the Indian Civil Service dinner, the Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 24th June, remarks :— SHAHNA-I-HIND, 24th June 1908.

"This speech has been delivered in a calm and undisturbed state of mind—in which we find more of honesty and sympathy than of retaliation—for Lord Morley has plainly said that 'desire for the demand of rights has been created by ourselves and Indians are not to blame in this connection.' This leads us to think that by an early recognition of our aspirations, things are to be calmed down to their normal condition in the near future."

Lord Curzon.

15. Referring to the debate on the Indian situation in the House of Lords on the 30th June, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 3rd July, says that it was Lord Curzon who by reversing the policy of the British Government and of his predecessors, alienated the feelings of Indians from the Government, and that the various measures of his viceroyalty, including the partition of Bengal, shook the confidence of a large section of Indians in the Government and embittered their feelings against it. In short, Lord Curzon is the root-cause of the present political situation in India and it is strange that, in spite of all the facts and figures that prove this, he shifts that responsibility on to other shoulders. ABHYUDAYA, 3rd July 1908.

The present situation.

16. Under the heading "A Christian view of the situation" the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 9th July, refers to the views expressed by the Revd. Richard Burges, of Jubbulpore, on the present unrest in India, which are exactly those of Sir Mackworth Young, a former Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab. The editor says that the question of the day is : how is the British Government going to deal with the problem and what help will the missionary and the Church give towards its solution ? He hopes and trusts the Liberal instinct of the present Government and the conscience of Great Britain will help those on the spot to tide over the difficulty and lead the state craft from the troubled waters in which it is rolling heavily on to a calm sea. ADVOCATE, 9th July 1908.

The reverend gentleman's concluding remarks, the editor says, should touch the heart of the British rulers and make them realize the sacredness of their task, the seriousness of the situation and the need of a heart-change as the remedy. He says : "India's sons and daughters are displaying keen brain power, much patience, commendable perseverance, and, all things counted, remarkable moral qualities. Surely they ought to have a larger share in the building of empire. When more responsibility is laid upon them I believe they will prove themselves worthy of the trust. Britain has done a new thing on the earth in thus ruling a non-Christian land by the methods of the West. If the time ever comes when Britain will have trained India to rule herself wisely, she will have done the greatest thing in her great history." May it be so.

The position of India.

17. Under the heading "The Position of India" the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 9th July, observes that the awakening of Asia necessarily presents different features in different countries. After citing the state of affairs in Japan, China, Persia, Turkey, and Afghanistan he says that the sudden and dangerous developments of the last few months show that the very worst revolutionary methods of Europe have appeared in India, where up to 1905 all the conditions were favourable for peaceful progress. He says "ordinarily the Indian mind regards with abhorrence the methods of the European anarchist, but natural aversion has been overcome under the dangerous spell of foreign anarchism. In India, political assassinations by infernal machines are not merely wantonly wicked but utterly useless. The real Government is in England, and it cannot be overthrown INDIAN PEOPLE, 9th July 1908.

by bombs used in India. Even if it were possible to overthrow the British Government, the people of India are lacking in all the equipment necessary for self-government and self-defence. India would fall a prey to the next comer. Even Japan would not prove an ideal conqueror. The revolutionary movement in India is premature, morbid, and absurd. The industrial movement is the normal development. The Swadeshi movement, without the boycott, will open a great future for the country. All earnest, patriotic Indians will join in the hope that the appearance of violent crime as a political propaganda will disappear like a temporary fit of mania and the whole country will settle down to the building of the ground-floor of the national edifice of the future. There are hopeful signs in many directions, though early errors are inevitable. But no mistake can justify the introduction of a form of crime which is the lasting disgrace of Europe. There is no country in the world where anarchists hope to be the ultimate rulers. They merely seek to destroy what exists; their vision goes no further. Indian patriotism has an immense amount of constructive work to do. The bomb-thrower is not only a criminal, but he is unpatriotic, as he paralyses the constructive work of others. Self-restraint comes before self-government; the furious abandonment to unrestrained crime is the gravest menace to the future of India."

ANAND, KADAMBINI, February 1908.

A Bengali and a European.

18. The Anand Kadambini (Mirzapur), for February (received on the 18th June), contains the following dialogue between a Bengali and a European :—

"Bengali : Saheb! Good morning.
European : O! Good morning. Hallo, Babu, well, how do you do?
Bengali : Quite well; now I am quite well.
European : Well, quite well? Well, what do you want?
Bengali : I simply want swaraj from you and nothing else.
European : O, you fool! I will give you a bamboo as a present.
Bengali : A present of a bamboo? Is that so?
Bande Mataram, Bom, Bom, Deva, Deva, Mahadeva."

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 24th June 1908.

The Indian and European anarchist —a contrast.

19. The Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 24th June, writes :—

"India is a land of religious strife and discord. Difference of opinion verging upon open and armed hostility exists, not only between Hindus and Muhammadans, but between different sects of these two great races of India also.

The appearance of the anarchist in India, therefore, forbodes danger alike to Englishmen and Indians: the absence of religious difference in Europe precludes the possibility of frequent occurrences of bomb accidents. But in India unscrupulous persons of different sects will not hesitate to use bombs as a means of converting others to their own faith.

It is extremely necessary, therefore, to put an end to this new movement as early as possible: and every repressive measure adopted in this connection will be conducive to the welfare of the Indian community."

MUSAFIR, 8th July 1908.

How unrest is created.

20. Newspaper prosecutions, says the Musáfir (Agra), of the 8th July, are always followed by unrest of a serious nature. Riots in the Punjab followed in the wake of the prosecution of the Punjabee, and we hold that if the Yugantar had not been prosecuted, we would not have heard of bombs in Bengal.

At present, cases are pending against Messrs. Tilak and Pranjpe in the Bombay Presidency. We want to know if they were really a danger to Government: the objectionable articles for which they are being prosecuted appeared sometime in May or June. Has anything serious happened since then? If not, why is Government creating bitterness and irritation in vain? We once more request the Government to try a policy of reconciliation.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 9th July 1908.

The spread of the revolutionary idea.

21. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 9th July, says that the real burning question in India at present is the sudden and unaccountable birth and development of revolutionary ideas. Public opinion has so far contented itself with condemning the bomb conspiracy in Bengal. But no actual solution of the difficulty that confronts the country has been put forward. The editor says that the arm of the law is sufficiently long and strong to deal with the terrorist plot. But the question, will the revolutionary movement of which the bomb is the symbol, come to an end by the exposure that has been made and the punishment that may be inflicted, remains unsolved. He then refers to the movement among the Indian students in England and the revolutionary tendencies of young boys and students in general, and says that the former are not all Bengalis, but come from every part of India. Very few of them have come under the influence of Indian orators and papers and they should therefore be the last to love and cherish revolutionary ideas. But the case is quite contrary and there is no adequate explanation forthcoming. Newspapers can be suppressed, speakers can be silenced, but there is no means for preventing the growth of an idea or anticipating its manifestation in concrete action. He concludes by saying "there has been a general miscalculation all round. The Government did not anticipate that discontent would anywhere become so acute as to lead to violence. It is now said that this was foreseen because of the incitement to violence by some newspapers. Still, the question remains why newspapers should have preached a crusade of violence. The sober section of the community, which has been agitating and pressing for reforms, noticed with concern the growth of a new school of thought which repudiated all association with the Government, but it had no notion that actual violence was in contemplation anywhere. The plot that has come to light is a very small thing compared with the potentialities of the revolutionary idea which is spreading rapidly among the younger generation. The problem is how to wean our young men from this danger, or to convince them that a revolution in India is out of the question."

The resurgence of Asia.

22. Referring to the troubles that arose in Persia owing to a difference of opinion between the Shah and the members of the Parliament, the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th June, remarks :— RAHBAR, 28th June 1908.

"Now the people of Asia generally have come to realize the value of liberty; therefore every measure, instead of repressing them, increases their enthusiasm—still selfish-minded persons think that their welfare consists in repression only."

East and West.

23. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 1st July, writes :— SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 1st July 1908.

"Europeans do not consider Asiatics to be human beings, but minute discrimination will show that the differences are only superficial and that human nature is the same all the world over. Constitutional institutions having failed in Persia, the English will unanimously declare that 'nothing else could be expected from Asiatics.' They are not fit for swaraj and that is why their own Sovereigns do not willingly grant them swaraj."

But are European Sovereigns prepared to willingly concede the rights of the subjects? All Europe will be seized with consternation at the execution of the editors of the Sur-ul-Asraphael and of other newspapers in Persia. But in India not only have scores of editors suffered, and are still suffering, rigorous imprisonment, but several of them have succumbed to harsh treatment. Why, then, is nobody to be found even to sigh over their sufferings? It is held reprehensible on the part of the Shah of Persia to set Cossacks on his subjects. But why does nobody point to the Hindus being ruined through Gurkhas and Musalmans? In it there is only a difference of means. What the British Government does, it professes to do in the interests of the subjects. The English did not acquire the sovereignty of India through any kind of greed. Seeing oppression committed on Hindus, they stretched their hand of love (lit.) over the Indians.

But the Shah of Persia asserts in plain words that he is 'not prepared to forego the inheritance of his forefathers without an appeal to the sword' (although it was his father who made the people aspire for the attainment of their rights). He, without making any excuse, lets Cossacks loose on the people. Has such brutal instinct any connection with Asia? Certainly not. For an insight into the civilization of Asia, one must see the history of the ancient Áryas and of their disciples, the Parsis, the Chinese, and the Japanese. To find out the root of the brutal instinct that is now-a-days prevailing in Persia, one should go to Africa, the land of cannibals. This brutal instinct found its way from Africa to Arabia, and thence it was taken to Europe and Asia by freebooters. But the question is, that if the covering of the various civilizations were removed, no difference would be found between man and man. It is only the difference of education that makes one a diamond and the other a stone (lit.).

RAHBAR, 21st June 1908.

If Japan ruled England.

24. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 21st June, publishes an article entitled "If Japan ruled England", of which the following is a literal translation :—

"Sir Frederick Liely in his book entitled 'Suggestions for the Better Government of India', writes as follows :—Suppose that a foreign nation—Japanese for example—ruled England and the administration thereof were entrusted entirely into the hands of a statesman who had never visited the coast of England before and among whose councillors are men of his own nationality—men whose knowledge is limited to books and reports—men who are entirely ignorant of the English language and whose intercourse with Englishmen consists in having met a few Japanese-speaking Englishmen who sometimes came to visit them. Well suppose all this and say then, what kind of Government would this be ? The people of Tokio must of course consider it good. But would the inhabitants of Yorkshire and Cornwall think the same ? And how long would such an administration last ?

The writer has raised this question and some political astrologer must answer it. But it won't be much amiss if we, too, ask some questions in this connection. It may be that our benign rulers, who take offence at everything we say, will consider and reflect over them at their leisure.

Suppose that in their country Englishmen are excluded from all high Government posts and Japanese are imported to fill their place. Suppose that gradually ordinary posts are also taken away from Englishmen and given away to poor Japanese—not only this, but suppose also that Englishmen are deprived of even the private services of zamindars and talukdars in order that they may be unscrupulously bestowed upon the Japanese—well, suppose all this and say if this state of affairs would be just and fair ?

Suppose, further, that in order to get into the Civil Service of England, Englishmen have to go to Tokio and to compete in a very stiff examination conducted in the Japanese language. Suppose that even for petty posts they are required to pass a test in the Japanese language ; in other words suppose that English children have to spend fifteen or sixteen years of their life in learning a foreign language. Suppose all this and say if the English nation would like this procedure ?

Suppose that the Japanese Government takes away 30 or 40 crores of rupees every year from England without compensating the English for the loss in any way, and sends out only a few able Japanese (to govern). In like manner suppose that Japanese merchants completely destroy the English trade, that they take away to Japan the raw produce from England to manufacture it into goods which they sell at a cent. per cent. profit in the English market. Well, suppose all this and say if England would grow rich or poor day by day ?

Suppose again that in order to remove the poverty of Englishmen, the Japanese instead of lightening the burden of administration increase the taxes every day and force high Japanese officials on the country and squander away one-third of the revenue in providing for a permanent Japanese army in England. Well, suppose all this and say if these measures would be calculated to cure or increase the malady ?

Suppose that the Japanese Government pays a salary of Rs. 100 per mensem to a Japanese soldier and Rs. 10 only to the Englishman, but exacts much hard labour from the latter, and suppose again that when it comes to the offering of a reward it gives the meed of praise to the Japanese but when punishment has to be meeted out, it holds the Englishmen responsible for everything. Well, suppose all this and say if in the face of this treatment the army would ever remain loyal ?

Again suppose that a Japanese, mistaking an Englishman for a boar or a deer, shoots him or kicks his bowels out and the Court or jury constituted entirely of Japanese lets him go unpunished ; or suppose that a Japanese violates the chastity of an English lady and the Japanese Court of Justice pays no attention to it. Well, suppose all this and say if Englishmen would cherish affection for the Japanese ?

Suppose once more that immediately after the advent of Japanese, famine breaks out in the land and increases day by day, and suppose also that before this, Englishmen had never known what famine was. In spite of all this, suppose that Japanese officials hold the failure of the monsoon responsible for the famine, and care very little as to whence the poor Englishmen are to bring money with which to buy grain, but carry away to Japan all the available foodstuff in the country and increase the revenue regularly every year, exacting it from the people with much rigour and harshness saying that their actions are all for the welfare of the people. Well, suppose all this and say if this lip sympathy would not appear ridiculous to Englishmen.

In the last place suppose that a meeting of Englishmen is held to ventilate their grievances and to demand reforms in the administration of their country; that the Japanese Government instead of attending to their just and proper requests looks upon them with hatred and enmity, adopts a repressive policy and thus creates discontent in the land; suppose that a Japanese Governor divides England into two portions, so that the people thereof may become weak, that coming to know of this, the English race holds a thousand meetings to express its indignation at the proposal and condemns the measure as extremely injurious to their interest; that the Japanese Government disregarding all this, cruelly tramples down under its feet all the sentiments of the English nation and carries out its proposal in the teeth of popular opposition; that Englishmen exasperated by this, resort to a boycott of Japanese goods and of the Japanese departments as far as possible; that Japanese officials instead of taking pity on their deplorable condition, treat them with barbarous severity; deporting some of them without any inquiry, incarcerating the innocent in order to re-establish their prestige and punishing the boycotters in order to save Japanese merchants from embarassment; suppose also that Japanese officials mete out high punishments on flimsy grounds to those English papers that complain of their tyranny and oppression, and publicly flog boys of noble families like thieves and scoundrels, simply because they had dared to oppose the police whose hooliganism they applaude and speak so highly of. Well, suppose all this is the actual treatment of Japanese conquerors towards the conquered English and then say if the latter would cherish affection for the former or throw bombs upon them. Would not Englishmen wonder that in the face of such treatment loyalty and affection is expected from them? Englishmen are rulers of India. It is quite impossible for them to gauge the feelings of Indians. There are many honest Englishmen whose opinion is that Indians feel highly grateful at being subdued an dmade loyal by them, as if hindustanis are a flock of sheep. But, by God, we speak the truth when we declare that it is no wonder if Indians say that they, too, are human beings descended not only from the same Aryan stock as yourself but from the first branch of it, and inspired by the same feelings and ideas which prompt your ownselves. We desire it from the bottom of our heart that our responsible rulers should sometimes put themselves in the position in which Sir Frederick Liely has tried to place them. They might then be able to realize the true condition of the people whom Providence has entrusted to their care."

The origin of the anarchist.

25. The Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 24th June, referring to the anarchist movement in Bengal, remarks :— SHAHNA-I-HIN D 24th June 1908.

"The Anglo-Indian press, Government and the anarchists are all busy contemplating the present situation. The Anglo-Indian press is full of rage and fury and frets and fumes at the slow progress of the repressive policy in India. The Government is patiently watching the course of events and waiting for the final verdict of the judges on the bench.

And the anarchist, as well, is also waiting to see if this new method of demanding rights succeeds or not.

Only one attempt has so completely bewildered Englishmen in India that they have begun to look upon every bare-headed Bengali as the agent of death. No one seems to bestow a moment's attention upon the origin of the anarchists. We are not one of those who advise a wholesale deportation and slaughter of the Bengalis, for we know that the Bengali nation, as a whole, realizes its obligation to the British Government, and leading men of that community have already expressed their indignation at this new movement.

The real cause of this anarchist movement is the partition of Bengal, which has highly exasperated the Bengali community. Led away by their enthusiasm, some of the hair-brained youths resorted to this new weapon of political agitation. The enemies of England in foreign countries who do not like to see Fair Britannia in her present glory, are rejoicing at the prospect of coming troubles: and not only 'black devils,' but these 'white demons' also are ready to assist the anarchists.

These repressive measures, therefore, are not sufficient to quell this monster of anarchism. Wisdom and prudence dictate that leaders of public opinion should be invited to a conference, and that by mutual co-operation they should devise the best means of suppressing this new spirit.

The demand for home rule is natural and in accordance with the spirit of the age. The Government should give up its royal zid and the people their childish obstinacy and then every Indian in his own home will sing the praises of the British Government."

SWARAJYA, 27th June 1908.

The wail of motherland.

26. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 27th June, reproduces a poem from the Himalaya (Punjab), of which a literal translation is given below :—

"I am a captive in the meshes of calamity and cannot even breathe.

I have been slaughtered by the sword of blandishment to such an extent that I cannot turn my eyes.

The sky has (completely) effaced me (my existence) and humiliated me in the eyes of every one.

It has covered me with dust, so that no one may touch me.

Thousands are my determined enemies, and the heart of every one cherishes a grudge against me.

There are a thousand wounds in my heart. How can one expose them to the public gaze.

Where have my brave men gone ? Where are my fort-conquering heroes ?

What has become of those dauntless men ? (lit. bright moon) who never turned their face (from the battle field).

What has happened to my long spears ? My stiff bow was not bent. They placed me on pointless arrows (who) could not aim at even one mark (successfully).

My Hindukush has now taken to killing Hindus and my Himalaya has become bankrupt. My Ganges and Jumna have shrunk away. They are now sufficient only for bathing.

I have no longer that pearl necklace (with me), nor is that (royal) umbrella over my head. My hair is flowing loose in the dust, nor is there any one to wash it (of dirt).

Neither do Delhi and Agra, nor Behar and Calcutta exist any longer. Every city lies desolated. Who can populate them afresh ?

My high fortresses are all now raised to the ground. Where even eagles could not fly, there owls are screaching now.

That throne on which was seated a peacock and which was famous throughout the world they have forcibly taken away from us. Such was the force that they brought to bear upon me.

They have swept off (taken away) my Koh-i-nur and made it into several pieces. In every way they have effaced my existence from the world, so that I may be of no value in any one's eye.

My children have taken to beggary. Who is there to give them a piece of bread ? They are told to be off, wherever they go to. No one allows them to sit by him.

My sons, who used to teach others, are now learning from them. Such is the work of Providence. Who can mend my lot ?

O, Poet ! the same man cannot go on playing on his flute. A thing has never belonged to one for ever, nor will it ever be so. This is very slippery ground ; who can keep a firm foot here ?"

The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th June, reproduces the above from the Swarájya (Allahabad).

INDIAN PEOPLE 5th July 1908.

The story of a deportation.

27. Reviewing Lala Lajpat Rai's account of his deportation, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 5th July, makes the following observations :—

"What the Government has to realize is the important fact that the country has refused to share the view that Lala Lajpat Rai was guilty of any offence. There is no man in India who would not feel honoured by welcoming Lala Lajpat Rai to his house, no man who does not look upon him as a martyr. This is the mistake that has been made. Lala Lajpat Rai is busy again with his multifarious and philanthropic activities and his appearance excites unbounded enthusiasm everywhere. It is a clear case of a grave error. If a man could be openly convicted of tampering with the loyalty of the troops, no one would sympathise with him, but a vague accusation will not satisfy any one. Lala Lajpat Rai went to Mandalay as a well-known patriot and worker; he has come back as one of the most famous Indians with the crown of martyrdom on his brow."

Editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla.

29. Referring to the arrest and prosecution of the editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla, the Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 1st July, remarks :—

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 1st July 1908.

"We are sorry that in spite of the repeated warnings of his friends, the editor could not escape the baneful effects of the Congress and the Extremists. He has brought disgrace upon the country and the community to which he belongs. However, if even now he expresses his sincere regret at his conduct and begs pardon of the authorities, we promise we will try our best to secure for him forgiveness from Government and the authorities. But if he is to repent, he must do so at once."

Mr. Tilak's prosecution.

30. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 1st July, says that Government has committed a very serious mistake in prosecuting Mr. Tilak at this time. It seems that there has been an end to British statesmanship. Will the imprisonment of Mr. Tilak, the editor asks, enable the Government to suppress acts of violence? True statesmanship, he remarks, lies not in stirring up new causes of discontent among the people but in winning over their wavering hearts.

Mr. Tilak's application for bail.

32. The following is an extract from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 9th July :—

ADVOCATE, 9th July 1908.

"The affidavit of the Government Solicitor of Bombay, filed in opposition to Mr. Tilak's application for bail, contained the following significant paragraph :—'I am informed that the Local Government through one of their Secretaries say that if the accused is released on bail, the Local Government believes that he will use his liberty to exhibit feelings of disaffection and hatred against Government and that it would be dangerous to release him.' Suppose Mr. Tilak is acquitted after the trial, how will the Bombay Secretariat then meet the situation and avoid danger?"

Provincial Civil Service and District Judgeships.

33. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 9th July :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 9th July 1908.

"It is now close upon two decades since the Public Service Commission recommended the appointment of Subordinate Judges as District Judges. We are glad to note that this recommendation has been recently given effect to in Oudh, and two members of the Provincial Civil Service have been made District Judges. Even a tardy and belated act of justice deserves commendation, and a recognition of merit, whenever it comes, cannot fail to meet with public approval. We cannot help wondering in this connection, however, why the province of Agra should lag behind her sister of Oudh. We believe the Provincial Civil Service in Agra is in no way inferior to the Provincial Civil Service in Oudh and there are men in the former service who can give points to many actual District Judges who exercise appellate powers over them. Occasionally some of these men have been placed temporarily in charge of District Judgeships when the permanent incumbents of the office have been away on leave, but not a single member of that service has yet been given a permanent lift. A giant like Babu Bipin Behari Mukerji has already retired on pension; so has Khan Bahadur Akbar Husain. Rai Bahadur Lala Baij Nath will retire shortly, and Babu Prag Das and Mr. Ahmad Ali Khan will have to follow suit at no distant future. And yet the promised land of Canaan is not in sight. These gentlemen and several others have officiated more than once as District Judges, and the quality of their work, we believe, will compare favourably with that of many others. Fortune has smiled upon the members of the Statutory Civil Service, but there seems to be no other reason why they should be allowed to crowd out members of the Provincial Civil Service who in experience and ability are in no way inferior. We believe the time has come when the Government should no longer neglect the claims of a very deserving class of men and when it should take active steps for the improvement of their prospects. It is well known that the solidest plank upon which the fabric of British Government is built in India, is its system of administration of justice, and there is no public need more imperative than that of keeping the judicial service pure, contented and independent."

Abolition of duties on Russian sugar.

34. The Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 2nd July, makes the following remarks on the abolition of duties on Russian sugar:—

"We fail to understand why the abolition of duties on tea by the Russian Government should make the Government of India abolish the duties on bounty-fed sugar. Is Indian tea bounty-fed? If not, why should it not be put in the same category as bounty-fed foreign sugar? Moreover, tea has been made a necessary of life by Europeans while it is merely a luxury in India."

"When this municipal system was first introduced, it was meant to train Indians in the art of administration; but now it has become a completely officialized body. Owing to the pressure of work, the District Magistrates of Allahabad and Cawnpore cannot find time to attend to municipal affairs. It is proposed, therefore, to appoint two civilians as chairmen of these municipalities. For this purpose octroi duties are being increased in spite of the protests of the people concerned. But who minds protests so long as it is possible to provide for a European at the cost of Indians."

RAHBAR, 21st June 1908.

Khalsa College or the Loyal College.

37. Under the marginally noted heading, the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 21st June, writes:—

"The policy of divide et impera has been eminently successful in India. It is being tried with the Sikhs these days, who are constantly told that they have no connection with the Hindus on the one hand nor with the Brahmans on the other. The latter, they say, proved tractive to Guru Sahib and should therefore be discarded, as if the sins of a few should be visited upon the whole community. If this theory be true, would it be improper for us Indians of the present day to ostracise and discard those who are proving traitors to their motherland in order to secure the goodwill of the powers that be?

But a section of the Sikh community could not avoid falling a prey to this hypnotism, and going against the wishes of the recognized leaders of its community and has declared open hostility against the Hindus in general and the Brahmans in particular. It went to the extent of excluding idols from the Golden Temple at Amritsar. Maharaja Nahba was appealed to in this matter, but his voice also proved to be too feeble.

This new party of the Sikhs has tried to imitate the policy of the founders of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, Aligarh. But every one is not of Sir Syed's calibre. First cultivate the qualities of self-reliance and self-help like Sir Syed and then aspire to adopt his policy. You cannot manage your own national temple. How can you, then, manage your National College? The result is to be that what you call your National College will soon become a college of loyalists—of spurious loyalists; for true loyalists cannot be created without love and justice for Indians, who are so much despised and ill-treated these days."

HINDUSTANI, 8th July 1908.

A beneficient endowment.

39. Referring to the endowment by Raja Uday Partab Singh, C.S.I., talukdar of Bhinga, Oudh, for the educational advancement of the caste to which he belongs, the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 9th July, makes the following observations :—

ADVOCATE, 9th July 1908.

"Every friend of the cause of education will appreciate the noble impulse which has led the Raja of Bhinga to make the endowment and thus promote the cause of education in people who are much backward. We, however, would that Raja Uday Partab Singh had risen above caste pride and that the Government had not lent him the pages of the Government Gazette to show his animus against certain castes, for which the Raja appears to have nothing but contempt but whose claims to Kshatriyaship do not depend on the whims and caprices of Raja Uday Partab Singh or a few Rajputs of his views. It is a pity that an educational institution of such a magnitude should be established in these provinces whose founder should attempt to leave behind him a heritage of bitterness of caste feeling. Raja Uday Partab Singh wants to propagate loyalty in Rajputs by solemn affirmations before magistrates. We do not know whether it will be necessary to repeat these affirmations at the opening of every session, otherwise what will be the value of the chanting of the loyalty mantra in the case of children of tender ages while seeking admission in the lower classes. Raja Uday Partab Singh would have shown greater magnanimity had he thrown open the doors of this school to pupils of all classes and thus benefited the general community by offering special facilities for education in his school. It was, perhaps, too much to expect him to forget his differences with the Central Hindu College and merge his personality in uplifting the Hindu race. Surely he could have combined his efforts with another bonâ fide Kshatriya, whatever that expression might mean, and given the institution at Agra the status of a first class institution. We, of course, refer to the munificent donation of six lakhs made last year by Raja Balwant Singh, C.I.E., of Ava, who, we understand, is willing to double this amount in order to strengthen the Rajput High School and raise it to the status of a college. Raja Uday Partab's donation of Rs. 10,000,000 would have helped Mrs. Annie Besant in realizing her idea of a Hindu University, or this amount would have given an Aligarh College to the Rajputs at Agra. But this is unfortunately not to be. However desirous we may be to see the Raja of Bhinga's endowment better employed, we cannot but admire his benevolent motives, his setting up an ideal before rich talukdars, some of whom, like him, would die intestate, but do not know how to immortalize their names. We wish his example will be largely followed."

Jubilee High School, Gorakhpur.

40. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 9th July, has the following :—

ADVOCATE, 9th July 1908.

"For the last High School Scholarship examination five candidates were sent up and they all won Government scholarships. For the Matriculation examination, 17 candidates sat, 15 of whom came out successful. From these results as well as those of previous years, it will appear that the school is deserving of the best consideration at the hands of the educational authorities who should try to raise it to the status of a well-equipped model zila school for the eastern districts of the province."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 9th July 1908.

Legal education in India.

41. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 9th July, refers to the lengthy minute on Law classes attached to Art classes drawn up and circulated by the learned Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University in which the existing system of legal education has been adversely criticised and expresses his entire accord with the views of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Ashotosh Mukerji. He hopes that the Calcutta University, which has been the pioneer of reform in educational matters in the past, will lead in the matter of the reform of legal education also by establishing a University Law College worthy of the name.

ANAND KADAMBINI, February 1908.

The Swadeshi movement.

42. The Anand Kadambini (Mirzapur), for February (received on the 18th June), contains the following :—

Scene : Chowk Bazar. (A young beautiful woman, Vilayati, in an English ball-dress, is standing with great affectation and is captivating and calling her lovers.)

Vilayati : (With a fan in her left hand, and beckoning with a finger of the right) well ! my dear, come here, come here.

Purbi : Away thou wench of a bastard ! thou shouldst take thyself away from this place. I do not want to see thy face, away ! away ! It is a sin to see thy face.

Vilayati : Well, my dear, don't you love me ? Won't you come here ?

Purbi : Thou an upstart of a prostitute ! thou art not a human being but a demon, and I will not be enslaved in your meshes. Your company has ruined me. I have now understood all these things. Henceforth you should not show your face any more. Away from this place with your face blackened, you have completely ruined me and are you still not satisfied ?

Vilayati : Damned you dear ! Hear me, hear, have you gone mad ? How can you live without me ?

Purbi : Matches, give me matches, has any one got any, why don't you give me some ? (fumbles his pocket). You rakshasi (demon) I want to burn you altogether by setting fire to your face (lighting a match he rushes forward to set fire to her hair).

Marwari : How now ! what are you doing, Sir ? In the first place all women are inviolable and then she is such a beautiful woman, how could you commit such a wicked deed of violence on her ? Is she not fit for endearment instead of being spurned (lit. being driven out). Ram, Ram, Shri Krishna, Shri Krishna.

Musalman : O ! thou ill-mannerly man, has thou gone mad ? (We) have come by this beautiful lady only through our good luck. You are so rude to her ! (To Vilayati). Come my soul, come, I am ready to serve you heart and soul. This wretched Bengali is entirely a barbarian and a brute. How should he know the way to value you. I am ready to sacrifice even a hundred lives of mine for you. (Nodding his head). Hurrah, how pretty her movements are ! Bravo, how charming she is !

Vilayati : (To the Bengali). Well, my dear, why have you become so angry with me ? I love you very much. Well, come here, come here (goes forward to shake hands).

Purbi : Rakshasi, it is a sin to see your face, away, wench, away, don't touch me (moves away).

Dakhshni : Then why should we remain here ? Let us go and worship our Swadeshi Devi.

Pachchhmi : He is quite right. Let us depart, we have nothing to do here. (All the three depart.)

Vilayati : (To herself). Well, it is much to be deplored that this Bengali Babu has become angry (with me). Well, there was none who loved me so. But now he has become wholely estranged from me. Perhaps through him the Punjabi and the Maharatta, too, will leave me. Alas! this is the result of the folly of Lord Curzon and of the blind policy of Mr. Morley. (Aloud). Very well, if you behave insolently towards me then like a common rascal you will be flogged and thus brought to your senses.

Musalman : (To himself). What should I say; this woman seems to be quite enamoured of this Bengali. Perhaps he has cast a spell over her. But the wonder is that these fools have given up this beautiful fairy of delicate constitution, and have become enamoured of that poor Swadeshi.

Vilayati : (To herself). O, you rascal! I know you very well. You want to deceive me. I don't want to fall into the snare you have land. You take me to be a fool altogether. I know it very well that you are the real helpers of the Swadeshi, being the bulk of the artizans of India. Let me see what this Bengali thinks of—(aloud) O! no, no. (Follows the Bengali).

Marwari : Goddess! whither are you going? Here I am ready to serve you (lit. your foot). Please come here.

Musalman : There is no doubt that Swadeshi is beneficial in every way and it is incumbent on us to help it, as the saying goes "Love of one's country is better than even the kingdom of Solomon, and a thorn of one's motherland is better than the hyacinth of Raihan. One's things are after all one's own while those of another are another's."

There is no doubt that millions of my brethren and countrymen such as weavers, &c., derive their living from this (Swadeshi). But we would look to our immediate gain and not to the gain and loss of the whole world. Again who should bring himself into trouble uselessly? Therefore according to Harish Chandra Rasa "What is it to us, idle men as we are, if India is entirely ruined. It is not good to bear trouble for nothing."

Marwari : Listen to me, Sir, this is my simple policy. I do what brings me in a fair profit. I have derived good profit through the Vilayati. It is owing to Vilayati that our business is prospering. I know nothing of the wench Swadeshi. People may do as they like but I will have nothing to do with her.

Uttari : Brother, what should I do? I have neither money nor learning. I have only got strength, which can avail me nothing at present. In the worship of the Swadeshi goddess money is required which in my case is conspicuous by its absence. The country may be benefited in time to come, but whence am I to make up my losses at present. If I were to give up Swadeshi, how could I show my face in this world or the other? And if I were to abjure Vilayati and take to Swadeshi, where should I live and how? I am in that frame of mind (that is expressed by the couplet): "Unable to weep or sing, the Sah (trader) stands with his mouth wide open."

European soldiers and Indian ladies.

43. Referring to the alleged outrage committed by European soldiers upon certain Indian ladies travelling to Calcutta in a passenger train on the occasion of the Dasehra festival, the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th June, remarks that Government has made a great blunder in requiring soldiers to lead a single life. Nature must reassert herself and any effort to suppress her must result in a violent reaction.

RAHBAR, 28th June 1908.

V.—Legislation.

The two new Acts.

44. Referring to the Explosives and the Newspapers Acts, the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 21st June, remarks :—

RAHBAR, 21st June 1908.

"These two Acts extend not only to British territory but to Native States also, and Indians residing in foreign countries also cannot escape their effects. We are not against the acts but against the spirit which prompted them. We hold that Government has been led away by panic at this critical moment. Punish the offenders by all means, but be not actuated by a motive of retaliation: for this creates opposition and leads to further complications. Then again the Newspapers Act betrays the true feeling of the legislators and one cannot but say that their primary object is to stifle the freedom of the press. They hold that the mere fact of a notification having been affixed on the door of a press is sufficient to presume that due notice has been given to the managers thereof. Not only this, but full power is given to police to exercise its discretion in making raids upon houses where even one copy of a violent newspaper is supposed to exist. And every one knows how unscrupulous are the members of the police force in these respects. Again, the Act provides that an appeal against the order of a Magistrate should be filed within fifteen days. Pray where was the justification for this unreasonable haste ?

Well, if this had been all, it would have been welcome, for these Acts are directed only against papers of the Yugantar type. But there is a cause for anxiety to those papers also whose policy is to honestly criticise; for it is feared that Government wants only such papers to exist as are ready to say ditto to every proposal emanating from it. And no wonder that the Government wants this; for are not our own countrymen—the aristocracy of Bengal for example—anxious to put a limit to the freedom of the press.

But can all these measures save the present situation ? These measures are like iron sheets nailed to the mouth of a volcano, which, however, cannot prevent the flames from bursting out in spite of all obstacles. But Government will not listen to us. Let it therefore try."

OUDH AKHBAR, 3rd July 1908.

The Press Act.

45. Liberty, says the Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 3rd July, has always been associated with the British Government. But the inauguration of repressive measures leads one to think that Government has departed from its old policy. Englishmen in their wisdom thought it proper to bestow liberal education upon Indians, but now when Indians, as a natural result of that education, have begun to demand their rights and desire the emancipation of their race, the whole machinery of Government is set in motion to stifle their ambition and thwart their aspirations. Take for example this new measure—the Press Act. Mr. Gladstone found it impossible to give his support to this Act, when it was introduced for the first time by Lord Lytton. He therefore sent out a liberal Viceroy, Lord Ripon, to repeal it. But now a Liberal ministry sees no reason to withhold its assent from a measure calculated to effect the primary right of mankind, e.g. the freedom of speech.

However, we are glad that this new measure is directed for the present against those papers only that advocate violence and bloodshed. If one were to judge by the writings of the Anglo-Indian press, one would have thought that the whole Indian press was in danger of extinction, for a proposal was abroad that heavy cash security should be taken before allowing the publication of any paper. We therefore congratulate Government and ourselves, too, at the wisdom and prudence that has saved the present situation.

But as well-wishers of our Government, we wish to offer it a piece of advice:

"If you desire that political agitation in the country should cease to exist, apply yourself to removing the causes that have brought it into being, and if you want to secure the loyalty of the people, introduce administrative reforms and give up the policy of repression."

VI.—Railway.

AL BASHIR, 7th July 1908.

Railway collisions.

46. Referring to the frequent occurrences of accidents on railway lines, Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 7th July, remarks that railway travelling was formerly considered to be the best means of locomotion, but collisions have created a feeling of insecurity and danger in the minds of the public now.

The editor holds that the Ghaziabad and Fatehpur accidents are in a large measure due to the fact that Guards and Drivers were under the influence of liquor. Exemplary punishment should be meted out to the persons responsible for these disasters without the distinction of race and colour. He says that he has no confidence in the railway authorities. Government should therefore look to it that proper measures are adopted with a view to prevent a recurrence of such accidents in future. He specially recommends the appointment of a commission to inquire into the causes of these disasters, and says that measures should be taken to ensure the due representation of Indian officials.

The Seva Sadan.

ADVOCATE, 9th July 1908.

47. The following is an extract from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 9th July :—

"Some information has been published about the internal administration of this noble institution, which aims at creating sisters of mercy to be helpful in the solution of social, moral, economical, sanitary, medical, and educational problems. Those who wish to render sisterly service are welcome there. We are told that if they are lady graduates, or undergraduates already well trained, they can be enrolled as regular sisters, after a short period of probation with an honorarium of Rs. 50 a month for their maintenance besides free lodgings. Those who require training can be put in the way of obtaining it and given from Rs. 20 to Rs. 30 according to their needs, besides free lodgings. The Sadan wants specially those who wish to devote their lives to loving, self-sacrificing service. But it is open to other workers to bind themselves for a term at least equal to the period of their training paid for by the Sadan. There will be a Hindu section of the Sadan managed mainly by the sisters themselves and helped with funds and advice by a Hindu committee. There will be also a Parsi section and a Muhammadan section. In course of time it may be possible to have a large plot for the Sadan, whereon it is proposed to build three separate blocks for the residence of the most advanced, with a common room, where they can meet and exchange their experiences. The three sections will have representatives on the central council which will try to co-ordinate their activities, and help with grants-in-aid. Each section will be master of its own funds. Besides these, there will be lay sisters who can be supplied by the well-to-do classes. Such workers can do much good to the poor."

A devotee and a jester.

ANAND KADAMBINI, February 1908.

48. The Anand Kadambini (Mirzapur), for February (received on the 18th June), contains the following dialogue :—

Devotee : Victory to Raghavendra.

Jester : O, you rascal !

Devotee : What Guru ! ought I to have said "Victory to Ram Ji" ?

Jester : O, you son of a bastard ! O, you owl ! Where is Ram now ? Long long ago he betook himself to Guptar and passed away ! Was it not said of him that "he is the protector of the world and of religion" ?

Devotee : What then should I say "Victory to Shri Krishna" ?

Jester : O, you fool ! Where is Shri Krishna gone to ? He laid the foundation stone of the destruction of India by bringing about the Mahabharat (great war) and where he has disappeared no one knows ! If he who was addressed as the protector of cows and Brahmans were alive had such been the miserable condition of these two ?

Devotee : Should I then say "Victory to Shiva" ?

Jester : Shiva has been long non-existent. How can he be wished victory now ?

Devotee : Should I then say "Victory to Durga" ?

Jester : O, you dunce ! Had Durga, the dispeller of misery, been living, all would be well). Formerly when people could not see her face to face, they worshipped her in their swords. Now as to iron we have nothing left with us in which we might feel her presence except pins and nibs.

Devotee : Should I then say "Victory to Ganesh" ?

Jester : (With loud laughter) Ha, Ha, Ha. O, you blockhead ! Do you fall into this error by being told "Chandi and Ganesh (are to be worshipped) in the Iron Age." His steeds—rats—are at present destroyed by millions every day ; had he been existent would he not have objected ? And why should you be saying victory to this and that ? You simply stir up my anger by repeating that phrase again and again.

Devotee : Well, you yourself must declare what should I say ?

Jester : Yes, that is so ! well ! then say "Victory to the Lord Jesus Christ."

Devotee : Oh, Sir, how can you say that ? Have all our gods died that I should wish victory to Jesus ?

Jester : Hast thou any doubt about it ? Had even a single god among those thirty crores of gods survived, would such to-day have been the miserable condition of India ? And would the bulk of the Aryan race, having been disappointed at their hands, have worshipped the five pirs or other ghosts, spectres and evil spirits ? Then victory would be echoed to him only who really has it this day not only in India but throughout the world. Victory of the aforementioned Lord is heard and seen, to whom else should we then wish victory ?

(a)—Foreign.

1. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 14th July, referring to the recent alliances formed by England with France and Russia, remarks that these alliances will be of little avail in influencing Turkey to introduce the much desired reforms in Macedonia, for she will naturally form an alliance with Germany, Italy, and Austria, and thus be a match for the combined power of England, France, and Russia. The editor is of opinion that England, as the ruler of millions of Musalmans, would be safer if she were reverted to her old policy of friendship with Turkey, evacuated Egypt and did not harass Turkey about her Macedonian subjects.

The Triple Alliance.

OUDH AKHBAR, 14th July 1908.

2. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 14th July, referring to the speech of Mr. Keir Hardie in the House of Commons on the King's visit to Russia, remarks : " Our King's visit to a ruler in whose territories human blood is flowing so freely will, on reflection, prove morally inadvisable, but in view of the close relationship between the two sovereigns he cannot be blamed for it. The word 'atrocities' used by Mr. Keir Hardie in connection with the recent events in Russia is not too strong."

Russian atrocities.

MASHRIQ, 14th July 1908.

3. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 16th July, has the following :—

Unrest in Indo-China.

ADVOCATE, 16th July 1908.

" Ascribe it to Japan's victory over Russia, to ill-treatment of the East by the West or to spread of education among Asiatics—whatever you like—there is no gainsaying the fact that unrest exists from Yokohama to Pekin, from Pekin to Saigon, from Saigon to Calcutta, from Calcutta to Teheran, from Teheran to Cairo. It may not prevail among all classes, but it is surely and slowly filtering down and will in time permeate both classes and masses and leaven entire society. It is unfortunate that the expression takes the form of an anti-European feeling, but in no time it is expected to devote itself to advancing national interests in every land, provided the ephemeral expressions of the present times are allowed to quickly pass away. Tactful and not suspicious treatment is the way to prevent the deepening of the feeling of race-hatred in which the unrest has got its first expression. We are afraid as in some parts of India, in Assam, too, the rulers are more anxious to repress disorder than to conciliate the people in order to strike at the root cause of all disorder."

(b)—Home.

4. The Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 7th July, expresses its astonishment at the change in the policy of His Honour Sir John Hewett from one of sympathy with the people entrusted to his charge to one of repression as evidenced by the three sedition cases going on in these provinces. The editor hopes that these will be the last prosecutions of the kind in these provinces.

Sedition in the United Provinces.

BHARATBASI, 7th July 1908.

5. The Nasir-ul-Akhbar (Meerut), of the 20th June, referring to the letter of Sir B. Fuller to the Times, remarks that even the anarchists realize that the British Government is too strong for them to subvert. The discontent in India, the editor says, is due to the liberalizing influence of Western education, and as long as the popular demands are not acceded to, it will not die out. The Government should at this juncture disabuse its mind of all suspicions and set quietly to the work of reform.

The situation in India.

NASIR-UL-AKHBAR, 20th June 1908.

6. The Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 30th June (received on the 17th July), says that the poverty of the Indians is the chief cause of the discontent prevailing among them, and suggests that a Darbar should be held in which a proclamation should be made that measures will be adopted to remove the poverty of Indians and that their religious liberty will not be interfered with. Such a proclamation, the editor thinks, would reconcile the Indians and restore order and peace in the country.

The present unrest.

BHARATBASI, 30th June 1908.

SWARAJYA, 4th July 1908.

7. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 4th July, publishes an article headed "Disappointment and Hope", of which the following is a literal translation :—

"Disappointment and Hope."

"'We used to hear a good deal of the heart in our sides. But when the lancet was applied, only a drop of blood oozed out.'

Sir Harvey Adamson, when he introduced (into the Council) the new law (Bill) about the newspapers, remarked :—'If you frame a law with a certain object (in view) and do not take into consideration the underlying causes, you accomplish nothing.' It is undoubtedly true that nothing is accomplished (in this way). The framers of the law ought to have considered who would be affected by it. (Will it affect) those who shake with the fear of difficulties and run with deputations (to the Government) saying: 'Huzur and gharib-parwar'. Or those who hide the truth, put honesty under a bushel, bid adieu to moral courage and make treacherous and hypocritical professions of outward loyalty, feigned fidelity and false faithfulness; who, although they are full of poison, have yet fallen in the snare of enthralling others by their false and honeyed words. No, no. But this law will affect those worthy sons of mothers and fathers who have given up their lives being tired of existence in the midst of life, who have sacrified their lives, souls and property (at the altar of) their country's well-being; who have for ever cut themselves adrift from their relatives; who think themselves the living incarnations of such audacious (lit. line-breaking) warriors as Jai Mal, Putta, Pratab and Sivaji, whose memory will live for ever, and to whom the highest tribute that can be paid is to follow in their footsteps, to perform the holy and blessed ceremony of Johar and to be consumed with their relatives and riches and property as well in that fire which is worthy of worship.

Is it not more futile and foolish (lit. meaningless) to try to prevent such lion-hearted men, who are as anxious to embrace the goddess of death as a devoted lover who has suffered the pangs of separation from his beloved for years and is anxiously waiting for the day he will be united with her (in marriage), from performing their holy duties by such light laws than to try to bind a mad elephant with a wisp?

Can it not enter into the comprehension of these fools (lit. riddle-readers) who are taking out of the legal furnace such frail chains to fetter (restrain the ardour of) these hungry lions whose food is (who are used to) tyranny and death that if one press is confiscated another will replace it to perform the same duty? If the second, too, is confiscated, it will be replaced by a third. Will they succeed in checking the spread of patriotic ideas (lit. patriotism) by incarcerating such daring (ready to risk their lives) men, which they hope to do by confiscating presses? In our opinion there is one way of extinguishing the fire of patriotism and that is to hang at once any one claiming to be patriotic, and not only the man himself but all his friends, relatives and acquaintances should be hanged on different branches of the same tree, so that enthralled Indians may feel some joy in claiming to be patriotic, notwithstanding their being slaves, and that they may know that although the country is (by right) theirs, and although their ancestors ruled over it always, yet they are now somebody's slaves—not slaves purchased in the market; for no one has paid any price for 30 crores of Indians, but gratuitously obtained—and he who is their master has the right to make them work as he likes, to let them live as long as he likes, and to send them to hell whenever he likes.

In our opinion, in order to rule without the least apprehension it is necessary to put to the sword every liberal-minded, ambitious, aspiring, venturesome and daring Indian, without taking into consideration whether he is Zaid or Bakar [irrespective of caste and creed (?)] on the least display of moral courage or independence of mind, for according to the Satanic [British (?)] law, the greatest sin of enslaved Indians is to possess the qualities of the free races, and as long as these qualities are not effaced out of the Indians, it will be impossible for the creeper of tyranny and oppression of the foreign rulers to ever spread luxuriously and to bear fruit and flowers. After the bomb incident, when rumours were rife that a new law was to be put into the furnace (was to be framed) we hoped that a law would be framed by which persons imbued with the love of their country who desired to murder or who were trying or plotting to murder officials, or the divine angels, their white compatriots of the same rank; or even those persons whom the omniscient police might point out, would be, without any farce in a court or appeal to law, stoned

(to death) in the market place, or made food for English (vilayati) dogs, by having the lower halves of their bodies buried, so that others might take a lesson (from their fate) and no one might dare do the same again.

We thought that according to the new law regarding the press, not only would the publisher, editor and the printer of a paper, but also the compositors, copyists and pressmen and even their patriotic friends, acquaintances and relatives, be handed over to the Angel of Death, so that the seed of liberty might not be left in India, that Indians might for ever remain the slaves of their foreign gods and that they should never try to get rid of slavery—and we were prepared for these things.

But we were greatly surprised when we heard of this new law. Our heart became cold at once, and we felt sorry at our condition. Alas ! in what snares we are caught (we are caught in the snares of those) who neither know how to be kind and considerate, nor how to be tyrannous and oppressive, who neither know justice nor mercy. There is neither a limit to our misfortunte, nor to our good fortune. Sometimes a dagger is at our throats, and at another time water is put into our mouths to rouse us from our stupor. Would that we were subject to oppression, so that we could say—

'If it cannot remain in that condition, in this condition, too, it shall not remain.'

Would that we were ground like antimony, and were turned into dust by oppression and tyranny, so that we could hope to reach the sky (God) by the aid of the blasts of wind. Ah ! but now—

We live in the expectation of death.
But death does not visit us.
Alas ! There may be some one, whose hopes have been realized.
But this ancient sky has been of no use to us.
Ah ! what a fate is ours !
We desire death, but we only get sleep.
We go to drown ourselves but find the river shallow.
To trouble me, life is put into a dead body.
And the fish that are taken out of water run to bite me (?).

Some people may think this article to be the ravings of a mad man, but in this tyranny and oppression we see the hand of God visible, and behind this gathering of the clouds of oppression we see the hopeful rays of the brilliant sun of Swaraj. We know that tyranny lessens the power of the tyrant and enhances that of the oppressed. History teaches us the lesson that the nation which manfully puts up with tyranny and oppression, leaves a name in the world, and its memory is never lost, although it may have become extinct. So we say !

God grant thee long life, O, infidel idol (beauty).

May God bring about that day when thou shalt be able to oppress (to coquette and to flirt).

Brethren, do not be afraid of tyranny and oppression.

Remember that the more you are oppressed the greater will be our ability to maintain our (national) existence and our power of endurance.

Every rise has a fall and every ebb is succeeded by a flow. If our decline has reached its lowest stage, then our ascendency has begun. Do not be afraid, dismayed or discouraged. No one can act contrary to the divine law ; if we are going to rise (again) no one can prevent us from doing so. But if our decline has not as yet reached its last stage, we cannot tread in the path of progress. Do not interfere with the works of God ; do your duty manfully and in its performance do not care in the least for any human or satanic power. The law of God is superior to all, and in following it all other laws which are contrary (to its spirit) can be overlooked. God is our father, and we are his immortal sons, when He Himself saves us from national destruction [extinction (?)] the strongest power in the world [Britain (?)] will not be able to destroy and annihilate us.

Our mission is not only to place Mother Bharat (India) in the highest heaven of greatness and glory, but our holy mission is to make the proudest nation in the world [Britain (?)] prostrate its head at the holy feet of Mother Bharat (India). We may accomplish our object in one or two or four or thousand lives (transmigrations), and till we succeed in this, we must not be kept back from our holy efforts.

Before the success of their mission, true Indians will not accept salvation, even if it is offered to them. This is our last hope and with this hope in our hearts we live, with it we shall die, with it we shall come back into this world, and with it depart again from here, until the day comes when Mother Bharat's flag will be unfurled over the whole world and we shall hold by the ear the Pharohs of the proudest nation of the earth, make them prostrate themselves before Mother Bharat and then banish them for ever. Then shall our hearts have the desire to attain salvation by the cycle of transmigration, and on attaining it we will go to enjoy our heaven.

OUDH AKHBAR, 9th and 10th July 1908.

Causes of the present unrest.

8. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), in its issues of the 9th and 10th July, says that unrest in India is due to the following causes :—

1. Racial prejudice and partiality. In the opinion of Mr. Nevinson and of the editor, constitutional reform of whatever kind it may be, cannot remove the present discontent unless proper attention is paid to this question of race hatred.

2. Corruption in courts, on account of which poor men cannot get justice specially against their well-to-do brethren. In this connection the editor quotes the opinion of Mr. Nevinson in which he says that defects in the administration of justice are due to—

(a) the combination of the judicial and executive functions ;
(b) the inability of higher courts of judiciary to control the actions of courts subordinate to them ;
(c) the difference in the treatment of European and Indian British subjects ; and
(d) the corruption in the lower courts.

3. The régime of a highly corrupt police which weighs heavily upon the hearts of Indian subjects.

4. Prejudiced juries in cases in which Europeans are accused.

5. The oppression and ill-treatment of Indian subjects at the hands of Anglo-Indian officials.

6. The ever-recurring famine to prevent the disastrous consequences of which Government takes no steps.

7. The lack of compensation for persons who are proved innocent of charges brought against them.

8. The neglect of the legislators in not providing for the appointment of two presiding judges, an Indian and a European, to try cases of national importance.

9. The failure of Government to grant promised rights and privileges.

The editor concludes by saying that if these causes of irritation are removed, the present unrest will soon die away, for Indians do not want self-government : they simply want administrative reforms.

QULQUL, 10th July 1908.

The unrest in India.

9. The editor of the Qulqul (Bijnor), in the issue of the 10th July, while discussing the causes of the unrest in India, remarks that the frequent occurrence of collisions on Indian railways, and the attempts to minimize the number of persons killed or wounded in these accidents are bringing the Government into disrepute and the people are becoming suspicious of it. He further says that England's hold over India is a moral one, and that Englishmen make a mistake in believing that India was conquered by the sword and can be retained by the sword.

HINDUSTANI, 15th July 1908.

The present situation.

10. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 15th July, reproduces from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 9th July, an article headed "A Christian View of the Situation." (Vide paragraph 16, Selections No. 28.)

CITIZEN, 16th July 1908.

The causes of Indian unrest.

11. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 16th July, has the following :—

"A glance over the literature relating to the Unrest in India, which has recently appeared, reveals, according to the standpoints of the various writers, a vast variety of causes leading up to the present situation. These include (I do not pretend to give an exhaustive list) amongst others :—

1. Want of sympathy between the Governors and the governed : caused by (a) the cutting off from all contact with the people on the part of the high officials by the Government retiring to the hills for the greater part of the year; (b) the frequent transfers of officials from one district to another; (c) the cast-metal bureaucratism, which the machinery of Government has engendered; and (d) the deterioration of the average calibre of the Indian Civil Service, compared with what it was twenty-five years ago.

2. The general awakening of the people to life in response to the education they have been receiving and the natural desire on their part for a fuller life and a larger liberty, and a greater share in the government of their country than they now possess. This must be met in no stinted manner by a generous wish to meet the aspirations of the honest-minded people and the lines must be laid down for the sure and real development of self-government under the paramount power of the British Raj.

3. The Partition of Bengal and the manner in which it was accomplished by Lord Curzon. This was a very real grievance. Call it sentimental if you will, but it is sentiment which largely governs the world. The grievance may yet be remedied to a large extent by elevating the Bengals into a Governorship with a Council, when adjustments and modifications of the present arrangement may be made which will largely remove the grievances referred to.

4. The belief that the criminal laws are not equally administered as between Europeans and Indians. There has been a good deal to give rise to this feeling and it must be met and put right.

5. Obscure tyranny of the police has given rise to a good deal of the unrest. How is this to be cured?

6. The belief that the Currency policy of 1893 defrauded the peasantry of a large part of their savings in silver ornaments by depreciating their value. This 'The Statist' believes to be the cause of a good deal of the unrest amongst the common people.

7. And of course there is the unrest which has been fostered by a certain section of the newspaper press.

The foregoing is by no means put forward as an exhaustive list of the causes of the present unrest. The causes are of a very complex nature. But they must be faced and fairly met. The recent declaration of Lord Minto that he would, while putting down lawlessness with a firm hand, help on the honest aspirations of the people to their full share in the government of the country is the right spirit for the hour. But it will require all the wisdom and courage and knowledge of strong British statesmanship to meet and solve the crisis with which it is confronted in India at the present moment. Happily the resources of British statesmanship are by no means exhausted, and when the people of India are convinced that Britain will give a hearty response to their honest aspirations and will fulfil them, there will be no more loyal-hearted subjects of the King-Emperor than the sons of his Indian Empire."

12. The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 16th July, while criticising the article in Saturday's issue of the Pioneer under the marginally noted heading, makes the following observations:— ADVOCATE, 16th July 1908.

The political situation and its palliatives.

"It is not race antipathy in Bengal which is responsible for the unrest, but the feeling that even admitted wrongs are not to be righted in India for fear lest an impression might be created in the people that their persistent agitation can influence administration one way or the other. We decline to believe that there is any general feeling of animosity against the Englishman as such, and think that the publicist who deliberately tells the English public that there can be no alleviation in race antagonism till the disappearance of one side from the country, only provokes the anger of the powerful against the weak. There is little disaffection in the country, but a deeper discontent and dissatisfaction. The Pioneer and its correspondent have no better palliative to offer for the removal of these feelings than a historical primer for school children setting forth in accurate and unvarnished fashion the history of British rule in India, what it is, what it has done, and what it seeks to do. This will be a valuable reader and a welcome addition to the school course, but is this the only palliative which the Pioneer has to offer to the law-abiding, well-disposed, poorer middle classes who find all avenues of livelihood closed, to the poor labourer who even with wages treble what he was earning twenty years ago cannot get two full meals, to the person who has suffered ill-treatment at the hands of the dominant class and has had no redress, or to the person who has seen grave miscarriage of justice in trials in which he was opposed to the European? How is the Englishman vested with power to be brought in touch with the feelings and wishes of the people whom he has been called upon to rule? How are the people to be convinced that England is ruling India in the latter's interests in spite of the presence of excise duty on our manufactured articles against the united protest of Europeans and Indians? The Pioneer ought to have the frankness to admit that these problems require a better palliative than a historical reader. Palliatives there are many, from the Indian point of view. For fifty conspirators there are millions in the country by the side of law and order and the best way to check the influence of the terrorist and the conspirator is that the people should not be allowed to be dissatisfied and discontented. This can be done, if only heed is paid to what people, whose loyalty to constituted authority and patriotism to the best interests of the country, is manifest, have to say about the ills they suffer from and if the obstacles which prevent the progress of Indians are removed."

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 16th July 1908.

The present situation.

13. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 16th July, while condemning the agitation in Bengal, remarks that its sole object is to drive the English out of India, but this can never be realized, as India is in an undeveloped state, its industries have not yet been organized, its people are still uncivilized and are divided among themselves. Under such circumstances it would be eminently foolish to dream of driving the British out of India. The Government should keep a strict watch on the press and prevent the influx of seditious leaflets into the country from Europe and America. Frequent prosecutions of newspapers are not useful as the people begin to sympathize with journalists in trouble. In conclusion, he quotes a passage from an article by Lord Milner in a recent issue of the Empire Review, and refutes his conclusions about India, remarking that there is very little sedition in the country.

ANAND, 2nd July 1908.

Birthday Honours and the Calcutta anarchists.

14. Referring to the Birthday Honours list, the Anand (Lucknow), of the 2nd July (received on the 16th idem), remarks that if the misguided bomb-throwing youths of Bengal had been discharged with a severe rebuke, this act of grace on the King's birthday would have left indelible marks of gratitude upon the hearts of all Indians.

ANAND, 2nd July 1908.

The Calcutta conspiracy.

15. Referring to Narendra Nath Goshain's disclosures in connection with the Calcutta conspiracy, the Anand (Lucknow), of the 2nd July (received on the 16th idem), says that it is quite possible that considerations of self-preservation may have induced the approver to exaggerate matters in his statement; and that this being the case, if innocent people are suspected of having dealings with the anarchists, it will only add to the already existing discontent.

ABHYUDAYA, 10th July 1908.

Indian members of the Viceroy's Council.

16. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 10th July, says that Government should pay no held to the objections raised by the Pioneer, the organ of the Indian Civil Service, to the appointment of Indians to the Executive Council of the Viceroy and expresses a hope, in the interests of the rulers and ruled alike, that Lord Morley and Lord Minto, in accordance with their liberal instincts and the proclamation of 1858 will give a practical proof of the liberal principles of the British Government by the appointment of Indians to the Viceregal Council.

MASHRIQ, 14th July 1908.

Council reform.

17. The editor of the Mashriq (Gorakhpur), in the issue of the 14th July, referring to the rumour that the Secretary of State is about to consider the question of the reform of Indian Councils, remarks that although he does not advocate racial representation, yet when special concession was made in favour of Musalmans, four seats only should not have been allotted to them, as four members will be able to do very little for their community. He further says that the Council of Notables will prove a failure, unless chiefs of the type of the Maharaja of Baroda and the Tikka Sahib of Nabha are admitted into it.

In conclusion, he says that the number of official and non-official members in Councils should be the same.

18. Referring to the recent debate in the House of Lords on the Indian situation, the Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 8th July, remarks that neither Liberals nor Conservatives take any real interest in the affairs of India and that they espouse the cause of Indians only to play their cards against each other for the aggrandizement of their respective parties.

Lord Morley and Lord Curzon.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 8th July 1908.

19. Referring to the notes of dissent raised by certain members of the Indian Civil Service during Lord Morley's speech at the Indian Civil Service dinner, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 10th July, writes :—

Indian Civil Service.

ABHYUDAYA, 10th July 1908.

"No truthful man can deny that a large section of Indians has become estranged and alienated from several authorities, particularly from members of the Indian Civil Service, owing to their pride of race and haughtiness. The Indian Civil Service should bear in mind that it exists for India and not India for it. It is our conviction that if the present powers of the Civil Service are not curtailed, if it continues to put obstacles in the way of the introduction of reforms in the administration of the country and if it continues to despise educated and respectable Indians, the estrangement and alienation of which Lord Morley complains, will be increased all the more. Liberal-minded Civil Servants ought to see that their brethren treat Indians with greater sympathy and respect and that they consider Indian affairs from the stand-points of Indians. Such a course will improve the administration of the country and eradicate all ill-feeling between the rulers and the ruled."

20. Under the heading "Did Macaulay Make a Mistake?" the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 12th July, says that on all sides one hears the cry that the educational policy of the Government is responsible for the present unrest in India. It is no doubt true that the present "unrest" in India, whatever it may mean, is confined mostly to the educated middle class.

Education and the present unrest.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 12th July 1908.

He says 'the artificial atmosphere created by a system which is quite exotic has been weaning the educated classes from their natural sympathy with the general mass of the people. The result is that whereas the Government is trying for the general amelioration of the country and is desirous of granting such institutions and privileges as are suited to the needs of the country as a whole, the educated classes are clamouring for privileges as of right, just in the same way as a few brilliant boys in any particular form in a school may go in for prizes as a reward for being particularly clever. It is therefore, suggested, that this situation is the direct outcome of a system of education which was transplanted from a country where the especial needs of the people had made it suitable and successful, to a country which from before was highly civilized and which for all practical purposes had an indigenous system of education of its own and did not require that this should be supplanted by a system from outside. Lord Macaulay in 1833 was responsible for introducing the English system of education in India. The question is whether he really made a mistake in advocating his theories.'

He then refers to the paper contributed by Revd. C. F. Andrews, M.A., of Delhi on the 'Future of Indian Education' to the current number of the Modern Review and observes, 'with the inauguration of the educational system in India in 1833, was the seed sown of national aspiration and the desire for social and moral freedom and political freedom was to follow in time. The contact of principles and ideas is now coming into force and prominence; and the future resultant for the human race will depend more on the quality and character of the Indian contribution of thought. The mistake, if there was any, was not in the inception or beginning of the thing in the way it was done, but in the continuance of the system after a certain time. The vernacular must be the vehicle of education up to a certain stage for mass education. For higher education, English must continue to be the vehicle and instrument, of course, with an eye to the assimilation of purely national ideals from Eastern thought and culture with whatever is the best and purest in foreign systems. "The New Spirit that is now abroad is correcting and destroying the evil and is producing a younger generation, more earnest, less mercenary, more patriotic." But this spirit needs guidance; and herein lies the great failure of the present system. It is not bad, because the vehicle is English. It is defective because the spirit of the pure English system is not in it. What is needed is that Indian teaching should be as frankly patriotic in its tone and character in India as English teaching is in England.'

INDIAN PEOPLE, 12th July 1908.

The measure of loyalty.

21. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 12th July, asks what special significance is to be attached to the resolutions and letters that are being addressed to the Government expressing horror at the terrorist conspiracy and the use of infernal machines? It is not to be assumed, he supposes, that those who do not openly condemn the conspiracy approve of it. Neither is anybody's support necessary for any measures that may be taken to stamp out the plot.

He says that except those who are actually engaged in such a conspiracy, the rest of the community must of necessity condemn it and no meetings or formal declarations are needed to prove it. The knife or the bullet finds the victim selected, the bomb makes no such distinction. It is not a matter of loyalty at all, but of self-protection. There is no apprehension of the thin-blooded and slow-witted landed nobility being implicated in the conspiracy. Nor is their support of any preventive or punitive measures of the slightest value. To set them up as the natural leaders of the people and to constitute them as the most influential body in the country is a mistake that must be recognized soon or late. They may fill the Legislative Councils or they may adorn the Council of Notables, but they will count no more than now in the public life of the country. Wealth has its responsibilities and its power, but it plays the least important part in moulding the thoughts of a people and guiding their aspirations.

The steady tendency of the Administration, the editor says, is to eliminate as far as possible the educated classes from all spheres of influence, simply because their power is growing in the country. In the eyes of the Extremist Anglo-Indian papers education is only another name for disloyalty.

He concludes by saying that the loyalty of the aristocracy in India is not in jeopardy. Neither however are the educated classes on the point of creating a general revolution. Some desperate characters have organized a conspiracy, but the community is not affected by it. No one demands that terrorism should influence in the least degree the policy of the Government. On the other hand, the persistent error of treating the educated classes as disaffected or hostile must be abandoned and a more rational attitude must be adopted towards them.

MUSAFIR, 15th July 1908.

Subramania Siva and Chidambaram Pillay.

22. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 15th July, expresses its regret at the heavy punishments inflicted on Subramania Siva and Chidambaram Pillay, the two accused in the Tuticorin riot case, and remarks :—

"We reserve the discussion of the charges against these two patriots for a future occasion, but we cannot refrain from suggesting to our kind but imprudent rulers, that in the East it has been always customary for Time to subvert a ruling race, which has treated its subject races savagely and harshly. At this juncture, it was advisable for both England and India that the rulers should have had recourse to a policy of love and kindness instead of one of oppression and tyranny. But now, when the rulers turn a deaf ear to our advice, we have no reason to warn them again and again, and to get kicked for it. Time is itself a teacher; it reforms demoralized men. But in our opinion it is more prudent to reform one's self before being rudely roused (lit. kicked) by Time. We give this advice to our rulers in a friendly spirit. It is for them to act upon it or to ignore it."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 16th July 1908.

Sedition in newspapers.

23. Referring to the conditions under which, like other free countries, a public newspaper press was established in India, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 16th July, says that the liberty of the press implies an effective safeguard of the public peace, and a wholesome check on the irregularities of the administration. But when newspapers exceed their legitimate functions, they cannot complain if the law ceases to help them. To take advantage of a newspaper to promote feelings of hatred against the Government, to preach openly, or by inuendo, the subversion of British rule, is clearly not what the public press is meant for. Those who wish to overthrow the Government, or to create general hostility to it, ought to employ other methods and leave newspapers alone. The law that makes the existence of newspapers possible cannot be endangered by them. So long as mere wild or hysterical writing passed for sedition, there was a general feeling that the letter of the law was being unduly strained, but it becomes a very different thing when we find that behind the violent language employed by a number of newspapers there is a section of the community prepared to resort to violence. The only apprehension is that in attempting to deal with an admitted danger, the Government may curb the real liberty of the press, so that the freedom of public criticism should cease to be what it is. Such an intention is denied, but any general law must affect all alike, and it will be difficult to distinguish between newspapers which foment sedition and others which discharge the legitimate functions of a public press.

The story of a deportation.

24. Reviewing Lala Lajpat Rai's account of his deportation, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 16th July, remarks that it is a record of how a Government served by unscrupulous informers, is led into committing blunders that rob it of a prestige of which it is so jealous. From a perusal of the book, one rises with the conviction that a terrible blunder was committed by the Government. The editor hopes that the advice given to his countrymen by Lala Lajpat Rai will be carefully cherished by them.

SWARAJYA, 4th July 1908.

"A Lesson from the Law of Nature."

25. An anonymous correspondent who signs himself "BEDIL" (disheartened), contributes an article headed "A Lesson from the Law of Nature" to the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 4th July, of which the following is an abstract :—

"God has made all men equal and has given them equal opportunities. The existing social relations between man and man have been created by ourselves. Everything that man does in this world, he does for his own good, and so it is not probable that he would make himself subject to social obligations that would mean death to him.

There is not a single man in the world who will allow another to rifle his pocket before he is dead. The people of India fall in the latter category. But although their finer perceptions have been deadened by centuries of slavery, yet still by the grace of God, there are some outward influences which have instilled into their minds the desire for Swaraj. This is the sign of a new and vigorous life.

History teaches us that nations decline through moral delinquencies and when they are in this sad plight other unscrupulous nations usurp their birthright. But when down-trodden nations become aware of their natural rights and strive manfully to recover them, no one can retain them in slavery any longer. Individuals sacrifice their lives at the national altar. The tyrant thinks that by decapitating patriots, he can crush out the national consciousness, but he does not know that the blood of the martyrs is never lost. The jails in which they are incarcerated become temples, and the places where they are hanged become altars sacred to the goddess of liberty.

National consciousness has now dawned in India, and the young men of India have become alive to a sense of their duties. They dislike a mendacious and begging policy and advocate self-reliance and self-respect. The day will dawn very soon when a temple to the goddess of liberty will be raised in every village and she will be worshipped in every home. To push back the waves of liberty is beyond human power, but to put a shoulder to its wheel is according to the law of nature. History, itself, is witness to this fact.

To raise a temple to the goddess of liberty is the duty of the young men of India. Lovers of liberty do not care whether a thing is practical or not. To make the foundation strong it is necessary to put pounded limestone into it. Young men should allow themselves to be pounded like limestone by the tyrants and thus make the foundation of liberty stronger. They do not care what the tyrants call them, for when two nations, besides being governors and governed, are also oppressors and oppressed, their interests are never identical. If the oppressed party gains an inch of ground, the other loses it. Those who are struggling to regain their rights, will always be an eyesore to their opponents and will be called rebels, Extremists and traitors, but an Italian patriot has said "you can be a traitor only when you act treacherously towards the National Government. Traitors are in reality those who do everything for their self-aggrandizement and want to keep others in thraldom.

INDIA OFFICE LIBRARY & RECORDS

The desire of governing others is so overpowering, that however wise or liberal a man may be, his conscience gets blunted and he finds excuses for his misdoings. He becomes a hypocrite, and when the time of trial comes, he proves a dismal failure.

To take the fate of others into one's hands, and to make them dance like puppets, is raising a satanic standard (of revolt) against God. By raising this standard, man may succeed for a time, but the end is bitter, for God hurls a tyrant down from the greatest height, so that others may take a lesson from his fate. Where are the mighty empires of Persia, Greece, Egypt and Rome? The ruins of Babylon are loudly saying "Hear, O misguided tyrants, there was a day when our proud domes and turrets defied the sky, people were awed by seeing them, but where are they? In our fallen and lowly state we have seen many empires rise and fall, take care and repent of what you have done, otherwise you will be destroyed like us.

From time immemorial, we have seen that pride has always a fall, and meekness and humility are always respected and flourish.

O! devotees of Swaraj, if you are endowed with perception, you should be ready to sacrifice yourself in the service of your country. The soil of India is known for its fertility, may not the seed of liberty when once sown, take root and flourish luxuriantly? And when there shall be thirty crores of Indians ready to sacrifice themselves for their country, then there will be no necessity to demand Swaraj: it will come to you of its own accord, liberty will be your slave, the distinction of colour will be swept away, and you will not be subject to any one, nor will there be any one to rule over you."

SWARAJYA, 4th July 1908.

An ode.

26. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 4th July, publishes a political ode by one Gobind of Meerut, of which the following is a translation :—

"They frame new laws daily, but rajas seldom trouble their subjects.
We do not complain of you to any one else.
And neither do we care (anything) about speaking to you (?).
They may or may not refrain from tyranny; it does not concern us.
Why do we not foster union among our countrymen?
This is the time to give an impetus to arts and industries.
Valuable time should not be lost in this way.
It is an act of blasphemy for us to bow to any one.
We do not bow to any one but Bharat.
You can ventilate your grievances in public.
True men are never ashamed to face others.
You should simply fulfill the promises of the Queen.
We have no other quarrel with you."

SWARAJYA, 4th July 1908.

An ode.

27. Ram Das Ram, the editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), contributes a political ode to the issue of the 4th July, of which the following is a translation :—

"Brave men are not afraid of afflictions.
They do not writhe (with agony) when dying on the scaffold.
They are killed, they are trampled down, they are exiled.
Oh! What do they not accomplish who die for their country?
You shall be destroyed if you continue this oppression.
Rulers never prosper if they are tyrannous.
From eternity we have relied on our own power, so never beg (anything) of foreigners.
They are inflicting punishments on us without any fault.
And still they claim that they are not doing anything objectionable.
Notwithstanding this tyranny and oppression we [you (?)] expect fidelity.
Such a [tyrannous (?)] face never deserves hulwa (sweetmeats).
We do not complain of oppression, we (simply) want justice.
We resign (ourselves) to the will (of God) and do not complain.
We would find enjoyment in the tyranny and oppression of the foreigners.
We are Ram, we do not care for ease (or comfort)."

SAHIFA, 12th July 1908.

Lord MacDonnell.

28. The Sahifa (Bijnor), of the 12th July, referring to the rumour that Lord MacDonnell will succeed Lord Minto as Viceroy, remarks that this appointment will be highly inadvisable, as Lord MacDonnell is responsible for creating discord between the Hindus and Musalmans of the United Provinces, that he is too self-willed to work harmoniously with his colleagues and subordinates, and that there is a grave danger that the Curzon-Kitchner controversy may recur in a more chronic form.

Indians in Canada.

29. The following is an extract from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 16th July :— ADVOCATE, 16th July 1908.

"Mr. King's mission has been a success. He practically induced the Liberal Ministry in England to agree to a measure of restriction that will mean practical non-admission of any more Indians into Canada. It is stipulated that each Asiatic immigrant shall possess £40 or Rs. 600 on landing in any Canadian port, unless coming from a country with which Canada has got some special arrangement or as to which special statutory regulations exist. Indians are the only people who are not covered by the exceptions. How nice a method of providing against an Indian invasion of the Dominion!"

Mr. Tilak.

30. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 4th July, referring to the meetings held at different places to express sympathy with Mr. Tilak, remarks :— SWARAJYA, 4th July 1908.

"By the arrest of the Maharaj (Mr. Tilak) the national spirit has experienced a rude shock, and we fear that if tyrannous officials oppress him any further, we must prepare to witness [face (?)] a dangerous peril."

The Urdu-i-Mualla.

31. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 12th July, referring to the prosecution of Fazl-ul-Hasan Hasrat Mohani, B.A., editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla (Aligarh), for sedition, remarks that although he does not deserve much sympathy, yet he should have been accorded the same generous treatment as the editors of the Cawnpore Gazette and the Swarájya, who were warned in the first instance. NAIYAR-I-A ZAM, 12th July 1908.

Sedition trials.

32. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 12th July, has the following :— ADVOCATE, 12th July 1908.

"During the week four sedition cases in different parts of the country were disposed of. In the Tinnevelly case both accused, Chidambaram Pillay and Subramania Siva, have been convicted of sedition and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment; Chidambaram Pillay has been convicted on two counts and sentenced to transportation of life on both charges. The sentences must necessarily run concurrently, as they could not run consecutively without the Judge being sure of Chidambaram Pillay's re-birth within his jurisdiction. Subramania Siva, who has been transported for ten years, has received lesser punishment, because he was considered to be a mere tool in the hands of Chidambaram Pillay who was an influential resident of Tinnevelly, manager of the Swadeshi Steam Navigation Co., and promoter of the Swadeshi Emporium. The notes of the speech on which he has been convicted, were taken by a Police Inspector against whose evidence several witnesses were produced by the defence who were present in the meeting and who deposed that they had not heard anything seditious from his lips. Since two fellow-citizens of Chidambaram Pillay, his own caste men who were assessors, believed the evidence of the prosecution and declared him guilty, it is not fair for people sitting at a distance of hundreds of miles to say that Chidambaram Pillay owes his troubles to the jealousy roused by him in the European managers of the old Steamer Company. But even after admitting that Chidambaram Pillay was wrong in using seditious words, and in exciting popular hatred against Englishmen, which led to serious rioting, we cannot but say that the sentence of transportation for life is quite out of proportion for the offence committed by him. It is shocking to send a man to jail for life for his uttering a few words of excitement. The sentence will rouse popular sympathy with Chidambaram Pillay, thereby defeating the object of the trial.

In the Kal sedition case, the Parsi Judge of the Bombay High Court has shown much consideration towards Mr. Paranjpe, from which it appears Mr. Paranjpe's promise to conduct himself better in future had a desirable effect. The fact that the majority of jurors declared that the editor of Kal was actuated in his writings with patriotic motives, proves that Mr. Paranjpe's speech went a great way to assure the jurors that he was merely a victim of over-zeal.

The fourth conviction was obtained at Allahabad. In our opinion the District Magistrate of Allahabad has inflicted a severe punishment on Babu Shanti Narain and did not take into consideration the status and influence of Mr. Shanti Narain. The Swarájya is not an old paper; it has no influence in the country; few people outside Allahabad know of its existence. Shanti Narain himself is a resident of Muzaffarnagar and a stranger to Allahabad. According to his own evidence, the paper had not a larger number of subscribers at Allahabad than 13 or 14. The tone of the paper was mischievous and venomous, but its writings had not caused, and were not likely to cause in the near future, any breach of the peace. Hence four years' imprisonment is out of proportion to the offence committed by him. Shanti Narain cannot pay a fine of Rs. 1,000 and has no influential persons on his back to pay for him. In our opinion a year or six months' imprisonment would have met the ends of justice. Shanti Narain's misfortunes are, however, not without some lessons to Extremist young men. When Shanti Narain was brought to hear the sentence, the Court was practically empty; there were few men in Allahabad to sympathise with him in his troubles. The Swarájya of 4th July expresses its gratefulness for sympathy received and legal help freely given. The legal help was limited to Babu Parshotam Das Tandan, M.A., LLB., a promising member of the Allahabad Bar. We did not hear of any of those persons coming to the editor's help, at whose instance the Swarájya did not hesitate, since its coming into existence, to bring old political workers into disrepute. This shows how far the Swarájya represented Allahabad public opinion, and how preposterous were the assertions of a few young men there, that the whole of Allahabad was at their back. Let us hope that on appeal, the sentence will be materially reduced and the incident which cannot but have been as unpleasant to the Government as humiliating to the Press of these provinces, will have its salutary effect on younger men of the way of thinking of the Swarájya, namely that the best way to spend their energy lies in doing what many of them have been doing for the last few months in quiet philanthropic and educational work."

34. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 16th July, makes the following suggestions about the treatment of journalists accused of sedition :—

"(1) They should be granted some compensation for the trouble they have undergone, if the charges brought against them fall through.
(2) Bail should not be generally refused.
(3) If they are sentenced to imprisonment, it should be simple, for they are not thieves or dacoits."

On this small income they had to support their families. The Government was very generous in allaying the sufferings of the people in famine-stricken areas, but it paid very little attention to the Bijnor district. The Collector is very strict in realizing the arrears of revenue; household goods have been attached and warrants of arrest issued against delinquents. As a result, several zamindars have left their homes in fear of the tahsil chaprasis, who are dogging their steps to arrest them; and so they are unable to cultivate their lands, although the rainy season has set in.

In conclusion, they say that they do not want the revenue to be entirely remitted; they would be content if its collection were postponed for some time.

42. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 12th July, has the following:—

The Swadeshi movement.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 12th July 1908.

"In Bengal and East Bengal the Swadeshi movement and boycott appeared together, in fact, the boycott preceded the other. The method might be open to objection, perhaps it was not 'honest' Swadeshi but the results have been remarkable. Of course the whole thing began in bitterness, in a frenzy of anger. The character of the people had been entirely misread. There was a firm conviction that the Bengalis could do nothing more than hold indignation meetings. It was forgotten that everything depends upon the feelings, and the more deeply they are moved the more unexpected is the result. The boycott was action, not speech, and it galvanized all Bengal. The Swadeshi movement may be dissociated from boycott, which has not spread to other provinces but it ultimately comes to the same thing. There must be a determination not to use foreign articles even at some discomfort and sacrifice. That is essential to the development of the Swadeshi movement. It is boycott though divested of its more truculent features, such as picketing and canvassing and using gentle moral persuasion upon others. The most powerful argument in India is social ostracism, and this has been used in Bengal to bring stray sheep back to the fold. The Swadeshi movement has made the greatest progress in Bengal, part of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies and the Punjab. It is scarcely known in these provinces, though it has a warm supporter in the Lieutenant Governor. Now, if the Swadeshi movement grows steadily and people resolutely decide to use nothing that is not made in India, a rigorous and general boycott must follow, and the effect upon England especially must be disastrous. The Bengal boycott has not been very successful so far because Indian industries have languished and local needs cannot be locally supplied. If the spirit of the boycott continues, this will disappear in time and everything will be found in the country. Suppose now in the course of the next ten years the imports from Europe fall off considerably and the trade with Manchester reaches the point of extinction, because the output of cotton goods in India is growing enormously and the determination to use Swadeshi cotton stuff is almost universal. Will then any distinction be made between honest and dishonest Swadeshi, and will not Manchester demand that the produce of its mills should be forced upon India as opium was forced on China ? This is, however, a distant contingency, but there is very little doubt that the development of Indian industries and the rapid growth of the Swadeshi movement will not be looked upon with favour by the English manufacturer and trader."

"It has been our settled conviction that all experiments performed and improvements achieved in Indian agriculture and in farms and colleges are so much waste of energy and money as long as the descriptions are confined in reports, monograms and even the Agricultural Ledger. Villagers and peasant-proprietors must be practically shown the methods, made to pursue them in their own fields, if necessary on payment of the cost thereof, if their good be the end and aim of the department of Agriculture, Imperial and Provincial. He also invites the attention of the British Indian Association, and says that if the Association approaches Government, it may feel inclined to take the estate under the Court of Wards, at least with a view to seeing whether it is possible to pay off its debts. An experienced officer placed in temporary charge of the property might be able to furnish the Government with a report on the matter.

The Press Act.

48. The Qulqul (Bijnor), of the 3rd July, referring to the new Press law, remarks :—"The dreaded Press law has been passed and the newspapers have been left to the tender mercy of the murderous district officers. The law has been passed with undue haste, but as it is professedly of a temporary character, and it is hoped that it will be repealed in the near future, just as Lala Lajpat Rai and Ajit Singh were released, otherwise it will become an instrument of torture in the hands of the district officers. The Anglo-Indian Press is mainly responsible for this hard and stringent measure, and it is suspected that some Government officials have started the agitation in the Anglo-Indian Press.

The Government has displayed a ludicrous weakness in framing this law; the number of the disaffected was quite insignificant, and it should not have been magnified to such an extent.

There is a grave danger that this measure will strengthen the 'despotic' Government of the district officers, and on the least displeasure they will prosecute journalists and confiscate their presses.

So now the life of an Indian newspaper is more frail than that of a bubble, and its existence depends upon the sweet will of the district officer."

The new Press Act.

49. The following is an extract from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 16th July :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 16th July 1908.

"The question that Sir Henry Cotton asked about the application of the new Press Act might seem improper, but the same question is being asked here constantly. He wanted to know whether the new law would be applied impartially to Anglo-Indian as well as Indian newspapers. Mr. Rees at once rushed to the rescue of the Government and indignantly asked whether it was in order under cover of a question to impute to the Government of India and its servants racial prejudice and injustice. The speaker raised a laugh at the expense of Mr. Rees by saying grimly that the Government is always fair game. In the abstract, of course, the administration of the law is impartial, but the law as between the Indian and European is not evenly balanced even in the Statute book. The Ilbert Act gives advantages to British born European subjects which are denied to Indians. An Anglo-Indian newspaper may be incapable of sedition, but certainly not of attempting to create race hatred. What notice, for example, was taken of the Asian, which advised Mr. Kingsford to shoot at sight every Indian who approached him? The new law had not then come into existence, but surely the paper could have been warned for incitement to murder. The effect would have been excellent and Anglo-Indian papers would have learned to keep within bounds."

VI.—Railway.

Third class passengers.

50. A correspondent in the Bháratbási (Allahabad), of the 7th July, invites the attention of the Government to the various grievances of third class passengers, arising from the overcrowding of passengers in third class carriages, unusual delay in issuing tickets to third class passengers, delay in admitting them to the railway platform, illegal charges by coolies and the ill-treatment of passengers by inexperienced boy ticket collectors. The editor requests Government to take early steps to remove them. BHARATBASI, 7th July 1908.

Railway accidents.

51. The Qulqul (Bijnor), of the 29th May, received on the 11th July, referring to the frequent occurrence of accidents on Indian railways, suggests that on the occurrence of an accident the District Magistrate or some other public officer should be deputed to make thorough inquiries and to help newspaper reporters to get a detailed account of the affair. The editor points out that accidents cannot be prevented as long as railway lines are not doubled. He notes that Russia is doubling the lines of the Siberian Railway. QULQUL, 29th May 1908.

Railway collisions.

52. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 10th July, says that it is high time that Government directed its attention to the defects in the railway administration of the country which have of late led to numerous railway collisions, resulting in appalling loss of human life. The editor suggests the desirability of a commission being appointed to inquire into these defects. As an improvement on the present railway system, the editor suggests that railway lines should be doubled, that capable men on reasonably big salaries should be appointed, and that less work should be taken from them and that a number of empty or goods carriages should be attached between the engine and the first passenger carriage. He urges that a trial should be given to the apparatus invented by Manick Chand of Benares for the prevention of the loss of life in railway collisions, and if the experiment proves successful, the apparatus ABHYUDAYA, 10th July 1908.

should be used on all railway lines. He agrees with Lala Lajpat Rai in an organization being formed to watch the working of railways on behalf of the people and to take proper steps for the improvement of the railway administration.

The Badri Narayan temple.

54. The Garhwáli (Dehra Dun), for June (received on the 15th July), remarks:—"It was hoped that Government would make up the loss entailed on the Badri Narayan temple through the prohibition of pilgrims to go there, but instead of this being the case, it is now rumoured that Government have proposed to lay a fresh imposition on the temple for the repairing of roads." The editor remarks that it will be an undue severity on the Rawal of the temple if Government adopts such a course, especially so in view of the fact that it has already taken an adequate number of villages from the landed property of the temple for the upkeep of roads, hospitals and bridges.

ADVOCATE, 16th July 1908.

The Shia-Sunni dispute.

55. Referring to the Shia-Sunni disputes in Lucknow, the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 16th July, remarks:—

"We think in the interests of the city, strong measures should be taken to prevent one party from being offensive to the other. It is the duty of the State to see that no action of any community hurts the feelings of another and that there is no outbreak of quarrelsome vindictiveness and that no community is allowed to annoy another by innovations or recitations of defamatory verses. If a committee has to be appointed, there should be no delay in the matter. The ultimate responsibility lies on the executive which should not shrink from taking strong action for fear of being misunderstood by one or the other party."

1. While pointing out to the reforms introduced by Japan in the organization of her military forces, the Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 24th July, remarks that Asia looks with satisfaction on the military progress of Japan and presumes that when she has thoroughly equipped herself she will not fail to challenge the West.

Causes of discontent in India—1907-08.

2. The editor of the Al Bashir (Etawah), in a series of articles published in the issues of the 8th, 16th, 23rd and 30th June and the 7th, 14th and 21st July, discusses the causes of the unrest in the country during 1907-08. The following is a brief summary of the articles :—

AL BASHIR, 8th, 16th, 23rd and 30th June, and the 7th, 14th and 21st July 1908.

(1) While pointing out the various attempts made by the English, the Anglo-Indians and the Hindus to explain the causes which led to the existing discontent in India, the editor regrets the indifference and apathy of the Muhammadans in taking any lively interest in the present state of affairs.

He is of opinion that his co-religionists, as a separate unit of the Indian nationality, ought to take up this question seriously; partly to defend themselves against the invidious attacks of the Hindus and to protect their own interests and partly to prevent Government from being so credulous and indiscriminate as to be led by false arguments and explanations into framing laws which equally affect the interests of both the Hindus and the Muhammadans, especially as the latter have hitherto scrupulously avoided the contagion of seditious ideas and have honourably maintained their reputation for loyalty to Government.

(2) As maintained by some persons, the unsympathetic treatment of Indians by the present generation of Anglo-Indians cannot be the chief cause of this discontent. For if we were to compare the attitude of the present day Anglo-Indians with that of Messrs. Jackson, Plowden, Webster and many others who came to India just after the Mutiny, it would appear how very considerate, mild and sympathetic Anglo-Indians of the present day are towards Indians.

The deportation of some prominent leaders or public men of India cannot also be maintained as the root-cause of the existing unrest in the country, when we consider the persecution of the Wahabis just after the Mutiny which was much more cruel and indiscriminate than the sufferings of the persons deported for creating the present political and chaotic state of affairs in India. Anglo-Indians of the present day, however, have more regard for law in their treatment of Indians, and the slightest sign of unsympathetic conduct on their part towards Indians forms the subject of a series of questions to the Secretary of State by the friends of India at home.

Another reason of this unrest in India, as urged by some Hindus, is that Indians have been excluded from all well paid ministerial offices. But this view cannot be accepted for a moment when we compare the present statistics of the distribution of Government posts between Indians and Anglo-Indians with those of former days. It cannot also be maintained, as urged by some Hindu journalists, that the excessive drain on the Indian Exchequer is the root-cause of the discontent and the reason for the abject poverty of the country.

(3) The strongest and the most plausible reason urged as a cause of discontent in India is said to be the partition of Bengal. But it is by no means the only and the first partition of a province in this country.

There were many partitions before this, such as—

(i) the annexation of Sindh to the Bombay Presidency;

(ii) the transferring of the Dehli, Gurgaun, Karnal and other districts to the Panjab Government after the Mutiny;

(iii) the annexation of Bundelkhand and Garhwal to the United Provinces; and

(iv) the adding of Behar to Bengal.

But none of the uncalled for and vexatious distributions and partitions of those areas ever excited the slightest discontent or clamour among Indians.

Lord Curzon did not only divide Bengal into two provinces, but he also made a similar partition on the frontier to the great inconvenience and disadvantage of its Muhammadan population. The reason why the whole country rose up against the partition of Bengal and not at the partition of other areas was that the former mostly affected the interests of the Hindus while the latter simply meant ruin for the Muhammadans only.

The discontent in India dates prior to the partition of Bengal, although it may be said that the partition, as an immediate cause, provided a fresh and strong outlet to the pent up feelings of unrest that were already struggling to burst out.

The opinion of the English and the Anglo-Indian press that seditious publications and the unrestrained freedom of the press in India have been the chief cause in spreading the existing discontent among Indians and bringing into existence the Extremist party is, the editor thinks, an erroneous one.

He points out that Khudi Ram of the Muzaffarpur tragedy has been very cunning in admitting his guilt and in saying that he was prompted to such an outrageous and brutal deed by the articles of the Yugantar. His confession was simply meant to mislead Government and to put a stop to further inquiries into the real causes of unrest, that are entirely different from what have hitherto been described, as there is still a sufficient number of persons in this country with disaffected and seditious proclivities whose sole object is to drive the English out of the country at all hazards.

The editor is also of opinion that the gagging of the press by the Government would not be as useful as a thorough inquiry into the real causes of the discontent in India.

(4) He admits that the absolute poverty of Indians and the abnormal famine prices of foodstuffs have created a sort of panic and distress more or less among all classes of people in this country, but it cannot be maintained that this poverty has in any way been the cause of discontent. The community mostly affected with indigence is the Muhammadan, the artizans and the working classes of the country who are and have invariably been the most loyal subjects of the Government. They have but little interest in political matters and have nothing to do with diabolical conspiracies or agitation.

The chief centre of discontent is among the educated classes of the Hindus or among those who are under the influence of these classes, and it is to be sought among those who deliver exciting speeches, who write seditious articles, who pass resolutions of indignation, who travel in foreign countries to learn how to manufacture bombs, who take part in agitations, who encourage students in such matters by awarding medals, who form societies in every district and who advocate the continuance of the agitation.

It cannot be the work of the heterogenous masses of illiterate people. It is the work of the educated classes no matter whether you call them by the name of Extremists or Moderates, the Arya Samajist or the Sanatan Dharmis. They are all to a man responsible for the present state of affairs in this country.

It cannot be maintained that these people have grown poor, for a comparison of their condition with that of the Muhammadans will prove that they are in a much better position than their Musalman brethren.

(5) He then traces the gradual downfall of the Muhammadan power in India and the systematic encroachment of the East India Company. He also tries to prove the strong faith and trust of his co-religionists in the English and the time-serving and treacherous policy of the Hindus. He also points out that the unfortunate Black Hole tragedy was the work of one Nanak Chand, who plotted to ruin his master Siraj-ud-daula, to discredit him in the eyes of the English.

(6) After this he cites various historical incidents to show that the Hindus were never disinterested in any of the policies they adopted and refers to their religious mythology which teaches them to be loyal and submissive to those in power only. He points out that the custom among Indian Princes of giving their daughters in marriage to Muhammadan Kings and foreign invaders was only a time-serving trick of making professions of loyalty and friendship, as they always tried to overthrow their kings whenever they could get an opportunity.

(7) He then demonstrates that the main cause of the downfall of the Muhammadan rule in India was not, as it is said by many, the so-called religious intolerance and bigotry of Aurangzeb, but the incompetence and degeneration of his successors. Another reason assigned for this decline of the Muhammadan rule is the unprejudiced treatment of the Hindus by Akbar who gave them high ministerial offices in his Government. The natural result of this access of the Hindus to the higher offices in the Muhammadan Government was that they lost all respect for the ruling nation and became insolent.

He next alludes to the treacherous conduct of the Maharattas and the kind and sympathetic treatment accorded to them by their Muhammadan rulers.

He finally sketches the life of Sivaji and gives an account of his treacherous conduct towards the Muhammadan rulers of his time and shows how the Maharattas rose to power during the Muhammadan rule.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, July 1908.

"The Unrest in India."

3. The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for July, contains an article headed "The Unrest in India" by the Rev. R. Burges of Jubbulpore:—"That an unrest is now felt," he says, "no one will deny. That it has been exaggerated, especially in cables to London papers, is generally admitted. But no greater mistake can be made than to conclude that unrest prevails in India. The vast mass of the population—men and women—tend the soil from dawn to dark all round the year. Political problems do not trouble them in the least degree. Unrest exists, but it does not prevail."

He ascribes this skin-deep unrest to the educated class, a large percentage of which has its eye on Government billets, but fails to secure them. "They are usually the men," he says, "who stir up the mud. They lead the unlettered village people astray; as travelling lecturers they harangue school boys into frenzied disobedience, and speak in a score of languages by means of perhaps 400 newspapers, and over 400 periodicals. These are the Extremists who use the privilege of free speech for seditious purposes."

He admits that there are many level-headed men who are thankful for the blessings conferred on India by the British and who know full well that "India would be an arena of unspeakable courage if the Union Jack were hauled down." But even these men seem to be disaffected. "Why, then, this unrest," he significantly asks, "among the best of the best of our Indian People?" He answers this question by saying "at the time of the Indian Mutiny, India was in her teens, she is now in the period of adolescence. She is realizing herself. She is now in the state of transition from girlhood to womanhood. She is taking to heart the great lesson of the Christian West as to the intrinsic preciousness of each individual of the race alike in the eye of God and the eyes of the State. She will, therefore, follow the gleam to yet fuller life and light."

He proposes the following remedies for allaying the unrest:—

(1) That British officers, civil and military, should cultivate their religious instincts. Indians are deeply religious and when they see their rulers live as men without religion, they are mystified. Queen Victoria's Proclamation does not ask them to be indifferent to religion. There are, of course, honourable exceptions like Sir A. Fraser, but "nevertheless the moral and spiritual degeneracy of our British superiors is a by-word in the Empire."

(2) They should be urged to cultivate sympathy and must be more accessible to Indians. Indians want to meet them socially, but their advances are not reciprocated, and they give up the task hopelessly. This wicked caste prejudice should be given up. The King-Emperor should use his influence to bring the personal equation back into Indian administration.

(3) Attempts should be made to foster patriotism in Indian children—

(a) India ought to have a flag of its own and school children should be taught to distinguish it from others.

(b) In every school, police station, railway station, &c., a board should be hung on which the Queen's Proclamation should be displayed.

(c) Missionaries should have greater sympathy with the political aspirations of India, as the Christian religion, in the final analysis, is the chief cause of the present unrest, as it teaches men their individual worth. Besides this Indian politicians at this stage require a good deal of counsel and advice, and it is the absence of such counsel that has allowed them to drift into political absurdities of the character of Swaraj, &c.

In conclusion, he says, that the people of India are displaying keen brain power, patience, perseverence and remarkable moral qualities and so they ought to have a larger share in the building of the empire. When more responsibility is laid upon them, they will prove themselves worthy of the trust.

The present discontent.

4. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 15th July, publishes an article by Haji Ismail Khan Sahib, of Datauli, in which he ascribes the present discontent in India to an idea lately generated in the minds of educated Indians that they are superior to Europeans in every respect. This, he thinks, is the result of the smattering of Western education which they have received. He advises them to realize their insignificance, to reform their society, to develope their industries and above all things to have confidence in the English, and to cultivate friendly relations with them.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, July 1908.

"The Ethics of Passive Resistance."

5. The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for July, contains an article entitled "The Ethics of Passive Resistance" by Mr. M. S. Maurice:—

The writer draws his inspiration from authorities sacred and secular, from writers ancient and modern, and bases his conclusions on such examples as were set by Jesus and St. Stephen. He refers to Socrates and Plato, to Christ and to modern reformers. Going further back to antiquity he finds Confucius indicating in his moral code the dividing line between active disobedience and passive resistance in simple and homely words. Tolstoy, Victor Hugo, Thoreau and Macaulay are all quoted to illustrate the principles of "Passive Resistance." "Laws are said to be made for the safety, the security and the protection of the interests of the people: they are not made to chastise and oppress." They must be guided by reason, necessity, expediency, but withal in the interests of all. They must not remorselessly over-ride the domain of reason and conscience. They must act with justice and circumspection. Under any form of government, power is relegated to a group of men to judge in righteousness and to rule with equity and justice. It does not follow that because men are called to power and preference, and are invested with authority to enact and enforce laws, they must be considered immaculate or infallible. Too often the best men, the most human, the most just, the most practical, the most considerate remain subject, and do not become rulers or framers of laws for their fellowmen. Similarly, too, often those who attain to power are inconsiderate, tyrannical and unjust. While human institutions will continue to remain imperfect, while mankind will be liable to err, men of strong conscience and rational ideas must of necessity adopt modes of expressing their protest against what they think are the severities of law. "Passive resistance," as a political weapon and as a moral factor has therefore the fullest possible justification behind it. "To offer physical force against recognized authority which seeks to enforce any law, good or bad, would be morally wrong. When one seeks to resist the law, not actively, but passively, one simply implies thereby that what is good and just law to some may under circumstances be bad to others. If proof were needed," says the writer, "it will be found ready to hand from almost every country and from every age. To take a recent case in point from a nation in the front rank, I would cite the passive resistance offered by a large section of highly educated persons in England against the last Education Act. Here we have a form of government which has undergone a purifying process during centuries of civilization—a government which by common admission, has reached almost the highest limit of advanced democracy, in which power is attained by a just and equitable process—by sheer force of intellect and reason—a government which bears on the face of it every element of moral right and expediency. Yet we see a law promulgated apparently in the best interests of the whole community, but which proves in its operation directly antagonistic to, and unacceptable by, a large intelligent and otherwise obedient section of that community. Numerous laws are in operation to which it gives willing and unquestioned obedience, but owing to reasons which have swayed humanity in all ages, it finds that its conscience revolts against the new measure. The new enactment caused a serious conflict in their minds; it warred against their sense of right. They therefore simply declined to do the law's bidding and accepted the consequent penalties."

"Passive resistance", the writer continues, "is indeed an extreme course with an honest man; he is generally driven to that course by the stress of physical power, and hence his action is not unjustifiable on moral grounds." England has in the past taken the lead in the efforts of men to break down the divine right of kings. It has in modern times shown the potentialities of passive resistance. If passive resistance becomes an imperative necessity to men under the constitutional government of England, "passive resistance of subjects, who are not even legal units of a lawful or legally constituted government, has all the more reason for its action, in a given case, since such government cannot justly impose burdens or restrictions on units which had no voice in its creation."

Preparation for the future.

6. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 11th July, has the following under the heading "Preparation":— SWARAJYA, 11th July 1908.

"We have so long been down-trodden and trampled that all the requisite elements of freedom have departed from us and we have become extremely timid and cowardly. If the English were to leave the country to-day, the result would be that some other power would subjugate us, or the more virile and warlike races would gain the mastery and rule over us according to their own sweet will. So it is necessary that we should get rid of this temerity and faint-heartedness.

The long sentences of imprisonment inflicted on us and the bludgeons of the police are teaching us a useful lesson and preparing us for the day of trial. We shall have to make some preparations in order to reach our goal, and we should not be disheartened by our sufferings. The power to endure physical pain is much more valuable than success in university examinations, and as a result a hardy Afghan commands more respect than a Khan Bahadur.

'Dear countrymen, if you want to change the course of your national history, have a heart in your breasts and strength in your arms. Endure and even welcome all the oppressions and tyrannies wrought upon you like the diligent and clever student who puts up with scolding, thrashing, and caning from his teacher in order to master a difficult lesson.'"

INDIAN PEOPLE, 23rd July 1908.

The new spirit.

7. The following is an extract from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 23rd July, from an article under the marginally noted heading :—"The yearning after a great ideal (regeneration of India through self-help and education of masses) degenerated into a blind hatred of the ruling race. Rationally considered, India would remain to-day a subject country whether the English had been here or not. Internecine strife had exhausted the power of self-government. India was neither united nor strong. Any strong and resolute foreigner would have taken possession of the country. The French and the Dutch were here to dispute the possession of India with England. The prize fell to the last as the most capable. The idea of absolute independence of course implies that the English must leave the country, but before hating the Feringhee must we not become worthier ourselves, men in the true sense of the word, with the light of coming liberty in our eyes? There has been an access of impotent passion instead of a noble devotion, and some of the wilder spirits have introduced a form of crime from which India was free through the centuries. It may be that these are extravagances which will subside, that a great idea is not born without considerable travail, in which the lives of men are as nothing, but why should these extravagances assume the very form which are most likely to impede the growth of the race? There is one definite stage at which the course of thought has been switched on to a new line, but it was a change in the venue of thinking whereas the country has been quite suddenly plunged into the stern reality of a physical struggle."

SWARAJYA, 11th July 1908.

Repression.

8. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 11th July, referring to a statement by Lord Morley that his policy was not one of pure repression, remarks :—

"On the one hand the people of India are on the verge of death owing to (continued) oppression and tyranny, and on the other hand, the Secretary of State is desirous of torturing them still further. Every day we see the houses of our respectable countrymen searched and they are made to work in jails for months simply on suspicion.

In judicial cases between white men and black, justice has been reduced to a farce. In fact you wrought upon us all the tyranny and oppression in your power; if your greed has not been yet allayed, you are welcome to gratify it. Let no craving of yours remain unsatisfied; we on our part desire this.

You may oppress us, you may tyrannize over us, you may never look at us with the glance of affection.

We charge you in the name of God not to spare us."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 19th July 1908.

House searches.

9. Referring to indiscriminate house searches in Bengal, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 19th July, makes the following observations :—

"We have been repeatedly drawing the attention of the Government in these columns to the harm that may be done, and that is being done, by indiscriminate searches, by the uncalled for attention of the police, and by groundless suspicions. We fully realize the difficulty of the men who have to drive the administrative machinery and we know also that they make an effort to keep friction at its minimum. But high officials must remember that their orders may be, and are, exceeded, and that what they do may be undone by unscrupulous underlings; that their attitude may be all that is desirable, but the men in the lower ranks are all the same, converting friends into foes. We earnestly request the Government to keep a watchful eye on these men and not to let their zeal outrun their discretion. Every law-abiding and peaceful citizen, every staunch Congressman, every man who has the good and the progress of the country at heart is always willing and ready to help in the smooth running of the administrative machinery, but nobody would expect them to move their little finger if their dearly cherished wishes are thwarted and if their susceptibilities are wounded. The plough of India cannot go straight if you yoke to it a number of unscrupulous boobies."

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 24th July 1908.

The bomb conspiracy.

10. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 24th July, condemns the practice of bomb-throwing by young Bengalis, inasmuch as it endangers the peace, life and safety of the whole country and can do no good to its inhabitants.

11. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 15th July, referring to the attempts that are being made in England to get the partition of Bengal repealed, advises the London Branch of the Moslem League to be on the alert and to assure the Home Government that the Musalmans are in favour of the partition, and are willing to render all the assistance they can to the Government in this connection.

The partition of Bengal.

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 15th July 1908.

12. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 17th July, writes:—"While Indians have received with gratification the general remarks made by Lord Morley in the course of his speech in the House of Lords on the 30th June in reply to Lord Curzon's criticism of the present Indian administration, they have been grieved at his remarks about the partition of Bengal, for they are quite contrary to the fundamental principle of the Government to act in accordance with the wishes of the people. It is a gross injustice, as well as a misapprehension, to take the constitutional agitation of the people to be a means of employment of pressure upon the Government. Such an interpretation of their constitutional agitation can only mean that they should not make any representations to the Government for their rights and for the removal of their grievances. But we cannot believe that Lord Morley wants such a thing, for otherwise there can be no means in the hands of the people for the attainment of their legitimate rights. The Congress has expressed the opinion of the entire country upon the partition of Bengal, and it is the duty of the Government to accept it. It has no connection with threats or with the employment of pressure. The most effective means of inspiring true loyalty in the hearts of the people is not to adopt any measure that is directly against their wishes and if the Government happens to commit any such mistake, it should rectify it as soon as the people show any signs of dissatisfaction."

ABHYUDAYA, 17th July 1908.

13. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 16th July, while reviewing the present situation, advises the Government to accede to the wishes of the Bengalis as it would neither lower its prestige nor make it insecure; otherwise the Bengalis may become exasperated, and the Government may find itself in a worse predicament. At such a juncture it should take a lesson from the history of France and America [its independence (?)]. If the Government thinks that the Bengalis are not fit for self-government, it might allow them self-government in Bengal as a tentative and provisional measure, and if they do not prove themselves worthy of it, Government could revert to its old system.

The Government and the people.

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 16th July 1908.

In a subsequent note the editor referring to this article, advises Indians to propitiate European officials and try to cultivate friendly relations with them.

14. The following is an extract from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 23rd July:—

The duty of the Government.

INDIAN PEOPLE 23rd July 1908.

"The Government may be satisfied that the whole country is at its back in the endeavour to eradicate the terrorist conspiracy. It is a greater menace to the community than to the State. The loyal professions of Maharajas and municipalities are superfluous, for the people of India have no admiration for the dynamiter. What has to be done, is to draw a line between the possible suspect and the man who is above suspicion. It would be an evil day for the country if all classes of people were to become the harbourers of conspirators and arms, or were engaged in dangerous correspondence. That would be a prelude indeed to a revolution. It is because the country, as a whole, is absolutely quiet and people are engaged in peaceful professions that we have so often and so emphatically protested against the unwisdom and danger of treating every one as a suspect. When a house is searched and nothing is found, is not the information of the police clearly at fault? Or, it may be, everything of a suspicious character may be removed before the search is made. But a man whose house is searched with or without reason will not be the same that he was before the search. Is it desirable that the number of disaffected men should multiply indefinitely because of a mistaken zeal in the search for incriminating things? Further, it is perfectly well understood that the suppression of one or more conspiracies is not the final solution of the problem in India. It is no use merely declaring that the administration must be progressive. It must be so in reality and in conformity with the growing aspirations of the country. Perpetual progress is conceivable, but perpetual friction must bring matters to a deadlock."

SWARAJYA, 11th July 1908.

"How can we become loyal?"

15. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 11th July, has the following under the heading "How can we become loyal?":—

"Now-a-days when grand preparations are being made to crush sedition, and attempts are being made in all parts of the country to stamp out seditious ideas, we think it advisable to enlighten the public as to the nature of loyalty and tell them the means by which a man may become loyal—

(1) by saluting respectfully all sahibs when at a distance;
(2) by singing day and night (the praises of) tyrannous officials;
(3) by engaging in the praise and exaltation of the British Government and by thanking the police always;
(4) by refraining from speaking of the poverty and other sufferings of India;
(5) by believing in the rule of the white officials and in our own perpetual slavery;
(6) by submitting to all orders of the officials without the least objection;
(7) by refraining from criticising the actions of the white officials in the press or on the platform;
(8) by obeying all the orders of the officials blindly, just as innocent infants swallow poisons and antidotes given them by their parents;
(9) by refraining from attending political meetings and from shouting Bande Mataram;
(10) by thinking and acknowledging yourself to be slaves instead of subjects;
(11) by leaving India at the mercy of white officials, and by banishing from our hearts all anxieties about India;
(12) by remaining eternally, till the day of judgment, the obedient and docile slaves of the white officials;

Any one who disobeys these orders is a rebel, and deserves death."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 19th July 1908.

The loyalty of Aligarh.

16. The following is from the Indian People, (Allahabad), of the 19th July:—

"As a setoff to the two sedition cases and the house searches at Aligarh, a combined meeting of Hindus and Muhammadans from several districts was held in that important city to pass the usual loyal resolutions. We have had municipal loyalty, talukdari loyalty, and loyalty of sorts, but this is combined loyalty and consequently very gratifying. It is expected that if these people assert themselves, the noisy and dangerous agitators will not be able to do much mischief. In fact, it will be a case of loyalty against disloyalty so that the public feeling will be held in equipoise. People as a rule, newspaper writers not excepted, have very short memories, otherwise they would recollect that what is happening now has happened before and means nothing. There was a time when the Congress was looked upon as a disloyal, or at least, suspicious body, and the Patriotic League was formed in these provinces to oppose and crush the Congress. The sequel may be generally remembered. All these meetings that are being held to condemn the terrorist plot and to profess loyalty are not the signs of an active movement at all. They are inspired either by fear or the desire to stand well with the authorities. If certain men are implicated in a conspiracy, is it necessary for others to proclaim from the house tops and in the market place that they have no connection with it? If a man commits a crime, is the whole neighbourhood to be suspected? This is precisely what has happened. Practically the whole country, if not the entire population, is suspected of complicity in the conspiracy. Houses have been searched in every province. The Punjab had hitherto escaped, but houses have now been searched there also. Those who have held loyalist meetings, or vowed their detestation of the terrorist plot, are they themselves above suspicion? If an informer, or a common cooly, were to go and tell the police that one of the most prominent men at the Aligarh meetings is a friend of Hoti Lal, his house would be searched at once. Who were the men whose houses were searched at Aligarh and Agra and of what were they suspected? So long as it is not certain who may be a suspect and who is above suspicion, all are in the same boat."

ZUL QARNAIN, 21st July 1908.

Loyalty in Bengal.

17. The Zul Qárnain (Budaun), of the 21st July, notes with satisfaction the expressions of loyalty in the Bengal Legislative Council by Messrs. J. C. Ghose and Gajadhar Prasad, and hopes that these gentlemen are sincere in their assertions.

18. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 21st July, referring to the speeches of two Hindu members (Messrs. J. C. Ghose and Gajadhar Prasad) in the Bengal Legislative Council, assuring the Government of their loyalty and disavowing the actions of the anarchists, remarks that if such words had been spoken by some Musalman leader the whole Hindu press would have called him a traitor, a coward, a flatterer and one who wanted to stir up feelings of hatred between Hindus and Musalmans. The Honourable gentlemen have repeated what the Musalman leaders have been impressing upon the Government for the last 25 years, and it is to be seen what welcome they receive at the hands of the Hindu press.

Expressions of loyalty.

AL BASHIR, 21st July 1908.

19. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 22nd July, referring to the loyalty meeting recently held in Aligarh, remarks that mere professions of loyalty are of little use, so these gentlemen should try to impress upon the Government that it should remove the causes of the prevailing discontent, and thus make the existence of the empire more secure and stable. The editor further remarks that they would find it rather hard to hunt down anarchism in these provinces, as there are no anarchists here.

Loyalty meeting at Aligarh.

HINDUSTANI, 22nd July 1908.

20. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 17th July, apprehends serious resistance on the part of the Anglo-Indian Defence Association to the introduction of the proposed reforms and warns Lord Morley and Lord Minto against yielding to its alleged objections, for the improvement or otherwise of the present situation, for a great deal depends upon these reforms.

The proposed reforms and the Anglo-Indian Defence Association.

ABHYUDAYA, 17th July 1908.

The editor refutes the argument brought forward by certain Anglo-Indian newspapers that reforms are made in obedience to the pressure of Indian agitation and remarks that Lord Morley intends to make these reforms, not in consequence of any pressure, but because he takes it to be his duty to do so, and that the reform party in India has done nothing which may be construed into any kind of pressure, and that those who favour violence and unconstitutional methods do not want these reforms.

India Council.

21. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 19th July, has the following :—

ADVOCATE, 19th July 1908.

"The appointment of officers fresh from India to the Council of the Secretary of State, and particularly of two Indians, has created the impression that the modernising of this body formerly consisting of sun-dried bureaucrats and old fossils is a fait accompli. It may be so in the matter of the membership. But this has in no way made the Secretary of State less arbitrary. Questions can only be discussed by the members when put before them, but they have no power of taking the initiative. In all differences of opinion, the Secretary's decision prevails, except in controlling expenditure in which he has to have the opinion of the majority. All the same it is a fact, that orders involving large expenditure may be given by the Secretary of State without either the consent or the knowledge of the Council. In dealing with questions affecting the relations of the Government with Foreign Powers, making war or peace, prescribing the policy to be followed towards Native States, and, generally, in matters in which secrecy is necessary, the Secretary of State acts on his own authority alone. Such questions as an Afghan war, negotiations with Russia and the Amir of Kabul regarding the affairs of Afghanistan or the annexation of Burma, do not come before the Council. Its members have not only no power of interference, but they have no recognized means of obtaining information in regard to such subjects other than those of the general public. Is such a Council worth keeping, and at a cost awfully disproportionate to the control that it may exercise on the Secretary of State ? The arguments against its abolition have not lost their force a whit on account of the recent appointments."

Indians abroad.

22. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 19th July, has the following :—

ADVOCATE, 19th July 1908.

"It is now a patent fact that everywhere in British Colonies the Indian is an undesirable, no matter whether he be a trader or an agriculturist or a common labourer. The great problem is where is he to go ? The plain answer is for him to come back home and for intending sojourners not to step out of India. But is it possible to shut a people within the four corners of its country in these days of international communication and facility for travel afforded by civilization ? We must take our stand on the rights of British citizenship granted us by Statutes of Parliament and the Queen's gracious Proclamation, though both Parliament and its mouthpiece, the Secretary of State in England, and the Government on the spot have so long kept us out of those rights by executive decisions and legislative enactments that go counter to the wishes of Parliament and of the late Queen. If England had given no such promise, we might content ourselves with the cold comfort that as a subject nation we had no claim to privileges enjoyed by what are known as British-born subjects. But while we may be pluming ourselves of this theoretical right, the colonies are taking every step to increase our difficulties and practically closing their doors against us. The situation has grown simply irritating, giving rise to impotent rage. Here is one of the causes of unrest among Indians which the Imperial Government can alone remove. All forms of protest on the part of Indians have practically proved a failure."

Indians in Mauritius.

23. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 22nd July, publishes a letter from a young man who was entrapped to Mauritius and who subsequently effected his escape from the place with the help of a military officer, and remarks that the Government should send a commission to Mauritius to report on the treatment of Indian coolies and to introduce necessary reforms there.

HINDUSTANI, 22nd July 1908.

Punishments.

25. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 11th July, referring to the arrest of Mr. Tilak and several other journalists for sedition, remarks that they did not stir up sedition and are not responsible for the widespread discontent in the country. The editor attributes it to the high-handed policy of the Government and its officials.

In conclusion he says :—

"What will be the result of this cruelty and this tyranny and oppression, and what effect will these unconstitutional (lit. law-murdering) actions of yours have on the people ? You can judge for yourselves, for the present discontent is the outcome of such actions and the unwarrantable (lit. black) acts of the white people are driving the people into the ranks of the rebels. The respect that is accorded to public opinion is not hidden from any one (is known to all) for it is the opinion of an enthralled nation—consisting of unpurchased slaves, for whom no price has been paid, but who have been ensnared by you, through trickery (fraud) ; so you are entitled to treat them just as you like. But remember this, if you treat them well, you will remain unmolested (árám sé), but it will be impossible for you to remain unmolested (árám sé) (while following) your policy of tyranny and oppression."

ABHYUDAYA, 17th July 1908.

The story of a deportation.

26. Reviewing Lala Lajpat Rai's account of his deportation, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 17th July, remarks that a perusal of this book will show Lord Morley and Lord Minto how they were deceived by the Secret Police and the enemies of Lala Lajpat Rai, and how far the reports sent to them about the treatment accorded to him were true.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, July 1908.

Sir H. Adamson's "Separation Scheme."

27. The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for July, publishes the details of an interview with Mr. R. C. Dutt, C.I.E., by Mr. Alfred Nundy, Barrister-at-law, about the separation of the judicial and executive functions. Mr. Dutt cordially acknowledged that in Lord Morley the Indian people have a kind and sympathetic friend, who had their real welfare at heart. Taking a broad view of the circumstances of the country and of the feeling of resentment and unrest which was the outcome of the later years of Lord Curzon's rule, and judging Lord Morley from the standpoint as to whether any other Secretary of State would have been more sympathetic towards India, it would be unfair to him to say that he had been weighed and found wanting. While other Secretaries of State gave expression to their desire for the reform of the administration of justice in a few sympathetic words, Lord Morley has brought this subject within the range of practical politics. But the Secretary of State can only give general instructions that evils in the administration should be removed, he can hardly be expected to furnish the details of any scheme that is to form the subject of legislation. This scheme must necessarily be prepared by men on the spot.

In Sir H. Adamson's proposals, no doubt, an advance has been made in the direction of the separation of the judicial and executive functions; but this advance, it is admitted, is "cautious" and "tentative," due to the apprehension of the official opinion in India. If the scheme is to be freed from its present defects and converted into a substantial measure of reform, its criticisms should be addressed to an authority which is above the narrow prejudices, which hamper the opinion and actions of subordinate officials. In Lord Minto, India has a Viceroy who presents a remarkable contrast to his predecessor. He has to a very great extent an open mind on current Indian politics and has not only allowed a scheme of reform to be introduced, but what is more satisfactory, he has not in any way committed himself, that it was final, in so far that no modification or extension of it from a popular point of view would be permitted. Mr. Dutt warmly acknowledges the fact that Lord Minto is a ruler who has a warm and sympathetic heart and if approached in a proper manner is likely to respond to the representations made by the people. He condemns the futile policy of trying by force to compel the Government to introduce reforms and thinks that an appeal preferred in a constitutional manner would be more useful.

Mr. Dutt does not think the proposal of introducing the scheme in Bengal, as an experiment, advisable. It would mean that a tribute has been paid to force as against the more sober and milder methods of constitutional agitation, as Bengal has been very noisy and troublesome to the Government in demanding reforms, when compared with other provinces which agitated on constitutional lines. Besides, in Bengal the press is a power and any grave miscarriage of justice could be easily brought to the notice of the Government by this agency, which is nearly impossible in other provinces. Mr. Dutt does not agree with Sir H. Adamson when he says that there is a greater interference by the District Magistrates with police functions in Bengal than in other provinces.

Taking these facts into consideration, he thinks that the scheme should be tried in all the regulation provinces. With regard to the heavy expenditure that would be entailed by this experiment, Mr. Dutt thinks that it should be tried in certain districts only of all these provinces.

He further says that for the purpose of a real and effectual separation of the judicial and executive functions, it is essential that the Magistrates should have nothing to do with any executive authority, but be placed under the control of the District and Sessions Judge and the High Court, as are the members of the Subordinate Judicial Service at the present time in the regulation provinces. The District Magistrate must cease to exercise any judicial functions, original or appellate, and the Deputy Magistrate must be removed from his supervision and control and placed under the Sessions Judge. Deputy Collectors should be entirely distinct from Deputy Magistrates and that the former should be recruited by the executive authorities and should begin and end their careers in revenue and executive work, while the latter should be recruited by the High Court and should similarly begin and end their careers in criminal and judicial work, as the Munsifs in Bengal begin and end their careers in civil judicial work. In that case Munsifs and Deputy Magistrates should be subordinate to Sessions Judges and the High Court, and Deputy Collectors could be under the district officers and the Commissioner. All three services should be recruited mainly by competition, with due regard to educational qualifications, and should begin on about the same pay, and as far as possible prospects should be the same. The practice of recruiting men in the revenue provincial service from the ranks of tahsildars and ministerial officers is not one calculated to secure the best men for the higher service.

INDIA OFFICE LIBRARY & RECORDS

Mr. Dutt thinks that the District Magistrate should not be allowed to retain any jurisdiction, original or revisional, in bad livelihood cases, which are very frequently dangerous instruments of oppression. In his opinion, the experiment of consigning these cases to the Judicial Magistracy is well worth trying. In the end, he congratulates Lord Minto and Sir H. Adamson in introducing this scheme, which, although it is complicated and not farreaching in its scope, yet it is a recognition of the principle that there should be a complete separation between the judicial and executive functions. He hopes that any representations made by the people as to the details of the scheme, that are likely to improve it, will receive a patient hearing.

HINDUSTANI, 22nd July 1908.

Mr. Tilak.

28. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 22nd July, expresses its sympathy with Mr. Tilak in his misfortune, and remarks that the articles on which his prosecution is based are not seditious, although they may to some extent be objectionable and bitter in tone. Mr. Tilak commands the sympathy of all his countrymen as the jury which is going to try him consists mainly of foreigners who cannot understand Mahratti.

The Lucknow Municipality.

29. The Anand (Lucknow), of the 16th July, complains of the bad conditions of lanes and streets in Lucknow, which have become a source of danger to traffic owing to the rainy season. The editor also invites the attention of the municipality to the accumulation of refuse behind the Kalidevi temple and to certain lanes in the Chowk being not at all well lighted.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 19th July 1908.

Allahabad Roads.

30. The following is an extract from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 19th July :—

"In connection with the arrangements made for the convenience of pilgrims during the Magh Mela at Allahabad, we took occasion to point out that one of the principal roads controlled by the municipality was in urgent need of thorough repairs. The road in question leads from the Chowk through Bahadurganj to Daraganj and is one on which the wheeled traffic at all times is very considerable. Yet we cannot understand why it should be so much neglected. There are repairs going on on other roads where the work could have waited for some time longer. But the condition of the road in question has gone from bad to worse since we first drew attention to it. It is now in a disgraceful state. The only reason one can ascribe for its neglect is that it is not in the fashionable quarter of the city and is no one's particular care. It is fortunate perhaps for the municipality that the sufferers have infinite patience, and that individuals have not yet learnt that on occasions they can go to law for gross negligence of this description."

AGRA AKHBAR, 21st July 1908.

Water tax in Agra.

31. The Agra Akhbar, of the 21st July, complains that the assessment of water rate in Agra is very unjust and it often happens that very poor people are taxed beyond their means. The municipal commissioners pay no attention to the complaints of the poor. The editor asks the Government to look into the matter.

32. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 15th July, has the following in connection with the treatment of Indian students in England :—

"Mr. Syamaji Krishna Varma's lieutenants who had been talking of mutiny heroes and honouring rebels who are detested by the majority of their countrymen, are responsible for this great mischief to the cause of higher education. We hope that the India Office will intervene and not allow the interests of students who, during their stay in England, want to confine themselves to their studies, to suffer for the deeds of some irresponsible young men."

(f)—Agriculture and questions affecting the land.

34. Mr. Debendra Nath Sen, M.A., Principal, Behar National College, Bankipur, examines in a brief article in the Hindustan Review, for July, the various reasons advanced to account for the abnormal rise in the price of food grains in India. He proves, by statistics, that there has been very slight increase in the population during the last five or six years, and that the area under cultivation has increased in recent years, and so the rise in prices cannot be due to increase in local demand. He concludes that the abnormal rise in the price of food grains is due to the enormous growth of foreign demand, and to the consequent heavy and continuous drain and redundancy of currency, i.e. the sudden release of a large amount of rupees from the Indian mints. HINDUSTAN REVIEW, July 1908.

Rise in the price of food grains.

35. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 17th July, while gratefully acknowledging the efforts of the Government in alleviating distress from famine, suggests that it would do well to make some permanent arrangement to avert famine altogether. The construction of wells, tanks, and canals, the editor thinks, in all parts of the country, would go a long way towards preventing famine. He notes with regret that notwithstanding the recommendations of various famine commissions in favour of an extended system of irrigation, the Government has done very little in this respect as compared with the expansion of railway lines. He trusts that in future Government will devote all its resources and energies to building wells and tanks and to other means of irrigation in all parts of the country so as to make the people independent of the vagaries of nature. ABHYUDAYA, 17th July 1908.

36. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 19th July, referring to the treatment of famine orphans, remarks :— ADVOCATE, 19th July 1908.

Famine orphans.

"It will be a serious disappointment to the entire community, if a single Hindu orphan, male or female, passes into the hands of persons following other religions. The object of these philanthrophic persons may be as high as those who are responsible for the movement amongst the Hindus, but this ought not to lead any district officer to break the spirit of the Government orders."

37. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 22nd July, reproduces an article headed "Famine Orphans" from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 19th July. HINDUSTANI, 22nd July 1908.

38. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 15th July, complains that the seditious articles on which prosecutions are based, are freely copied by other papers, sometimes with comments, and thus given a publicity which they do not deserve. 39. The Anand (Lucknow), of the 16th July, says that the report of the Factory Commission has been issued at a time when it will probably be taken as a blow aimed at the Swadeshi movement. ANAND, 16th July 1908.

40. The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for July, referring to the passing of the Explosives Act, remarks :— HINDUSTAN REVIEW, July 1908.

The Explosives Act.

"The only comment that the Act calls forth is an expression of regret that such a law should have been rendered necessary at all in a country inhabited by an essentially peaceful and law-abiding people. The Hon'ble Munshi Madho Lal spoke the truth when he said in the Council that every sensible and loyal Indian would support it. It might be that portions of the Act might have been better worded and otherwise be susceptible of improvement, but some imperfections are almost a necessary incident of legislation in a hurry."

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, July 1908.

The Press Act.

41. Under the heading "Topics of the Day", the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for July, while referring to the passing of the Press Act, remarks:—

"This Bill was of more farreaching consequences and of less immediate urgency than the Explosives Act, and we cannot but think that the Government ought to have listened to the suggestion of the three honourable non-official members who were present, namely, the Hon'ble Nawab Saiyid Muhammad Saheb Bahadur, the Hon'ble Munshi Madho Lal and the Hon'ble the Tikka Saheb of Nabha, and referred it to a Select Committee. We do not say that there is no necessity for such a Bill or that the Government would have been well advised in postponing it to the Calcutta Session. But it is conceivable that had they proceeded with it in the manner they did with the Seditious Meetings Bill of last year, the Bill would have been shorn of some of its objectionable features as the other one was last year. For instance, the excessive power given to the trying Magistrate might have been curtailed; the facilities for appeal might have been increased; the vague language 'any act of violence' might have been suitably modified. It is regretable that a course which would have considerably disarmed criticism was not pursued. As it is, the Act is a somewhat imperfect and not altogether a desirable piece of legislation; though we must candidly own that the adverse criticism of it on the part of some of our contemporaries has been overdone.

So long as there are papers like the Yugantar—every reader of newspapers can easily call to mind other sheets which are not much better, but following the example set by Sir Harvey Adamson we will not name them—it is incomprehensible to us how any publicist who does not wish for the overthrow of the British Indian Government can consistently say that an Act like what was passed the other day is utterly uncalled for. If one thinks that the continued existence of the present Government is essential to the progress of the country, one must speak out plainly against those mad men who talk, write and act as if the last Englishman might be told to sail from Bombay Harbour to-morrow morning. Without meaning any disrespect, we would ask such of our contemporaries as reserve their righteous indignation for Government to dispassionately consider whether their devotion to the interests of the country does not require them to denounce those Indians whose reckless conduct has been responsible for the people being deprived of one after another of their cherished privileges as British citizens. Let there be no false conception of patriotism, no prevarication, no unreasoning bias against the Government. Let the facts be faced, the truth be told, and all honest and patriotic publicists courageously disown and denounce the charlatans in the garb of patriots who have brought disaster on the land; as surely and unmistakeably as they run down a tolerant Government for the slightest error of judgment of which it may be guilty. Let them make their choice—British rule or no British rule—and speak out plainly their intentions and designs. If they have persuaded themselves that the continuance of the British connection with India is of secondary importance, let them say so, instead of contenting themselves with indirectly encouraging the nobodies who have thrown wisdom to the winds; themselves not doing anything likely to bring them into trouble. If they felt otherwise, let them not indulge in wholesale and undeserved abuse of Government for taking steps for the preservation of itself and society against the new danger."

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, July 1908.

The Future of Dress in India.

42. The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for July, publishes a letter from Dr. A. K. Coomaraswamy in reply to an article in its issue for April by Mr. Rama Shastri on the "Future of Dress in India." Dr. Coomaraswamy remarks that dress is generally affected by climatic conditions and aesthetic and even religious considerations. It may happen that the visitor may adopt the dress of the country in which he is residing, but it is inconceivable that one nation should adopt the dress of another whose civilization has been established under entirely different conditions and whose type of culture differs from its own in every detail of historical evolution and outward expression. Dress imitation, he says, is founded on snobbery and he severely criticises educated Indians who adopt Western costume. European dress, he thinks, is unlovely compared with the rich colours and beautiful forms of Indian dresses, and, besides, multiplicity of clothes is not suitable in the hot climate of India. He advises Indians to stick to their own mode of dress as it is the most suitable for them both on hygenic and aesthetic considerations.

The Parasnath Hill.

43. The Jain Gazette (Deoband), of the 16th July, contains a poem in which the writer urges his co-religionists to boycott foreign goods and use Swadeshi articles so as to induce the Government to give up its proposal of building bungalows on the Parasnath Hill.

JAIN GAZETTE, 16th July 1908.

The Parasnath Hill.

44. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 17th July, notes with gratification that the Government of India has pacified the Jains by its tactful decision in regard to the Parasnath Hill. The editor remarks that it is a matter for not only congratulating the Jain community but also the Government on its statesmanship and foresight. He feels confident that if Government follows a similar policy with regard to public opinion in all administrative matters, the present discontent will die out in a short time.

A constitution for Turkey.

1. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 30th July, welcomes the proclamation of constitutional Government in Turkey, and thinks that it is the result of the spirit of democracy pervading Islam. INDIAN PEOPLE AND ADVOCATE, 30th July 1908.

The Advocate (Lucknow), of the same date, congratulates the Sultan on his prudence and statesmanship and remarks "so the tide of democracy and constitutionalism has triumphed in Japan and China, Persia and Turkey. How long will a constitution be denied to India, and by the most democratic rulers in the world?"

The Government and the people.

2. The Zamindár-wa-Káshtkár (Bijnor), for June, referring to the unrest prevailing in India, remarks that while some provinces of India have indulged in seditious propaganda, others have sedulously remained on the side of law and order. If the Government has deemed it fit to punish the former, there is no reason why it should not reward the latter for their consistent loyalty. ZAMINDAR-WA-KASHTKAR, June 1908.

The Government and the people.

3. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 27th July, referring to a seditious pamphlet beginning with "O! Martyrs, &c.," which has been recently distributed in certain places, remarks that the dissemination of such pamphlets cannot overawe the British Government, however useful it may be in petty native states. The editor thinks that the best way of drawing the attention of the Government to the people's grievances is by their representation in a sober and decent manner and not in abusing the Government. OUDH AKHBAR, 27th July 1908.

The Government and the people.

4. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 30th July, has the following:— INDIAN PEOPLE, 30th July 1908.

"We hope we have been able to give the substance of the Lieutenant Governor's speech correctly. The speech is evidently not intended for publication, but its object will not be served if it is known to only a hundred or two hundred persons. It is addressed to all who are interested in the maintenance of law and order, who have a stake in the country and who are opposed to anarchy and disorder. It may be asserted without any fear of contradiction that whatever may be the aspirations of the most advanced section of the population, no one has yet dreamed of a resort to violence, nor does any one contemplate with equanimity an era of chaos and anarchy. So far, those who have been accused of being concerned in the anarchist conspiracy are mostly young men and boys of immature minds who have hardly any notion of what they are about, and who have been inoculated with a blind hatred of the ruling race. Even the conspiracy that was hatched, did not seek to strike at the system of Government, but only against individuals as if a Government can be overthrown by the assassination of a few of its servants. It does not need much earnest protestation to convince any one that there is no general sympathy with the conspiracy that has been exposed, but it is not equally clear to what extent co-operation is possible in bringing to light every subtle or secret force that may be at work to undermine the rule that has so long been settled in India. In the first place, it is not known what is the actual position of the educated classes. It has been asserted that they are not the natural leaders of the people. If so, what influence can they have over the people? The great landowners and titled magnates are reputed to be the natural leaders of the people. If so, they should rally round the Government. Either the educated classes have influence or they have not. If they have, they should be taken into the confidence of the Government as Sir John Hewett has done; if they have not, they may be let alone or treated as suspects. A conspiracy here, or some sedition there, will not affect the position of the Government, but the mental attitude of the coming generations is a matter of serious concern, and it remains to be seen whether 'the progressive administration' of the country will fulfil the aspirations that are rapidly growing in India."

BRAHMAN SARVASWA, November and December 1907.

The present situation in India.

5. The Brahman Sarvaswa (Etawah), for November and December 1907 (received on the 27th July), has an article on "The present Situation" of which the following is an abstract :—

Patriotism is a totally different thing from sedition and so patriots should not be afraid of the Government. The establishment or subversion of any Government is entirely in the hands of God and the good of the country can only be served when Indians do not harm anybody. The well-wishers of the country ought to take steps to mitigate hatred between the different races and to establish harmoneous relations between them. It is much better to increase their fitness and power than to try to sever connection with England, for in their present state of progress they are incapable of carrying on the administration of their country.

The editor says that so far the political agitation in India has been carried on with prudence and gravity, but since some hair-brained youths began to take part in it, it has been disgraced by disturbances and breaches of public peace and has thus caused the Government to suspect Indians of seditious proclivities. It has also impeded the ordered progress of the country. He counsels moderation and prudence in the work for the good of the country, which alone will secure the regeneration of India.

He sees promising signs for the future of India in the national awakening that has taken place in India. He says that Government should by all means punish those who influence the passions of the ignorant masses against it, but it should at the same time differentiate between the constitutional agitation of the bulk of the people and the subversive propaganda of a few hot-headed youths. He urges the Government to listen to the advice of the acknowledged leaders of the people and adopt a conciliatory and sympathetic policy which alone will allay the growing discontent in the country, and restore order and peace in the country. Government should also at the same time inquire into the cause of the unrest that has resulted in the appearance of the bomb in Indian politics. He thinks that discontent in the country would die out soon if the Government were to undo the partition of Bengal, or if Government prohibited the slaughtering of cows in the sacred places of Hindus, protected the people against the highhandedness of the police, regulated the export of Indian grain, supported the Swadeshi movement and above all governed the country in accordance with the wishes of the representatives of the people. He warns the Government against the consequences of its present repressive policy which may result in more bitterness of feeling between rulers and ruled, calculated to give rise to a very serious crisis equally embarrassing to Government and the people.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 30th July 1908.

The situation in India.

6. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 30th July, makes the following comments on an article in the Review of Reviews on the present situation in India :—

"It is well that so high an authority as Mr. Stead should have given this advice to the 'Advocates of strong Government' who are certainly most in need of such guidance. Whether the present situation in India bears any resemblance to that in Russia three years ago is a question we will leave to these 'Advocates' for solution. We can only observe in passing that certain measures adopted by the Government of India when the so-called 'troubles' were first discovered were more Russian than British in their inception. The ugly fact is that Lord Curzon managed to get his Government in a cleft stick and the supremely uncomfortable situation created by the partition of Bengal was rendered more acute by the blundering measures of the Government which tried to repress popular feeling in Bengal and elsewhere by imprisonment and deportation.

While the situation was thus growing serious in India, Englishmen at home were indulging in censorious comments upon the Russian Government. 'The Tsar may not be an ideal archangel on a throne,' says Mr. Stead, 'but he has at least established the Duma. He has twice dissolved it according to his rights and he has modified its constitution, for which his only justification is the old adage, salus populi suprema lex. But we have not even established a Duma of any sort in India.' While Englishmen were so heavily inveighing against the 'atrocities' in Russia, by some irony of fate their representatives in India were becoming advocates of stern repressive measures. Lord Minto in passing the Newspapers Act declared : 'no exaggerated respect for the principles of English freedom—totally unadapted for Indian surroundings—can justify us in allowing such poison to work its will.' Lord Morley is a Radical. The Tsar was born and reared in the straitest school of autrocatic conservatism. The Tsar has gone forward. But as the ill-luck of India would have it, Lord Morley has gone backward. 'We should be much more profitably employed in taking the beam out of our own eye than in extracting the mote out of the eye of our Russian brother.' Here is another example of such inconsistency. Lord Curzon recently pleaded the cause of the second 'Shaista Khan' before the Lords. But this is what Mr. Stead has to say on this point: 'Sir Bampfylde Fuller has been affording us an admirable justification for his recall by his letter 'J'ACCUSE' in the Times. An ex-official who seizes the present, of all moments, for discrediting a Government face to face with the present situation in India, was emphatically not the right man in the right place in Bengal two years ago.' The inconsistency and contradiction that Mr. Stead notes are transparent. Freedom of opinion and freedom of the press must be maintained in Russia at all cost. But in India everything wears a different aspect. Here the surroundings are not congenial to the healthy growth of English principles, sentiments or institutions."

Unrest in India.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, May and June 1908.

7. Mr. N. Narasingha Row writing in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for May and June, discusses the causes of the unrest prevailing in India. He ascribes this unrest to the poverty of the people caused by the systematic destruction of Indian industries by the East India Company, to the disinclination of the English rulers to fulfil the promises made by the late Queen-Empress in the Act of 1833 and to the unsympathetic attitude of the bureaucracy towards the new spirit of independence in India, the legitimate outcome of Western education.

He however takes a hopeful view of the situation and says :—

"There has been much talk of sympathy from the King downwards. That His Majesty, the Secretary of State, and the liberty-loving Englishman are genuine in their expressions of sympathy is true, but, alas! they live so far apart that they cannot see; and there are our Anglo-Indian press agencies illuminating their ignorance on matters Indian. But there are signs of an awakening of a fresh interest in India among the British. They are, after all, anxious to know what the constant wailings from the far off Indian eldorado could be about. With greater and truer knowledge of India's grievances will come a greater sympathy for India, the old and benevolent policy of the British rule in India, viz. India for Indians first, will be revived and once again the Indian and the Englishman will join hands as willing workers in the cause of India's regeneration; and the Englishman, true to his inborn instincts, will count his loss a gain and measure his glory and greatness not by what he was able to gain, but what he was able to give. Therein lies the glory of the great and the profit of the weak. The great will have become greater, the weak stronger, and both are brothers, the one elder, the other younger and stronger, will stand shoulder to shoulder in weal and woe for the cause of peace, justice and humanity."

Causes of unrest in India during 1907-8.

AL BASHIR, 28th July 1908.

8. In continuation of his articles entitled "The Causes of Unrest in India—1907-8" (vide paragraph 2, Selections No. 30, current), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), remarks in its issue of the 28th July, that at the advent of the British rule to India the most formidable enemy of the English were the Maharattas and not the Muhammadans.

He then describes the gradual downfall of the Maharattas, the internal complications, disunion, and the strife among the Peshwas, also how the Scindhia, the Gaekwar and the Bhonsla families threw off the yoke of the Peshwas and formed themselves into independent rulers of several petty kingdoms.

Next he explains, from a historical point of view, the various causes that led the Maharattas to wage war against the English, and gives an account of their conspiracies, attempts and tricks to crush down the latter.

Finally, he describes the attempt made by Appa Saheb to drive out the English from the country, which resulted in failure after which Appa Saheb effected his escape in disguise.

Lastly he points out that although there is no trace of Appa Saheb's doings after his disappearance, there are reasons to believe that he passed himself off as a sanyasi for the rest of his life, preaching sedition and creating disaffection and discontent among the people against the English.—(To be continued.)

MUFID-I-AM, 10th and 20th July 1908.

A seditious pamphlet.

9. The Mufid-i-Ám (Agra), in its combined issue of the 10th and 20th July, notes with regret that assiduous attempts are being made in certain quarters to circulate clandestinely a seditious pamphlet in which people are urged to repeat the atrocities of the Mutiny. The editor ascribes these misdirected activities to the perverted and diseased imagination of young men of plebeian families, whose heads have been turned by the liberal education they have received in foreign countries.

He deprecates such gross disloyalty, and thinks that these youths are doing an injury to their country by their imprudence. In conclusion he advises the Government to confine its patronage to men of good families, who have been the favoured class under former Governments, and thus prevent the rise of baseborn men who clamour for freedom and equality.

RAHBAR, 28th July 1908.

Seditious speeches.

10. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th July, publishes in extenso a seditious speech by one Surendranath Ariya lately arrested in Madras, and remarks that it would be eminently foolish on the part of the people of India to listen to such unsound advice, as they are too unprepared to pit themselves against the might and prowess of Great Britain. They must stick to Swadeshi and boycott, which are the most powerful weapons they now possess, and by developing their industries enrich their country.

MASHRIQ, 28th July 1908.

Sedition.

11. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 28th July, referring to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor's speech at Lucknow, assures him that there is no sedition in these provinces, and that if there are any fitful outbursts here and there, they are the outcome of foreign influences. The editor advises the Government to have confidence in the people, and when it is put in possession of information reflecting on the loyalty of a class of its subjects, it should make thorough inquiries before taking any action on it.

AL BASHIR, 28th July 1908.

Musalmans and disaffection.

12. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 28th July, referring to a statement in a Hindu paper of Lahore, that even among the Musalmans there are some disaffected persons, remarks that they can be counted upon the fingers of one hand, that they have no following, and that their actions are universally deprecated by their co-religionists.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 22nd July 1908.

Mr. Tilak.

13. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 22nd July, writes :—

"The ancient Aryan civilization has nothing to do with the present political agitation in India. If Mr. Tilak wrote anything against the British Government, it has as little connection with the ancient Aryan civilization as his appeal to an English jury for the protection of liberty and justice. Servants of the British Government hold it culpable for Indians even to mention the term 'bomb,' but in London the women who are demanding their rights, threaten to throw bomb shells on the Premier. This threat is not only held out in newspapers, but is repeated before the Courts of Justice . . . . . It is clear that it is the political agitators of Europe who have taught Indians bomb-throwing. It was thought sinful for Aryans who regarded harmlessness as their highest religion, to kill anybody wantonly or to show their backs to the enemy in the battle-field.

Now-a-days those who demand Swaraj on the one hand declare it to be a sin to have any connection with the English and do not take it to be sedition to oppose them, while on the other hand, when charged with sedition, they declare themselves to be British subjects, and seek the protection of British law and justice. The British Government must remember that as long as it continues the pressure of European civilization upon Indians, it cannot be relieved of its anxieties. After a century of British rule, when the military and the police are put to unusual trouble at the arrest of an ordinary political patriot, is it not for the Government to consider that there is some screw loose in its administration? Is it not a slur on the British Government that until the trial of a particular individual be finished, all social and religious reform work should be stopped in Bombay? Servants of the British Government on the one side and the Swadeshi Extremists on the other, are these days making use of deceit, hypocracy and underhandedness. The whole thing will be barren of results even though one crooked policy may neutralize another. Under the circumstances it was the important duty of the Arya Samáj, which it has not hitherto realized, to explain their respective duties both to Government and the people."

Mr. Tilak's destination.

ADVOCATE, 26th July 1908.

14. The following is an extract from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 26th July :—

"The news that while Mr. Justice Davar was prolonging the sitting of his Court unprecedentedly till 10 P. M., on Wednesday night, the R.I.M.S. Begam was waiting in the harbour to which Mr. Tilak was at once removed. It then steamed out and spoke to the R.I.M.S. Mayo on the high seas and handed over the prisoner for safe keeping to the Commander of that vessel for lodgment at Aden. This is really a riddle which has to be solved. How did the Government know that the special jury would return a verdict of guilty? How did it know that Mr. Justice Davar would sentence him to transportation? How could the Bombay Government select Aden for lodging Mr. Tilak before knowing the actual nature of the sentence passed? And how did the Government of Bombay in dispensing with all procedure by way of medical examination, satisfy itself that Mr. Tilak's health, which he said in course of his address was bad, will stand the climate of Aden? Even a prisoner convicted of murder and other heinous crimes before being transported is carefully examined by a Medical Board in order to see if he is in a fit physical condition to be sent out of India. That this ordinary precaution was not taken in the case of Mr. Tilak will add to the popular anxiety."

Government and journalists.

KAYASTHA HITKARI, 24th July 1908.

15. The Kayastha Hitkari (Agra), of the 24th July, referring to the frequent prosecutions of journalists, remarks that their legitimate duty is to diffuse useful knowledge and not to excite discord in the country and to teach the people to rebel against the Government. The editor thinks that the Government is perfectly justified in inflicting exemplary punishments on recalcitrant journalists.

A bird's eye view of Indian History.

SWARAJYA, 18th July 1908.

16. The editor of the Swarijya (Allahabad), in a leading article in the issue of the 18th July, presents to his readers in a series of graphic sketches a bird's eye view of Indian History. The incursions of Mahmud of Ghazni, the looting of Somnath, the defeat of Prithviraj of Delhi by Muhammad Ghori, the bloody invasion of Timur, peace and prosperity under Akbar, Jehangir and Shahjahan, the building of Fort St. George by the newly arrived Englishmen, the fanaticism and intolerance of Aurangzeb, the consequent rise of Sivaji, Guru Nanak and the Sikhs, and the invasion of Nadir Shah follow each other in rapid succession. Last of all come the "Feringhee merchants whose settlements we had seen in Madras, as rulers. They have brought under their sway a large portion of the country and they treat the people considerately and so the people, hitherto grossly oppressed, pray for the permanence of their rule. The merchants gradually grew in power till they became possessed of the greater part of the country. People are joyous at the change and believe that the turn of peace and civilization has come, and their sympathies are entirely on the side of this foreign nation. But the scene suddenly changes; misery and bloodshed are seen everywhere, Indians and Europeans have become each others' bitter enemies. Women and children are seeking refuge, but no quarter is offered to them. But the scene again changes, and a Darbar comes before the view, where Europeans and Indians meet again as friends, Queen Victoria's Proclamation is read, for the fulfilment of whose promises we are still contending."

The editor tries to derive some useful lessons from this historical drama! He says: "Would we like to become the enemies of the Musalmans by recalling the memory of Aurangzeb? Never; it would be of no use. We should forget all that is evil and remember only that which is noble. If we now and then murmur, notwithstanding the blessings of the British rule, it is because the promises made to us have not been fulfilled. The equality of treatment which was promised has never been put into practice. But while complaining in this way we should not forget the time of our misfortune. The misuse of the freedom of the press and liberty of speech, which we possess, will be the cause of our destruction. While we are thus complaining we should bear in mind those misfortunes which we have depicted in the drama. But those were the times of ignorance, and this is the age of civilization, towards which every nation is advancing, and the nation which governs us is one of the most civilized. Then to what extent is the harshness with which this nation—which claims to be civilized, which promises to treat us kindly and which has instilled into us the love of freedom—treats us justifiable? If our complaints are not to be heard, and the promises made to us were mere words, then we should be plainly told so, so that we should be content with Pax Brittanica and refrain from reminding (the Government) of its promises. But as it is, our complaints are admissible, as we believe that the Government is a civilized one, and the way in which we complain is a civilized one. If misfortunes await us, even while we proceed in this way, we should bear them cheerfully, for the end will certainly be satisfactory."

SWARAJYA, 25th July 1908.

Five blessings of the British rule.

17. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 25th July, gives the following as the "Five Unequalled Flowers (blessings) of the British Rule":—

"(1) The old and rotten regulation of 1818 by which innocent people can be deported without any trial.

(2) Sections 124A. and 153A. of the Criminal Procedure Code [Indian Penal Code (?)] by which the gods and dutiful sons of India can be sent to jail.

(3) The Seditious Meetings Act, by which the police have been authorized to disperse a meeting whenever a number of slaves get together.

(4) The new Press Act, by which the editors of newspapers have become the target for arrows (are prosecuted). No sooner do they criticise anything, than the door of the jail is opened for them.

(5) The Arms Act, by which the Bengal Police are gathering a rich harvest. If a wooden sword is found in a man's house, all the members of the poor man's family are sent to the lock-up.

In truth these are the five choicest blessings of the British rule in India by which it is killing dead men. 'O, tyrant, if thou hast killed a helpless being, what has thou accomplished, for what is the use of killing one who is himself dying?'"

INDIAN PEOPLE, 30th July 1908.

His Honour at Allahabad.

18. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 30th July, referring to His Honour's speech at the Mayo Hall, Allahabad, remarks:—

"We hope Sir J. Hewett's weighty and earnest words have fallen upon willing ears and that there will be a ready response to his appeal. At the same time we hope that there is no general tendency to sedition in these provinces and that the few sparks that did appear will die out."

With reference to His Honour's remarks about the house searches in Aligarh and Agra, the editor says: "We wish His Honour had added reliable information, for a suspicion, however reasonable, must be based on reliable information, whereas the informants of the police are not always reliable."

ADVOCATE, 30th July 1908.

The Quebec Tercentenary.

19. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 30th July, while discussing the willing adherence of the French Canadians to the British Empire, remarks that they were accorded all the rights and privileges of British citizenship. Adverting to India, the editor says "if the French could accept British rule, why cannot Indians? The reason is obvious, and the remedy lies in the hands of England. In despair the Rev. MacNicol advises that it would be better to declare once and for all that British Government in India is only provisional. It may be nationalized only if the British ruler does not stop short of being a father to those under his charge, but agrees to be a brother, to acknowledge their equality and to share, instead of bestowing, rights. An advance on this line alone can turn discontended India, that practically holds itself aloof from the Government, into a helping hand in pushing the administration of the country towards progress and improvement."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 26th July 1908.

The Indian Budget in the House of Commons.

20. Referring to Mr. Buchanan's remarks on the present situation during the course of his speech on the Indian Budget, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 26th July, makes the following observations:—

"This is in effect a reiteration of what Lord Morley has been saying. As to the ability of the Government to draw most educated Indians to its side there can be no question: the only question is whether it will be done. The offer of an active and real interest and responsibility has yet to come. The proposed expansion of the Legislative Councils and the establishment of Councils of Notables do not amount to such an offer. If anything, these proposals exclude rather than admit educated Indians, for it must be remembered that the wealthy classes as a body are not educated and they do not leaven the population as a whole. There is a widespread belief that the educated classes are to be kept down and nothing has yet been done to dissipate that belief. It goes without saying that if a sincere desire is shown to solve the grave problem that confronts the Government, it will have the ready assistance of all moderates. The first thing to do is to distinguish between moderates and immoderates and not to treat the whole country as suspects. We quite agree in the view that the reversal of the partition of Bengal will not lay the new spirit that has come to life, for it is now too late. All reforms are useless if they come too late. After the admission that the partition of Bengal was carried out in an objectionable manner, the refusal to modify it in any way can only be regarded as a contemptuous disregard of the feelings of an entire people. Every day that passes is thinning the ranks of the moderates for they have nothing to hold to, they cannot persuade others to stay with them in the hope that real and substantial reforms are coming. All that they see at present is that they are treated with as much suspicion as those who have ceased to have any faith in reforms or the sincere desire of the Government to give the people real responsibility and who are either openly or secretly hostile."

Two sides of a crime.

21. The following appears in the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 18th July, under the marginally noted heading :— SWARAJYA, 18th July 1908.

"The capriciousness of time has been well known, but the distinction made by our friends is finer. When the crime, for which an unfortunate Indian is sentenced to death, passes through a white man's brain, its blackness is changed into whiteness, and really it should be so, for some one has said' birds of a feather flock together.' "

The Empire (Calcutta) the protégé (lit. the delicately-brought-up one), of the white Government, remarks ' bomb-throwing should either be considered to be a good deed, or a bad one ; it cannot be both.'

But is this true? Does not every crime, according to English civilization, possess both attributes? In our opinion it certainly does; the difference is simply this that in its worse aspects it has a sinister name, i.e. the ' horrible tragedy of Muzaffarpur,' and its brighter side is interpreted as excellence, as 'a [soldier's (?)] bravery.' "

Forgery was deemed to be a heinous crime, when the black Brahman, Nuncomar, was guilty of it. But when the same offence was committed by the white statesman, Clive, it was thought to be meritorious and prudent. The same Clive, who was a party to the rebellion hatched by Mir Jafar, Jagat Seth, Krishna Chandra and others, and who incited them to rebel against the Islamic Government, is supposed to be a brave patriot and his white compatriots worship him as a god. His deceit and cunning gained for him the rank of a peer. But if an Indian does the same thing, and utters a single word against the Government, he is hanged and dies a dog's death.

Dacoity is a highly condemnable offence (lit. a very bad deed), but the dacoity committed by the royal soldiers is deemed a meritorious deed. The natives of Burma who refused to bow to a foreign Government were hanged like thieves and dacoits. But the white freebooters [Boers (?)] who tried their best to subvert the British Government and vowed not to endure the slavery of the English, are extolled as patriots, the pride of their nation, &c.

If a hungry Indian, when he can endure hunger no longer, steals even a crust of bread he will be sent to jail for a month. But if the white man were to steal the enemy's whole supply of provisions in his absence he would not only be considered a brave man, but he would get many rewards from the Government.

All these examples show that in the whole body of the law there is not a single offence by which the most important or heinous (baré sé bará evidently for buré sé burá) act cannot be changed into goodness personified.

Clive and Nuncomar were guilty of the same offence. Nuncomar was hanged and died a dog's death, but Clive (Lord Clive), was held to be a patriot.

Our delicately-brought-up contemporary must now have been convinced that every crime can have two sides and can be viewed from two standpoints. The ruler at the time being only can view it from whatever aspect he likes (he can take any view of the question he likes)."

SWARAJYA, 18th July 1908.

Poverty of India.

22. Lala Har Dayal Mathur, M.A., of Lahore in an article in the Swarájya Allahabad of the 18th July, points out that the growing poverty of India will have far-reaching effects. The first thing to happen will be the growing unproductiveness of land and the diminution of the area under cultivation, as the land will grow poor owing to want of manure, and the too frequent sowing of crops on it. The article will be continued in further issues.

SWARAJYA, 18th July 1908.

Odes.

23. The following political odes by different writers appear in the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 18th July :—

By Ram Chandra Lal, Indar, of Lahore :

"They frighten us with (their) swords.
They aim (their) arrows at us.
But, brethren, we are not to be intimidated
By imprisonment, hanging, or fetters."

By Mahjur of Lahore :

"Protect your hearts with magnetic (able to absorb the arrowheads) locks,
For they are aiming their arrows at you ;
Why do you trouble us, O inventors of tyranny ?
Be afraid of (our) effective sighs.
You may throw us into the jail or hang us,
(But) we are men and are not afraid of the sword.
We do not even complain of the hunter (tyrant),
Why do you threaten us, Sir, with fetters,
When fate itself is against us, O, Mahjur,
Of what use can (human) contrivances be ?"

By Ram Sarup Sharma of Jalesar :

"We would have gone to jail, highly respected, adorned with ornamental chains,
Do not trouble us any longer, O tyrant, have mercy on us,
We are tired of the punishment (thou hast inflicted).
We are sitting with bared breasts,
They are aiming their arrows at us.
Do not kill us, O tyrant, by degrees,
But cut our throats with thy sword in a single blow."

By Ram Das Ram, editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad) :

"You may bind us with chains a hundred thousand times,
But at the (proper) time we shall come out (of the prison) like arrows.
You may throw us into the jail or hang us,
But we are not afraid of imprisonment or the sword.
Any one who looked on Indians, would say
This picture smells (lit.) of despondency.
The blood of the martyrs will work wonders,
Showers of blood will fall from the ancient sky,
O tyrant, do not oppress (thy) subjects,
Be afraid, O tyrant, of the cries of those who pass sleepless nights
For the sake of the nation.
We have made our chests shields (are ready to face all dangers).
They are aiming their arrows at us.
The distraction of national lunatics (those who have lost their reasons in their excessive love for their country) cannot be cured
By iron collars or fetters.
Those who go about with their lives in their hands
What fear have they of the sword ?
The people of India have now grown suspicious
Of treacherous speeches and writings.
Those who have in their hearts love for their country
They do not care about the punishment (inflicted on them) by foreigners.
He (the writer) is Ram, how can he be ensnared
My dear Sir, by your contrivances ?

Khudi Ram Bose.

24. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 21st July, referring to the sentence of capital punishment passed on Khudi Ram Bose, doubts if it will have any effect in allaying the popular discontent in Bengal, and thinks that the Government would have added to its popularity by granting him a free pardon.

RAHBAR, 21st July 1908.

Khudi Ram Bose.

25. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th July, referring to the petition of Khudi Ram Bose to the Government of Bengal for the commutation of his sentence, remarks that it would have been better if the Government had at this moment displayed its innate sense of justice and mercy. This would have gratified the people and would have been a deterrent to future anarchists.

RAHBAR, 28th July 1908.

The Kankinara case.

26. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 26th July, has the following :—

ADVOCATE, 26th July 1908.

"In the Kankinara case the police have withdrawn the charges against six persons of Batpara headed by the well-known Sanskrit scholar Pandit Tarak Nath Panchanan. The police may be within its rights to search anybody's house, about whom it has received information, for secreting arms, but is there any wonder if after wholesale arrest of persons in whose houses nothing is found, bitterness increases? What can be the feelings of Pandit Taraknath and his followers after the humiliation to which he was unnecessarily subjected? Nothing else but contempt and hatred for which the actions of the subordinate officials are in a great way responsible."

The Kankinara case.

27. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 29th July, reproduces the remarks of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 26th July, on the Kankinara case.

HINDUSTANI, 29th July 1908.

Mr. Tilak's trial.

28. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 18th July, referring to Mr. Tilak's prosecution for sedition, has the following under the heading "The Climax of Tyranny" :—

SWARAJYA, 18th July 1908.

"In our opinion Tilak has not been prosecuted on account of these articles, but they have been made a pretext. In fact, the object is to weaken the nationalist party by gagging its leader. But, in our opinion, if the Government convicts Tilak Maharaj then, instead of the discontent being allayed, the relations between the rulers and the ruled will become more strained than ever."

Mr. Tilak's transportation.

29. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 24th July, writes :—"Most of the people of India will receive with sorrow the news of Mr. Tilak's transportation for six years on a charge of sedition. It was difficult, if not altogether impossible, for the non-Mahrathi-knowing jurors to decide what the intention of the writer was in writing the alleged seditious articles. This being the case, even if the verdict of the majority of the jury be correct, there is room for the bulk of the people to say that it was wrong, and that if a Mahrathi-knowing jury were appointed, it would not have held Mr. Tilak's articles to be seditious. And it is, therefore, very difficult to remove the impression from their hearts that justice has not been done to Mr. Tilak."

ABHYUDAYA, 24th July 1908.

The editor urges that as the definition of "sedition" is very ambiguous, it is advisable for the Government, in the interests of liberty and for the prevention of injustice, to order the trial of sedition cases by jury and to rule that only those persons be appointed jurors who know the language, in which an alleged seditious article is written or a speech delivered. He suggests that before the institution of a prosecution for sedition, Government should give the offender a warning for the first offence as has generally been done by the United Provinces Government. He regards the sentence inflicted on Mr. Tilak as unduly severe and deplores that such an able and influential man as Mr. Tilak should have been convicted of sedition and transported for six years. He concludes with the remark that this incident shows the urgent necessity for the introduction of such reforms in the system of administration as will inspire all educated and respectable classes of people with feelings of affection and gratitude towards the Government and not with feelings the expression of which might be held seditious.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 26th July 1908.

Mr. Tilak's conviction.

30. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 26th July, says that the event of the gravest importance of the week is the conviction of Mr. Tilak on two charges of sedition and the heavy sentence passed upon him. Neither Mr. Tilak nor any one else ever expected that there would be an acquittal. There is no uncertainty in a trial for sedition. Either the Government does not take action unless there is a clear case, or the accused fails to prove his innocence, but whenever there is a prosecution for sedition a conviction follows as a matter of course.

A fairly long term of imprisonment was generally expected but transportation for six years was not anticipated by Mr. Tilak's worst enemy. The fine of a thousand rupees is a bagatelle and Mr. Tilak can easily afford to pay it. But to a man who is now 53 years of age, six years may be a lifetime, and the years as they pass, are bound to become more and more eventful.

As to the effect of Mr. Tilak's conviction on the country, he says, it is too early yet to prognosticate, but we do not think there would have been any danger if Mr. Tilak had been imprisoned in India. The transportation will be a personal punishment.

Mr. Tilak is answerable for a great many wrongs. If he hates the ruling class, he hates a section of his countrymen as bitterly. It is impossible to forget how he deliberately and of set purpose broke up the Congress at Surat—an unpatriotic deed for which no reparation can be made. We wrote very bitterly at the time, but nothing that happened can make us withhold our sympathy from a man so gifted, so undoubtedly patriotic, but with a mind so strangely perverted.

In conclusion, the editor says, that Mr. Tilak's personal friends and admirers will doubtless carry on his newspapers, both of which are paying concerns, but there is hardly any likelihood of Mr. Tilak becoming again an active power in politics. The power that he had could have been very usefully employed; he was not a supporter of a revolution or of violence. But the spirit of bitterness pervaded his teaching and drove him to recklessness. It is difficult to realize that a personality so forceful has been removed, or that Mr. Tilak will not again figure as a hero on a hundred platforms and in open air meetings. But the law is inexorable and by order of one of his own countrymen, he will be transported to the penal settlement in the Pacific for a term which means in his case practically the rest of his life.

ADVOCATE, 26th July 1908.

Mr. Tilak's conviction.

31. Referring to Mr. Tilak's conviction, the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 26th July, says that "the question is, will the Indian public agree with the majority of the jury and the Judge of the Bombay High Court in considering Mr. Tilak really guilty of sedition and deserving of the punishment inflicted on him? Were the articles really seditious? Whatever may be the legal aspect of the question, the country at large will neither support the conviction nor the severe sentence inflicted. Mr. Tilak's articles have been reproduced in the press and read by the whole of India. There is no question that the articles had been written in very objectionable language; they are even vitriolic in spirit. Instead of simply expressing his regret at the outburst of this new form of crime which has created horror in the public mind, he, in a subdued tone, sang the praises of the bomb and told the Government that its arms and guns would be of no avail in crushing down the bomb-thrower; the bomb was a charm and an amulet. This language is objectionable and couched in bad taste. But were these articles likely to excite popular hatred against the Government so as to lead to the breach of peace? Were the articles likely to excite the people to take up arms against the Government? Whatever may be the feeling of the Government of Bombay and the Anglo-Indian press, the country at large is not prepared to admit that the articles were intended to incite the people to any form of active hostility towards the Government. Every vitriolic writing cannot be called seditious and cannot be dealt with under seditious sections. Such being the popular feeling, the country will not convict Mr. Tilak of sedition. The country's opinion can be gauged only through the press and private conversation. As far as we have been able to gauge, the general feeling is that the Government of Bombay was not well advised in inaugurating the prosecution and more so in trying to see that the jurors who sat to try Mr. Tilak were not his countrymen. It is said that even in England it is found difficult to say what is sedition and what is not sedition under English law; it depends on the verdict of nine Englishmen to declare a writing seditious. In India the position is still more difficult where the law of sedition does not take the intention of the writer into consideration. The jury trial becomes meaningless when the jurors, before whom the writer is placed for trial, are not conversant with the language in which the condemned article is written. Had Mr. Tilak been tried by the Judge with the help of nine jurors well versed in Marathi language, their verdict would have been more convincing to the public.

There is no question that in his trouble Mr. Tilak has the deep sympathy of all, a sympathy which has increased during the past week by the exhibition of many noble traits of character by him.

The law may be on the side of the Bombay Government, but popular feeling is not. It feels annoyed, nay, deeply angered at what has happened, which it will continue to regard an injustice till such time as the Government does not put down with a strong hand rabid writings in the Anglo-Indian press which Mr. Tilak in his defence had said had provoked him to write what he had written. It is a pity that a man of his distinguished career and attainments should ever technically transgress the bounds fixed by law and thus deprive the country for years together of his advocacy of its claims.

It is true that the fate that has overtaken Mr. Tilak is the fate of many a noble-minded patriot in Western countries. But in the present state of progress of a country like ours, men of Mr. Tilak's robust intellect, courage of conviction, who are not born every day are required in the up-building of the nation, and we cannot but deeply regret the circumstances which have resulted in Mr. Tilak's loss of liberty."

Mr. Tilak's conviction.

32. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th July, referring to the sentence of imprisonment passed on Mr. Tilak, remarks :— RAHBAR, 28th July 1908.

"Considering these facts (the riots in Bombay and other places) can it be believed that by the imprisonment of Tilak Maharaj a source of friction between the Government and the people has been removed?"

Mr. Tilak's conviction.

33. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 29th July, reproduces the comments of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 26th July, on the conviction of Mr. Tilak. HINDUSTANI, 29th July 1908.

Mr. Tilak's conviction.

34. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 30th July, regards the conviction of Mr. Tilak as a political blunder, as it has been entirely contrary to public opinion. They realized that the articles he wrote were couched in objectionable language, and condemned them as such, but they did not think that they were positively seditious. The Government, the editor thinks, has been mistaken in entering upon press prosecutions in all the provinces simultaneously; the discontent could have easily died, if the Government had adopted a more conciliatory policy. ADVOCATE, 30th July 1908.

In conclusion he says: "It must be admitted that the majesty of the law has been well vindicated and the hand that smites may now well be stayed and the chapter of reform begun without delay. Much as we would the Government should have lighted the lamp first and smitten the persistent follower of the ostrich policy, the man who would refuse to see with his eyes and to hear with his ears, afterwards, in the life of every man as in the history of a nation it is never too late to mend. It does one good to look for the silver lining in every dark cloud. And when a friend of Mr. O'Donnell's sympathy discovers one in the improvement in the attitude of the India Office and is satisfied of the sympathetic spirit in which the question of reform is being approached, we have no reason to be at all pessimistic. Its mailed fist the Government has shown well and the blow has fallen unerringly, the time for exhibiting the velvet glove is well nigh advanced. If the people are asked to keep their patience for a few months more, the Government needs to give a hint to the Anglo-Indian press to desist from further embittering the feeling between the rulers and the ruled. The time to know 'who is for us and who is against us,' as the Times of India advises the Bombay Government to discover, will come when a substantial measure of reform has been introduced and given a fair trial for a reasonable amount of time."

Justice.

35. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 28th July, referring to the number of persons convicted by the lower courts and acquitted by the higher ones, advises the Government to grant them some monetary compensation for the trouble they have undergone and to punish the judicial officers who have put them to trouble. The editor thinks that the ends of justice cannot be served as long as the judicial and executive functions are not separated.

HINDUSTANI, 29th July 1908.

Third class magistrates.

36. A correspondent of the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 29th July, complains that magistrates holding third class powers cannot record evidence for the purposes of preliminary judicial inquiries under section 202, Criminal Procedure Code, and that this causes a grave miscarriage of justice. He thinks that if this disability is removed the process of justice will become simpler.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 30th July 1908.

Aligarh cases.

37. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 30th July, referring to the sentences of imprisonment passed on the accused in the Aligarh sedition cases, remarks :—

"The sentences remind us of Mr. Pinhey of Tinnevelley and are just as disproportionately heavy."

(b)—Police.

MUSAFIR, 15th July 1908.

The Aligarh Police and the Vedic Ashram.

38. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 15th July, contains the following :—

"Some students of the Aligarh Vedic Ashram have filed a complaint before the Magistrate against the Musalman Inspector of the Aligarh Police, setting forth that he had them seized and brought to the police station in connection with Hoti Lal's case; that he abused, beat and insulted them and asked them to give false evidence against Hoti Lal.

Although we intend to write in detail about the Vedic Ashram and the police at Aligarh at some future date, it will not be out of place if we now request Sir John Hewett to take notice of this matter.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Árya Samaj has no concern whatever with politics, some imprudent Musalman police officers, in order to feed the flame of their religious prejudices, always try to involve the Árya Samajists in some difficulty. If they fail to do any real and material harm to the Árya Samajists, they at least have the satisfaction of giving vent to their religious hatred against them and of insulting them openly under such pretences.

We therefore most respectfully approach His Honour and pray that he will be pleased to order a thorough and independent inquiry regarding the affairs of the Aligarh Vedic Ashram and give condign punishment to the culprits so as to teach other police officers not to seize on political disturbances as a favourable opportunity for insulting those who hold different religious views to their own.

In case the complaints made by the students prove false, the students, too, should be given exemplary punishments. We cannot say at present anything with certainty. But from what we have heard, we arrive at the conclusion that the treatment by the Aligarh Kotwal of the students of the Vedic Ashram was not justified by law.

If, however, our statement proves false, we will be glad to contradict it. But in every respect it is desirable for His Honour to order a thorough and independent inquiry into this matter. If the authorities fail to take proper notice of what has occurred, we fear that it will create much anxiety and dissatisfaction among the Arya Samajists of these provinces. We are inquiring into this matter in our own way and will publish the result of our inquiries later on."

39. One Ram Ratan Lal, a member of the Arya Samaj, Maunath Bhanjan, writing in the Arya Mitra (Agra), of the 24th July, complains that Sub-Inspector Mansab Ali Khan harrasses the members of the local Arya Samaj and does not allow any preacher to deliver sermons in the locality and even openly threatens to do physical violence to the members of the Arya Samaj.

40. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th July, referring to the arrest and release of a Sanskrit scholar by the Bengal police in connection with the Kankinara case, remarks that it is by such imprudent actions on the part of the police that Government is being brought into disrepute, and discontent spreads among the people.

41. Dr J. N. Bahadurji, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P. (London), discusses in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for July, the question of the substitution of the vernaculars as a medium of instruction in Indian schools and colleges for English. The present system of imparting knowledge through the medium of English, he characterises as "unpsychological." "It takes no account of heredity. It ignores the fact that the faculties of reception and retention of knowledge are aided by the faculty of perception. It is only when one clearly perceives or comprehends what is being taught that one is able to assimilate and to retain the same." In the lower standards of schools, boys generally learn by rote whatever is taught them in English. This leads to the stunting of their mental faculties. Besides this, there is another great drawback in the system. Men who are fortunate enough to pass through a university, have only a working knowledge of the vernacular and are unable to make scientific works in English accessible to their countrymen. Hence there is a great waste of talent. The secret of Japan's success is that as soon as the pioneer work was done, scientific works were made accessible to the people in their own language.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, July 1908.

The medium of instruction in schools and colleges.

Dr. Bahadurji contends that England made an advance only when English was substituted for Latin as the language of the Bible, and the translation of scientific works followed in its wake. Taking these facts into consideration, he says that "instruction in every branch of education must be imparted in the schools and colleges of every description in the language or languages native to the province or district in which the schools and colleges may be situated, just as the case may be."

To some possible objection, he replies that the Government will, if the fact is impressed upon it, find means to bear the extra expenditure that will be entailed upon it by the scheme, and that it is not necessary that English should be entirely banished from the curriculum, but it can be usefully studied as a second language in the higher classes.

42. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 28th July, referring to a proposal made by the Educational department to restrict the strength of all classes in schools to thirty, remarks that this will be highly detrimental to the interests of Musalman students. The editor accepts the principle underlying the proposal, but is sceptical as to its proper and impartial working in the hands of Hindu teachers. He advises the Director of Public Instruction to reserve ten vacancies in every class out of thirty for Musalman students, otherwise they will not be able to take advantage of the educational facilities afforded at Government institutions.

BRAHMAN SARVASWA, November and December 1907.

The Swadeshi movement.

45. The editor of the Brahman Sarvaswa (Etawah), in its combined issues for November and December 1907 (received on the 27th July), notes with gratification the spread of the Swadeshi movement which has been started by the Bengalis for the regeneration of India. Government, he thinks, is entirely in the wrong in taking the Swadeshi movement to be a form of sedition, but it is not to be blamed for it since some of the Indians themselves misrepresent matters to it under the cover of loyalty for self-aggrandizement and it is the duty of the Government not to be misled by the advice of such self-seekers.

He urges that the use of foreign sugar and other foreign articles is contrary to the religion of Indians owing to their impurity, and the Government keeping in view its policy of non-interference with religion should not insist on their using foreign goods. He concludes with exhorting Indians that for the regeneration of their country they should adopt such practical measures as will tend to the attainment of Swaraj, e.g. they should boycott impure foreign goods with a view to encourage indigenous art and industries and cultivate union among themselves.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, May and June 1908.

The economic position of India.

46. Mr. R. Sundara Rajan, B.A., writing in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for May and June, on the "Economic Position of India", complains that while the average income of individuals in India is much less than that of people in Canada and Australia it has to bear a large portion of the cost of the military defence of the empire, although the army stationed in it is not solely meant for local purposes but is freely used for imperial purposes, also that the Government spends less than one penny per head per annum on education and that for every £100 spent on the army, only £4 is spent on education and that the fiscal policy of the Government is ruining the industries of India as the Government wants to enrich the cotton manufactures of Lancashire at the expense of India, and that, consequently, the rise in wages has not been proportionate to the rise in prices, and hence the people are on the verge of starvation.

In conclusion he says :—

"It is easy to conquer a well-trained phalanx. But it is hopeless to encounter a famine-stricken people; success can never be dreamt of. Success over bravery is something common place, but success over misery, with hunger in its eyes, a curse on its lips and despair in its heart, is something impossible. The Britisher, it is hoped, will take note of the signs of the times. Else they will have to meet something far more formidable than 'an Ireland in the East.' I yet believe firmly in the Saints and statesmanship of the British people. They will come forward—I hope—in time to make wise concessions. 'A move in the right direction' as Viscount Morley's phrase goes, must be made very soon."

SWARAJYA, 18th July 1908.

The first stage of the Swarajya.

47. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 18th July, has the following :—

"The patience and fearlessness with which Narayana (Shanti Narayana, the late editor of the Swarájya) has carried through the first stage of the Swarájya are known to all. Ram (Ram Das, the present editor of the paper), is prepared (to face the difficulties) of the second stage and is ever ready to follow in the footsteps of Narayana. So in Ram's presence we want an intrepid and brave young man who should be prepared to face the difficulties of the third stage. The pay will be a loaf of bread and a glass of water. Besides this anything that the Swarájya can offer. Let us see what lion's cub comes into the field."

NARAYANA'S LETTER, DISTRICT JAIL, ALLAHABAD.

The Clive Memorial.

48. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 24th July, referring to Lord Curzon's Clive Memorial Fund, advises Indians to raise a subscription to place a portrait of Omichand in the Federation Hall, but first of all they should ascertain that to do so is not a seditious act.

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 24th July 1908.

The Bengal excise policy.

49. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 26th July, referring to the policy of Sir Andrew Fraser in connection with the recommendations of the Indian Excise Commission, many of which, after being carefully considered by the Government of India, were accepted, fails to understand the attitude of the Lieutenant Governor in spite of his Christian tendencies and well-known sympathies with social and religious reforms, towards the temperance movement.

ADVOCATE, 26th July 1908.

The editor says that while in England temperance workers are fighting hard against "snuggeries," specially provided cozy rooms, veiled from public view and almost inaccessible to inspecting officers, while the Excise Commission in India thinks it proper to disallow the provision of private rooms, and while the Government of India fully accepts the recommendations, made by the Commission, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, on the report of the Calcutta Committee, not only sees no objection to such rooms but thinks that their number should be increased. Building such rooms would surely afford more facilities for the sale of foreign liquor. The policy of the Government is "to restrict to asnarrow a limit as possible, licenses for the sale of foreign liquors for consumption on the premises."

He then refers to the attitude of the Bombay Government which in his opinion is no less a cause for anxiety and concludes by saying that "all this points to the need of a fresh crusade against intemperance, demanding that the control of the drink traffic should be in hands having absolutely nothing to do with the collection of revenue from the dirty trade."

Qualifying service for pension.

50. The Union Gazette (Bareilly), of the 28th July, writes that there is a strong rumour that the period of qualifying service for pension has been reduced from 30 to 25 and from 25 to 20 years, but no official information has yet been received on this point and that persons who have completed their terms of service are impatiently waiting for an official announcement on the subject.

The Government at one time adopted measures to put down this practice, and it is again desirable that it should do so again.

"Lord Minto has very generously presented a silver embroidered carpet to the Victoria Memorial Hall. 1. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 6th August, referring to the King-Emperor's recent visit to Russia, remarks that it will apparently make the terms of the Anglo-Russian Convention more binding upon the two contracting parties, but as political conditions are constantly changing, and as no power can expect another to stick to the letter of the agreement entered upon, and also as the two kingdoms concerned, viz. Persia and Afghanistan, have not as yet expressed their intention of accepting the terms of the treaty, it is doubtful if the visit will have any tangible and substantial results.

2. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 6th August, has the following :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 6th August 1908.

The Turkish constitution.

"The Turkish constitution is more wonderful than the victory of Japan, and marks the irresistible march of the time-spirit. Let those who have eyes see and let those who have ears hear. Where shall we now turn for evidence of the profoundly wise saying that an Oriental people must be governed in an oriental manner? See, the whole world is changing, obedient to the dictates of a changeless law, and the wise man is he who listens to the law and obeys it in time. For a self-governing country to have a constitution, is natural evolution, but India is neither Persia nor Turkey, and wild revolutionary dreams in India are criminal."

(b)—Home.

3. Mr. George S. Arundale, M.A., LL.B., Vice-Principal, Central Hindu College, discusses in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for August, whether Indian students should take part in politics or not. To understand the question thoroughly, he contends, one should understand what the term politics denotes. It does not evidently imply criticism of the measures adopted by the Government without reference to logic or to fact and an effort to force upon it measures which it is not prepared to adopt. The broadest definition he can think of is that politics is a science concerned with the means of promoting the general welfare of the State. For this purpose it is necessary that the preparation should be adequate and that it should be begun while a young man is at school. He would prescribe a course of study which would include the main features of history, of the systems of Government in vogue in ancient India, and those under the Moghals and the British together with a rough estimate of the position and the duties of the Secretary of State and the India Council. When a young man enters College he must be given an insight into the working of different systems of Government, the growth of the British Parliament and the American and French Revolutions. It is at this period of his life that the student may be allowed to attend public meetings, but should never be allowed "to take a prominent part in organizing and carrying out overt acts of public agitation." It would be advisable for the Professors to attend such meetings and to criticise the speeches in their classes, and thus help the students in forming healthy opinions.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, August 1908.

Indian students and politics.

He advocates the adoption in schools of a Prefectoral system by which boys would become accustomed to discipline and the restraints put on an individual in public life. They should be encouraged to attend meetings of municipal and district boards and to study their bye-laws, so that they may get an insight into local self-government.

He advises parents to protect their children from the influence of irresponsible stump orators, who very often succeed in leading impressionable young men astray and thereby cause intense pain not only to their parents but to their Alma maters as well.

He appeals to teachers and parents to do their best in this direction.

4. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 29th July, publishes an article written by Nawab Mushtaq Husain, Secretary, Aligarh College :—

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 29th July 1908.

"Students of the Aligarh College and Politics."

"The press has been discussing whether it is prudent to allow the students of the Aligarh College to discuss political questions freely or not. Every sensible man will admit that students are generally unexperienced and their judgment is not mature, so they should devote all their time to the pursuit of knowledge and should refrain from taking any part in political discussions. But notwithstanding all this, when the very atmosphere of the country seems to be surcharged with politics, and political questions are freely discussed both on the platform and in the press, it would be futile to try to keep students beyond the pole of contagion. Even a child finds some interest in politics, and as he grows older, his interest grows stronger. So my present policy is to try to eradicate all undesirable ideas from the minds of students who have caught the contagion, and to explain what the present political policy of the Musalmans is and what it should be in future. Their policy is very straightforward and easy to understand. The political existence of the Musalmans in India depends upon the continuation of British rule, and Musalmans should try to make this rule permanent. If by an unfortunate combination of circumstances the British occupation of India comes to an end, the Musalmans will find themselves at the mercy of an oppressive Hindu majority and the truth of this statement can be demonstrated mathematically, for they form only a fifth of the population of India.

So much about our politics. But we must consider whether it would be prudent to gag our students while they are open to all outward unwholesome influences. While they are at College, it may be possible to prevent them from reading seditious pamphlets or attending seditious lectures, but during the vacations they are masters of their time, and they can use it to the worst advantage. So we must inoculate our children against the plague of sedition, and keep their minds untainted by its contagion. This cannot be effected without allowing them to express their ideas freely, and without our becoming acquainted with any undesirable ideas they may have with a view to eradicating them cautiously. This is the system I have adopted in the college.

During the late Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk's lifetime, I laid stress on this policy and both the Nawab and Mr. Archibold agreed to it. Recently, when I saw that the feeling against the British nation was gaining ground daily in the country, I wanted to get acquainted with the opinions of the students of the college on this question. I consulted Mr. Towle, the officiating Principal, and we notified that a debate on the Congress would be held in the presence of two competent trustees, but the scheme fell through as these gentlemen could not be present on the occasion.

At this stage, some of the local trustees objected to my policy, but I explained to them that sedition was rife, and that if we did not ascertain the ideas of the students on the questions of the day, and remove their misapprehensions, we would be allowing these mischievous ideas to become deeply rooted in their minds. It was then resolved that the discussions should not be merely academic, but that every student should be allowed to express his own convictions. But none of the students would openly profess themselves opposed to the general policy of the Musalmans. Then I tried to interview the senior students in batches of twenty or twenty-five each and explained to them the current political questions, inviting their opinions. I explained to them that the Moslem leaders did not wish their community to abstain from politics entirely, and they had proved this beyond doubt by inaugurating the Moslem League. They were not opposed to all the principles advocated by the Congress, e.g. that the reduction of the tax duty would benefit the Musalmans as much as the Hindus. But there are several other demands of the Congress, such as the reduction of the British troops in India or the granting of representative government to the people of India, which are not at all reasonable. The first would mean the weakening of British authority in India, and the second would bring chaos into the country.

Such interviews, I hope, will keep our students free from the taint of sedition, and the well-wishers of the college may rest assured that there will be little necessity for general debates in the future."

ADVOCATE, 2nd August 1908.

The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 2nd August, while reviewing this article, makes the following comments:—

"The Nawab need not be anxious on this score (maintenance of British Government) as this is the policy of not only Muhammadan leaders but of all the sensible leaders of public opinion in the country. If he is afraid of the representative government, he may be assured that excepting a handful of men, nobody has ever asked for government by majority at the present stage of progress in India. As to the future, it is always dangerous to predict. But who ever dreamt that a time would come when within the walls of the Aligarh College, even in the course of an anti-Congress sermon, a good word for the Congress would be said? Those of the trustees of the Aligarh College who are anxious that not only students should not take an active part in politics, but also should not take even an intellectual interest in the affairs of their country, shall have to do many an unpleasant thing and close many a form of activity of the College students, before this desire can be achieved."

ADVOCATE, 6th August 1908.

"Students of the Aligarh College and Politics."

6. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 6th August, while commenting on an article in the Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 29th July, by Nawab Mushtaq Husain, headed "Students of the Aligarh College and Politics", notes with satisfaction that the Aligarh School of Politics has given up its old policy of silence, and has taken to agitation although "respectfully and humbly." The editor, however, takes exception to the remark made by the Nawab that Musalmans would be at the mercy of the other Indian communities, if the English were to leave India. He thinks that this is a covert attack on the Hindus. Adverting to the remarks made by the Nawab on the Congress he thinks that the Nawab should have advised his students to join the Congress.

In conclusion he remarks:—

"So far, we have dealt with some of the principles and details of Nawab Vikar-ul-mulk's teaching. But before we close this article we would like to draw the attention of our readers to one important point, which perhaps we ought to have mentioned in the very beginning. And it is this. Is it right for the manager of an educational institution to teach politics? If it is so, then this fact should be made fully known. If Nawab Vikar-ul-mulk can introduce anti-Congress teaching in his institution, surely the Manager or the Principal of another college is at liberty to introduce pro-congress teaching in his institution. We beg to draw the attention of the authorities to this matter and we would like to have a clear and definite ruling on this point."

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, August 1908.

The debate in the House of Lords.

7. The editor of the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for August, under the heading "Topics of the Day", remarks as follows on the debate on India in the House of Lords:—

"The Secretary of State, who had the sagacity and the courage to speak as Lord Morley did before the veterans of the Indian Civil Service, almost on the morrow of the bomb outrages and the revelations connected with the assassins' brotherhood, deserves, we say, well of the country. It is not so very difficult to imagine that a smaller man in Lord Morley's position—and the office was occupied by small men between the brief tenure of Lord Randolph Churchill and the appointment of the present Secretary of State—would only have talked of 'martial law and no damned nonsense,' to quote a phrase of Lord Morley himself. When things had taken a very bad turn, with a section of the Anglo-Indian community crying for repression of a kind which could hardly be distinguished from oppression, Lord Morley went to the members of the Indian Civil Service themselves to tell them to their face that they had lived their lives, that their opinions were out of date and their counsels impossible of acceptance, that they hardly understood the conditions of the problem which pressed for solution, and that, with their support or without it, he would pursue a policy in harmony with British democratic sentiment and his own notions of right and wisdom. Similarly he told Lord Curzon that they could not escape their own history, that they were not at liberty to act as they fancied, that the opinion of the educated classes in India must be regarded and their political status elevated. There are a few cryptic passages in the second speech, comment on which must be reserved for the present. This can be said, however, that from beginning to end it was a severe castigation of the parent of the present trouble, we mean the late Viceroy. Lord Curzon, if he persists in playing the superior person as the only authority on Indian questions and lecturing the House of Lords, will do so at his peril, as he will get no quarter from Viscount Morley. If recent events have acted as an eye-opener to the Secretary of State and convinced him of the unwisdom of implicitly relying on the one-sided and interested counsels of the Anglo-Indian bureaucracy, as well as of regarding as settled facts whatever Lord Curzon accomplished as Viceroy, that will have been the soul of goodness in things evil. Cruel, however, have been our disappointments in the past, and we shall not be so unwise as to grow prematurely jubilant."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 2nd August 1908.

British public and Anglo-Indians.

8. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 2nd August, referring to the complaint made by some Anglo-Indians that the people of India do not any longer regard them as their ma bap or as an "incarnation of justice," but speak glibly of their own rights, which are up-held by the M.P.'s interested in India, with the result that the British public has lost its confidence in them and does not appreciate or reward their services, remarks that Mr. Stead has very truly observed in the current number of the Review of Reviews that this feeling is due to the total disregard of what the majority of Englishmen consider the fundamental principles of justice.

In conclusion the editor says :—

"The bugbear of prestige must needs come in wherever the question of fair justice to the Indian is concerned. 'One drop of cow's urine will spoil a whole pailful of pure milk,' says the Indian proverb. England will perhaps no longer be able to send out the Nicholsons or the Edwardes, the Lawrences or the Ripons to govern her dependencies with that love or sympathy which is the least right of the governed to expect from the governors."

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, August 1908.

"The New Birth in India."

9. The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for August, contains an article headed "The New Birth in India" by Dr. A. K. Coomaraswamy, D.Sc. (London). He says that the phenomenon generally known as the "Unrest in India" is not merely the outcome of the Partition of Bengal or the press prosecutions, but is in reality the dawn of national self-consciousness in India and the self-assertion and self-realization of its people. The struggle is not merely for political rights and commercial prosperity, but for the carrying forward of the great ideals of Indian culture :—

"The struggle is to be, not one in which either wealth or force will prevail; but presents itself to us as a contest of Will, a Kultur-Kampf. The present task of Indian Nationalism then is, to strengthen the National Will of India; for the result of our struggle for freedom to be ourselves, depends alone, in the last resort, on strength of will.

Our struggle is part of a wider one, the conflict between the ideals of Imperialism and the ideals of Nationalism. Between these two ideals the world has now to choose; and with the choice of Britain in particular, we are now concerned. Upon that choice depends the salvation of much that is absolutely essential to the future greatness of civilization and the richness of the world's culture. For Imperialism involves the subordination of many nationalities to one; a subordination not merely political, but also economic and mental. Nationalism is inseparable from the idea of Internationalism, recognizing the rights and worth of other nations to be even as one's own. For Britain we cannot speak; but for ourselves, the ideal is that of Nationalism and Internationalism. We feel that loyalty for us consists in loyalty to the idea of an Indian nation, politically, economically, and mentally free; that is, we believe in India for the Indians; but if we do so, it is not merely because we want our own India for ourselves, but because we believe that every nation has its own part to play in the long tale of human progress, and that nations, which are not free to develop their own individuality and character, are also unable to make the contribution to the sum of human culture which the world has a right to expect of them.

The world has progressed from the idea of individual slavery to that of individual freedom; it has become an instinct to believe that men are equal at least to this degree, that every man must be regarded as an end in himself; but progress is only now being made from the idea of national slavery (Empire) to that of national freedom (Internationalism). The dominant nations have to learn that nations, no less than men, are ends in themselves; they have yet to realize that a nation can no more ultimately justify the ownership of other nations than a man can justify the ownership of other men.

Many of the difficulties that beset the path of Indian nationality are real. The one thing strange to us is the delight with which the Britishers insist upon them, as though the possibility of an Indian nation, conscious of its past, and led by hope of days to come, were in itself an evil thing. Why is there not rejoicing at a nation's birth, or rather adolescence? for to all men the gift is given, and to all is brought the fame.

Let us not forget that in setting this ideal of Nationalism before us, we are not merely striving for a right, but accepting a duty that is binding on us, that of self-realization to the utmost for the sake of others. India's ancient contribution to the civilization of the world does not and can never justify her children in believing that her work is done. There is work yet for her to do, which if not done by her, will remain for ever undone. We may not shirk our part in the re-organization of life, which is needed to make life tolerable under changed conditions.

It is for us to proclaim that wisdom is greater than knowledge; for us to make clear anew that art is something more than manual dexterity, or the mere imitation of natural forms. It is for us to investigate the psychical and super-sensual faculties anew in the light of the discoveries of Physical Science and to show that Science and Faith may be reconciled on a higher plane than any reached as yet. It is for us to 'intellectualize' and 'spiritualize' the religious conceptions of the west.

It is from our apathy and ignorance that the call of the Motherland must waken us. We are conscious that the best in us is sleeping still; but when the sleeper wakes, who knoweth what shall come of it? One thing at least we are certain of, that the awakening must be no waking in a prison cell, but that of a free man, 'full of good hopes, of steady purpose, perfect strength.' It is for this that we are stirred, for this that we shall suffer; and this is the deeper meaning of the great Indian struggle."

In the latter part of his paper the writer discusses whether there is sufficient unity and cohesion among the Indian peoples to make national self-consciousness possible and to constitute nationality. Racial unity, he says, is not necessary for nationality. It does not constitute the Negroes of North America a nation. Unity of language, too, he does not deem necessary, and cites the case of Switzerland. "Two essentials of nationality there are—a geographical unity, and a common historical evolution or culture. These two India possesses superabundantly, besides many lesser unities which strengthen the historic traditions. The fact of India's geographical unity is apparent on the map and is never, I think, disputed. The recognition of social unity is at least as evident to the student of Indian culture." He proceeds to find unity in the art, religion and the structure of society of the various races of India. "The diverse peoples of India are like the parts of some magic puzzle, seemingly impossible to fit together, but falling easily into place when once the key is known, and the key is that realization of the fact that the parts do fit together, which we call national self-consciousness." The Musalmans, too, he thinks, have become perfectly acclimatized in India and their Perso-Arabic culture has played a great part in the historical evolution in India. They were not foreigners in the sense that the English are and they thoroughly identified themselves with the people.

"Even suppose the differences that separate the Indian communities to be twice as great as they are said to be, they are nothing compared with the difference between the Indian and the European. Western rule is inevitably alien rule in a far deeper sense than the rule of Hindus by Muhammadans or the reverse could be. And what does alien rule mean? 'The Government of a people by itself,' says John Stuart Mill, 'has a meaning and a reality, but such a thing as the government of one people by another does not and cannot exist. One people may keep another as a warren or preserve for its own use, a place to make money in, a human farm to be worked for the profit of its own inhabitants.' No cant of the 'white man's burden' alters the stern logic of these facts; to us it appears that the domination of the East by the West is a menace to the revolution of the noblest ideal of humanity; the 'white man's burden' translated into the language of Asiatic thought becomes 'the white peril;' and this is not because we despise the achievements of Western civilization, or fail to appreciate the merits of Europeans as such, but because we think that a whole world of Europeans would be a poor place, quite as poor as a whole world of Indians or Chinamen. We possess, then, a real unity and national self-consciousness, and feel it our duty to realize this consciousness in concrete form, as much for the advantage of others as of ourselves; and this without any feeling of bitterness or exclusiveness towards other races, though perhaps for a time such feelings may be inevitable. And to show what spirit moves us we have such a statement of belief in the unity of the Indian people, as the credo of Shiv Narayen; and the beautiful national song, called 'Bande Mataram' ('Hail! Motherland') which expresses, the aims and the power of the awakened Indian nation, as the Marseillaise embodied the ideal of awakened France, or as those of Ireland are expressed in the songs of Ethna of Carberry.

CREDO.

I believe in India, one and indivisible.
I believe in India, beloved mother of each and all of her many million children.
I believe in India's divine mission.
I believe in the saints of her birth and the heroes of her breeding.
I believe in India the invincible, whom the world's loftiest and holiest mountains defend.
I believe in the invigorating power of the ocean, on whose lap lies my mother secure.
I believe in India, the beautiful;—Nature's own paradise of loveliest flowers and streams.
I believe in the sanctity of her every particle.
I believe in India's departed sons, whose ashes are mingled in the air, earth, and water, that give me my food, and form my very blood.
I am bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh.
I believe in the abiding relationship of Indians of all times and all communities.
I believe in the brotherhood of all who belong to India's soil, be they of whatsoever caste or creed.
I believe in the living Indian nation, dearer to her children than aught else of earthly kinship.
I believe in her golden past and glorious future.
I believe in the righteousness, valour and patriotism of Indian manhood.
I believe in the tenderness, chastity and selflessness of Indian womanhood.
I believe in India for the Indian people to live for and to die for.
I believe in one land, one nation, one ideal, and one cause.
The service of my countrymen is the breath of my life,—the be-all and end-all of my existence.

These words are not the hysterical utterance of a people uncertain of their unity or doubtful of their future. They express the Indian recognition of the Motherland, their quiet but profound assurance of her greatness and beauty, and their consciousness of the high calling which is hers. They voice the hope of an INDIAN NATION, which shall not be disappointed."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 6th August 1908.

A call to duty.

10. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 6th August, while referring to Babu Surendra Nath Banerjee's recent speech in Calcutta, remarks :—

"Will there be a quick response to this eloquent call to duty by a man whose name stands for single-hearted patriotism and lifelong devotion to the country? The whole country has been reduced to a state of pitiful demoralization. The terrorist plot has not succeeded in overthrowing the British Government, or even in shaking it, but it seems to have filled the whole country with terror which broods over men as a terrible incubus. What is this terrible octopus which has seized in its paralysing grip all the energy and activity of the country? Because an anarchist plot has been discovered, because a number of prosecutions for sedition have been instituted—is lawful and constitutional agitation to be abandoned? Are we to spend all our time in ferreting out anarchists and spying sedition-mongers? Surely, there is nobler and better work awaiting us. The Mahajana Sabha of Madras has abandoned the Provincial Conference because of the unsettled state of things this year. Is the resuscitation of the Congress also to be given up? And if so, what is to be done? Are we to sit still with folded hands, or should we clamber on the fence and wait for developments? In the first place, our indifference will make no difference to the course of events; in the next, it is unmanly to shirk a duty which has the first call on us. If lawful agitation will diminish, lawless agitation will grow. Co-operation with the authorities for the maintenance of order does not mean vain or terror-inspired professions of loyalty. The true loyalty is that which combines obedience to authority with loyal devotion to the motherland. Should we fail in our duty to the country we shall be doubly disloyal. A fierce revolutionary propaganda is threatening to overwhelm the country. This must be resisted by all who are opposed to a great calamity falling on the country and the people. Not by listlessness and indifference, nor by stolid silence, but by earnest and whole-hearted effort and full devotion to the best interests of the country can the advancing flood of revolution be stemmed."

Conferences.

11. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 6th August, has the following :— ADVOCATE, 6th August 1908.

"The decision of the Madras Mahajana Sabha not to hold a Provincial Conference this year on account of the state of public feeling does not meet with our approval. It is true that the people's minds are agitated and few people think of Congress and Conferences in these days, but it is the time when people who recognize the necessity of making respectful representations to Government should meet and consider the situation and render such advice as would prove advantageous both to the Government and the public. In October or November next when Lord Morley presents a bill to the House of Lords to amend the Indian Councils Act, it will be time for educated Indians who have not lost faith in constitutional agitation to meet in however small a number it may be in their conferences and congresses to have their say on the Government proposals before their final adoption."

Indian budget in the House of Commons.

12. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 31st July, says that the Under-Secretary's speech on the Indian budget in the House of Commons shows that the time is not far off when aspirations of Indians may be realized in some measure. The editor highly approves of the measures with which Mr. Buchanan has proposed to draw Indians nearer the Crown and remarks that the greatest need for the Government at the present time is to show to the people by its acts that it is sincerely and earnestly desirous of fulfilling their desires for progress which, in the words of Mr. Gokhale, ultimately aim at their being in their country what others are in their's. He agrees with the Under-Secretary that the undoing of the partition of Bengal cannot remove the evils created by it, but suggests that its modification in such a manner as to keep all the Bengali-speaking population under one administrative head will go a long way towards eliminating the bitterness of feeling in Bengal, which the Under-Secretary has recognized to be his duty to remove by administrative reforms. ABHYUDAYA, 31st July 1908.

Reforms.

13. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd August, referring to a statement in the Manchester Guardian that Lord Morley is going to appoint an Indian gentleman to the Viceroy's Executive Council, remarks :— ADVOCATE, 2nd August 1908.

"But it is no good hiding the impression amongst the people that the appointment of two Indians on the India Council and of one on the Viceroy's Executive Council, if it comes at all, is but a poor response to the demand for a larger share being granted to Indians in the administration of the country's affairs. Reforms on the lines adopted by Sir George Clarke, and such on a larger scale may to some extent find adequate employment for qualified Indians who have got the public spirit to be of service to their people. In different directions and in almost all departments of the public service, Imperial and Provincial, local and municipal, openings have to be made to utilize the services, paid as well as honorary, of Indians willing to work. As the Governor of Bombay thinks, a little loss in so-called efficiency at the start will be more than made up by the growing patriotism of educated Indians and enthusiastic performance of duty as a consequence. The public spirit is there, and growing every day. To turn it into channels of useful service is the only way to save it from spending itself in destructive criticism."

Treatment of Indians by Europeans.

14. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 31st July, contains an article in which the writer controverts the arguments advanced by the Pioneer in the issue of the 11th July that in the relations between Indians and Europeans, the alteration is not on the side of the Englishman. While admitting that Indians have begun to have greater regard for their self-respect as the result of their English education, he denies that there has been any deterioration in their attitude towards their rulers, although they now no longer indulge in abject flattery of the Europeans. He affirms that the Pioneer's statement is quite unfair and incorrect, and that with few honourable exceptions, Europeans now treat Indians worse than ever. In his opinion the study of a historical primer, such as suggested by a correspondent of the Pioneer, will not help in removing the growing discontent in the country unless the attitude of the ABHYUDAYA, 31st July 1908.

rulers towards the ruled changes for the better and they treat the latter as a King ought to treat his subjects.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, August 1908.

Indians in Natal.

15. The editor of the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), in the issue for August, writing under the heading "Topics of the Day" refers to the recent anti-Indian legislation in Natal, and remarks that it will undermine the confidence of the people of India and other non-white members of the Empire in the sense of justice of the British and is bound in the end to have disastrous effects on the continued stability of the British Empire. He quotes at length from a paper by one Mr. L. S. Amery on "Military Geography of the British Empire" to show that unless Britain is prepared to assimilate the non-white races of the Empire and confer upon them citizen rights, it will be hard for it to maintain its struggle with Germany and America.

In conclusion he says :—

"In the light of the considerations presented above, what is one to think of the policy that is being pursued in Natal and the Transvaal, and in the British colonies generally, towards the unoffending and industrious Indians, who in a moment of folly settled in those regions? For the time being success may desert the Indian cause, but time will bring strange reverses of fortune and Britain may have cause to remember with sorrow the late Lord Salisbury's famous saying that 'injustice will bring down the mightiest to ruin.' We make no prophecy but express a fear. We utter no threat, but make an appeal. Lord Rosebery has said that the British Empire is the greatest secular power on earth making for good. This may or may not be so. Certain it is that too often the non-white members of the Empire are made to question its beneficence by reason of the absolutely short-sighted policy of those who call themselves Imperialists to-day, but may be known in history as the real Empire-wreckers. To be sure, difficult is the task and heavy the responsibility of present-day British statesmen, and it is our prayer that their policy may be dictated by Right and Justice, and that the moral law may always prevail in their decisions."

ABHYUDAYA, 31st July 1908.

His Honour's speeches at Lucknow and Allahabad.

16. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 31st July, highly approves of Sir John Hewett's speeches in Lucknow and Allahabad in which he appealed to all Indians to co-operate with the Government in the suppression of sedition and anarchism, and believes that His Honour's appeal will not fall on deaf ears and that it will be productive of very beneficial results. The editor admits that attempts have been made from time to time to mislead school boys and college students and to poison their minds against the Government. He urges that guardians and parents should take steps to prevent the minds of their boys from being contaminated with disloyalty and anarchism. In his opinion religious instruction and study of a text book setting forth the real state of affairs in India, the merits and shortcomings of British rule in this country and the right ways and means of increasing the former and eliminating the latter will be adequate to keep the youths of these provinces in the right path. They should be clearly given to understand that constitutional agitation in the case of India is capable of realizing their highest aspirations and that their resort to sedition and anarchism will only retard the progress of their country instead of helping it forward.

OUDH AKHBAR, 3rd August 1908.

His Honour the Lieutenant Governor's speeches.

17. The editor of the Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), in the issue of the 3rd August, expresses his approval of His Honour's recent speeches, and remarks that he does not condemn constitutional agitation or the industrial regeneration of the country. The editor advises the people to be respectful in demanding their rights and to improve their industries quietly, in doing which they will have the hearty co-operation of the Government.

AL BASHIR, 4th August 1908.

His Honour's speech at Lucknow.

18. Referring to His Honour's remarks in the speech he recently delivered at Government House, Lucknow, the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 4th August, remarks :—

"I.—It is true, as has been observed by His Honour, that seditious ideas have been spread among students by the teachers of village schools, and that it is all due to the fact that service in the Educational department has been, so to speak, monopolized by members of one community alone.

The editor is of opinion that special care should be taken in appointing village school masters, sub-overseers of canals and sub-deputy inspectors of schools. They should invariably be of different creeds as they have intimate connections with the village people and exercise much influence over them.

II.—As to the second point of His Honour's speech, that raises should give prompt information of the spread of any seditious ideas that may come to their knowledge, he says that it is the duty of every loyal citizen to give such information to the Government, but the treatment recently meted out to the officers and informers in the well-known Etawah conspiracy case has terrified the public and consequently before the Government can expect to get any information of this nature from any one it should assure the informers of their safety against the insinuations of their antagonists.

III.—The editor also agrees with the third remark of His Honour that people of other provinces come and preach sedition in these provinces. He is most suspicious of the Punjabis, who are mostly employed in the Engineering department, and advises the Government to prevent them from getting employment in the Canal or Public Works departments, which should always be reserved for the natives of these provinces only."

The editor also points out that Bengalis who are domiciled in these provinces are not, as they give out, strictly speaking, natives of the United Provinces, and a good deal in the way of spreading seditious ideas in these provinces is effected through persons who come to them from Bengal. He advises the Government to stop all possible sources from which sedition springs in these provinces.

Bomb outrages.

19. Referring to the bomb outrage, the editor of the Asar-i-Jadid (Meerut), in the issue for July, writes :— ASAR-I-JADID, July 1908.

"Hitherto we had purposely abstained from writing anything on this subject. But it is certain that the political condition of every community or party in India is becoming worse and more dangerous every day. Bomb-throwers will now be crushed with great difficulty, though perhaps they may not be crushed at all. There can be but little doubt that these enthusiastic young men are disposed to think that their mission is based entirely on honest intentions. But the suitable place for such well-intentioned persons who meddle with the peace of the country and involve it in difficulties of a fearful nature, is not the jail but the lunatic asylum.

We are not in sympathy with the belief that the Government is in reality responsible for such outrageous incidents. It will be a very preposterous inference and will throw the responsibility of all crimes in the world on persons who have no concern with them."

The partition of Bengal.

20. The editor of the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), in the issue for August, while referring to the attempt made by Lord Curzon during the debate in the House of Lords to disavow his connection with the partition, remarks that the responsibility lies entirely with him, and that he cannot explain away the facts that the despatch on the subject was sent to the Secretary of State on his arrival in India, and that he hurried the necessary legislation through the Council, although the Secretary of State had given a pledge that nothing of this nature was to be done. HINDUSTAN REVIEW, August 1908.

The editor advises the Government to amalgamate Eastern and Western Bengal with Assam and place them under a Lieutenant Governor, the Commissioner of Assam having the same powers as the Commissioner of Sind, to place Behar and Chota Nagpur under a Lieutenant Governor and to amalgamate Orissa with the Central Provinces. He thinks that a representative commission should be appointed by the Government to report on the matter.

Conviction of Fazal-ul Hasan Mohani.

21. Referring to the attacks of Hindu journalists on Nawab Maulvi Mushtaq Husain, for his giving evidence for the prosecution in the case of Fazal-ul Hasan Mohani, charged for writing seditious articles, a correspondent of the Sahifa (Bijnor), in the issue SAHIFA, 26th July 1908.

of the 26th July, holds that the conduct of the Nawab was wholly justified and commendable.

He further remarks that the Muhammadans had too much experience of the treacherous conduct of the Hindus during the Mutiny of 1857 to show any sympathy with their present lawless conduct.

ABHYUDAYA, 31st July 1908.

Anglo-Indian papers and section 153A., Indian Penal Code.

22. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 31st July, says that several of the Anglo-Indian dailies are guilty of creating racial hatred between the different classes of His Majesty's subjects. The articles which not unfrequently appear in these papers about Indian leaders cannot but create hatred in the mind of every thinking Indian against those Anglo-Indians whose feelings they represent. The editor does not know whether Government has taken any step to exercise check over them or not and urges that it should apply section 153A., Indian Penal Code, to Indian and Anglo-Indian papers alike as the exemption of the latter from the operation of that section is more calculated to excite hatred and discontent than seditious articles in the Indian press.

MUSAFIR, 31st July 1908.

Conviction of Mr. Tilak and the freedom of the press in India.

23. Referring to the conviction of Mr. Tilak, the editor of the Musáfir (Agra), in the issue of the 31st July, remarks that Mr. Tilak's speech in his defence before the High Court was in reality the last but the most emphatic appeal for the freedom of the press in India.

He further remarks that the conviction of Mr. Tilak for these so-called seditious articles, has given a death blow to the freedom of the press in this country and that the conduct of the Government in this case has clearly shown that it is not prepared to tolerate any criticism from the press upon its measures, even if it be made in good faith and with honesty of purpose.

In conclusion, he says, that under the circumstances it will be entirely foolish and nothing short of suicidal on the part of any journalist, however honest he may be in his purpose, to criticise any measures of the Government.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, August 1908.

"The Present Situation in India."

24. Mr. Radhka Narayan Mathur writing in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for August, on "The Present Situation in India," condemns the revolutionary tactics of the so-called patriots, and thinks that they will retard the progress of the country instead of furthering it. He cites the cases of Ireland and Russia which, although stronger than India, have failed to elicit any substantial concessions. He thinks that in the interests of peace and order those responsible for the bomb outrages should be punished, but unrestrained repression should not be resorted to, as it would embitter the minds of the people towards the Government. He strongly condemns the mischievous policy of those Anglo-Indian papers which are blaming the whole Hindu population of being implicated in the bomb conspiracy. He advises the Government to "remove the root cause of the present unrest and the ultimate result of which will tend to constitute the permanent foundation of the British power upon the willing allegiance and the devoted contentment of 300 millions of human beings."

ADVOCATE, 2nd August 1908.

The situation in Bombay.

25. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd August, referring to the conciliatory attitude of Sir G. Clarke during the disturbances in Bombay, remarks :—

"May we ask which policy is best : that of Sir George Clarke or of the Times of India which is still crying for blood and inciting the Government to adopt vindictive measures ?"

ADVOCATE, 2nd August 1908.

The Australian offer.

26. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd August, has the following :—

"The Sixth Australian Infantry, of which the present Governor of Bombay is the Honorary Colonel, offered to come all the way from that continental island to quell the disturbance in Bombay. This the Empire of Calcutta ascribes to the despatch of sensational, and necessarily mendacious, cables to the four corners of the world and speaks of two reports having come to our contemporary from two quarters to say that martial law had been proclaimed in Bombay, one actually insisting that a company of Mahratta infantry had been disarmed as it refused to fire on the rioters. What scandalous prostitution is being made of the cable and the press by designing persons whose one interest lies in showing that India is seething in discontent and Indians on the point of breaking out into revolt in order not only to stay the reforming hand of Lord Morley, but force him to sanction a campaign of repression, pure and simple, by rousing the ire of the British nation at home and of Britons of the oversea dominions. As all parts of the Empire look to the heart, London, for enlightenment, it is high time that Mr. Stead's suggestion of having a strong representative Indian National Council in London 'to advise the British public as to what is being done and what ought to be done in India' should be carried out."

The causes of unrest in India during 1907-8.

27. In continuation of his article entitled "The Causes of Unrest in India during 1907-8" (vide paragraph 8, Selections No. 31, current), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 4th August, remarks that a perusal of Indian history will show that the Muhammadan rulers from the time of Akbar to the present day never opposed the English in establishing themselves in India. On the other hand, they always rendered them material help whenever they were in difficulty and needed such assistance. The few wars that were waged by the Muhammadan rulers of India against the English were invariably the consequences of grave provocation given to them by the latter.

The Quebec Tercentenary.

An Indian member in the Executive Council.

29. Referring to the contemplated appointment of an Indian member in the Executive Council of the Viceroy, the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 5th August, remarks that the proportion of one Indian member to six Europeans can be of no material good, but after all it is better to have one than none at all.

Mr. Tilak's conviction.

30. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 29th July, writes :—

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 29th July 1908.

"Mr. Tilak's contention that the alleged seditious articles were written on the spur of the moment was correct, inasmuch as though the said articles were written twelve days after the bomb outrage, they were written when his mind was completely upset by the articles in the Pioneer and other Anglo-Indian dailies. But Mr. Justice Davar asked the jury to find Mr. Tilak guilty in any case : Government's object was fulfilled when its prosecution of Mr. Tilak converted him from an Extremist into a Moderate and one or one and a half years' rigorous imprisonment would have quite sufficed for him, and in that case feeling would not have run so high in favour of Mr. Tilak as it has done by his transportation for six years. Here was an opportunity for allaying the discontent consequent on Mr. Tilak's arrest, but it is to be deplored that the officials failed to take advantage of it."

Mr. Tilak's defence.

31. Referring to the arguments put forth by Mr. Tilak in his defence before the Court, the editor of the Qulqul (Bijnor), in the issue of the 31st July, remarks that the points urged by Mr. Tilak are exactly what the journalists had till then been crying for but no heed was paid to them. The editor further remarks that as these points have been emphatically urged by Mr. Tilak, it is hoped that justice will now be done in this matter and that the Anglo-Indian journalists, who had been writing as objectionable articles as the Indian will now be brought to justice, especially when their Indian brethren have been brought to grief for writing articles similar to their own and in a modified and less offensive tone.

QULQUL, 31st July 1908.

MUKHBIR-I-ALAM, 31st July 1908.

Conviction of Mr. Tilak.

32. Referring to the conviction of Mr. Tilak, the editor of the Mukhbir-i-Alam (Moradabad), in its issue of the 31st July, agrees with the opinion of the Anglo-Indian journalists that Mr. Tilak's conviction will have a great effect in maintaining peace and order in the country.

He further remarks that considering that Mr. Tilak did not keep up his promise of not writing seditious articles, which he made to the Government when he was previously convicted for a similar offence, the sentence of six years' transportation, now passed on him, appears to be very mild and shows that the Government has taken a merciful view of his serious offence.

In a subsequent note he adds that it is no use now to hold meetings to express sympathy with him, as such meetings will in no way benefit the conveners.

HINDUSTANI, 5th August 1908.

Mr. Tilak's trial.

33. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 5th August, reproduces the remarks of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 30th July, on Mr. Tilak's trial. (Vide paragraph 34, Selections No. 31.)

INDIAN PEOPLE, 2nd August 1908.

Mr. Justice Davar.

34. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 2nd August, has the following :—

"Exception has been taken to two remarks made by Mr. Justice Davar while passing sentence on Mr. Tilak. The first is: 'I have decided to pass a sentence which I consider will be stigmatised as what is called 'misplaced leniency.' It has been rightly observed that it is no part of a Judge's duty to consider, much less publicly declare, what the public may think of an order passed by him. His duty is to administer the law regardless of what any one may think. Again, the apprehension that the sentence would be stigmatised as misplaced leniency is unfounded. Even the Pioneer considers the punishment sufficient, while Indian public opinion considers it too severe. To the transportation for six years is to be added imprisonment for six months by the Bombay Government. Is not that ample for a man 53 years of age and known to be suffering from a malady which invariably shortens life? The other remark Mr. Justice Davar made was when he spoke of the country which the prisoner professed to love. Surely, that was an uncalled for and unkind remark. Whatever direction it took, Mr. Tilak's patriotism is intensely real and is the secret of his hold over his people. The Mahratta is indignant and points out that had he chosen, Mr. Tilak might have become a Judge of the High Court and would have been senior to Mr. Justice Davar, but he deliberately chose the path of sacrifice. Mr. Justice Davar's words would have lost nothing in dignity if these remarks had been left out."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 2nd August 1908.

Hoti Lal Varma.

35. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 2nd August, has the following :—

"A stranger or a more deplorable fate than that of Hoti Lal Varma has seldom been heard of. So far, we have heard nothing of his family or his antecedents. What took him to Europe is a mystery, nor is the object of his extensive travels known. From the papers found on him, it is inferred that he must have learnt the manufacture of explosives and bombs and intended to teach it to others. Except, however, a thermometer to register very high temperature, no suspicious materials were found on him. He has only recently, it seems, returned from Europe, and almost the first thing he did was to send that foolish message to the Bande Mataram in defiance of the law. It is reported that he was engaged in other dangerous pursuits, and is being prosecuted for another offence. But after the severe sentence passed upon him is it necessary for the Government to proceed with the other charge? Offenders of his type may be rightly pursued with the utmost rigour of the law, but when the end of justice is satisfied, the law may very properly stay its hand. Seven years in the Andamans may bring Hoti Lal repentance and wisdom and cure him of his revolutionary ideas. He may reform and live to become a useful and law-abiding citizen. Confirmed anarchists and revolutionists are not deserving of any consideration but the fanaticism of youth may pass and with years may come sobriety and wisdom."

ADVOCATE, 2nd August 1908.

Hoti Lal Varma.

36. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd August, referring to the conviction of Hoti Lal Varma, remarks that section 124A. is not exactly applicable in his case, and that the sentence of seven years is rather heavy.

"We must at the same time confess," the editor says, "that there was no extenuating circumstance in the case. Hoti Lal was known for some time past as an adventurer who used the profession of a newspaper correspondent for his own purposes and who would use any ignoble means to obtain his end."

37. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 5th August, reproduces the comments of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd August, on the conviction of Hoti Lal Varma.

HINDUSTANI, 5th August 1908.

Hoti Lal Varma.

Two Allahabad cases.

38. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 2nd August, has the following :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 2nd August 1908.

"There is a close resemblance between the two cases of Wall and his wife, and Augier, for all of them were guilty of breach of trust of a particularly heinous character. Holding the responsible appointment of an engineer in the Public Works Department, Wall and his wife deliberately and systematically robbed public money and spent it in extravagant living. Augier abused his position as an executor and trustee and misappropriated moneys which he should have honestly administered. He filed false accounts to conceal his peculations. The sentence of simple imprisonment for a year may be sufficient in the case of Mrs. Wall, for the law is not vindictive, but no adequate explanation can be found for the very lenient sentences passed on Wall and Augier. The soundest and wisest view on the subject of European offenders was held by Sir Douglas Straight who was of opinion that when a European and an Indian were found guilty of the same offence the European should be more severely punished, inasmuch as he was expected to show an example of morality and respect for the law to his Indian fellow-subject. It is tolerably certain that an Indian in the position of Wall or Augier would have been sentenced to a longer term of imprisonment as no extenuating circumstances were present in either case, unless the theory is put forward that a short period of imprisonment in the case of a respectable person is as effective as a longer period in that of a man in a lower station of life."

39. The editor of the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for August, writing under the heading "The Topics of the Day", characterises the sentences of transportation for life and for ten years, respectively, awarded to Chedambaram Pillai and Subramania Siva, as monstrous, and hopes that they will be reduced by the High Court. He thinks that the remarks made by the Judge, Mr. Pinhey, on political agitation, &c., were objectionable.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, August 1908.

Political offenders.

In conclusion he expresses his strong disapproval of the imposition of a sentence of rigorous imprisonment on political offenders. The Government, he says, is not vindictive, and it must be deemed sufficient to restrain their liberty of action. He also does not understand why whenever there is an application for bail, the Government should step in and strenuously oppose it.

40. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 3rd August, notes with regret that the exemplary punishments inflicted by the Government on journalists have had no salutary effect upon them, and thinks that as long as the Government does not adopt a conciliatory attitude, the present trouble will not be removed.

41. Referring to the troubles of the proprietors and tenants of landed property within the limits of the Agra Cantonment, the Mufid-i-Ám (Agra), of the 1st August, remarks that it is owing to such difficulties that landlords in cantonments are now trying to sell off their holdings.

MUFID-I-AM, 1st August 1908.

Complaints of the residents of the Agra Cantonment.

The editor suggests that section 2, sub-section 1 of the Cantonment Act of 1899 should be amended and that the punishment of imprisonment should be eliminated, otherwise cantonments will gradually be deserted by all the landholders who at present reside in them.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 6th August 1908.

Extension of Allahabad.

42. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 6th August, while referring to His Honour's remarks on the extension of Allahabad, remarks :—

"We are prepared to admit that the Government must reserve land for public purposes, but we shall ask His Honour to consider whether those who intend to build decent bungalows and spend some money over them well care to have small compounds. Do not the rules of sanitation itself demand that there should be a good deal of open space round a dwelling-house? Might we, in this connection, venture to remark that the rebuke administered to the deputation by His Honour was hardly justifiable? Assuming that no reference was made to the speech delivered by him only a few days previously, we question the propriety of taking the deputation to task at Government House. Such minor matters should not be taken notice of. The Hindu scriptures enjoin the performance of duty without any desire to profit by its results."

ADVOCATE, 6th August 1908.

Sanitation of Act XX Towns.

43. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 6th August, while commenting on an article in the Pioneer on the Sanitation of Act XX Towns, remarks that the best way of improving their sanitation is to instil some life into the people of these towns by reviving the old system of panchayets under the presidency of the tahsildar. Latrine tax will not be popular, says the editor, unless there are arrangements for cleaning private latrines. The members of the panchayet should not be appointed by the tahsildar but chosen by the people. The District Board should liberally assist them in improving the sanitation of the towns.

SAMRAT, 24th May 1908.

The proposed Rajput College at Agra.

44. The Samrát (Kalakankar), of the 24th May (received on the 7th July), referring to the proposed Rajput College at Agra, notes with gratification that the Viceroy has been pleased to extend his patronage to it and that the Lieutenant Governor of these provinces has promised to give Government aid to it.

The editor, however, takes exception to the management of the college being handed over to authorities on the ground that in that case instruction in religion and ancient history would not be imparted to Rajput boys. He notes with regret that the name of the Raja of Kalakankar has been left out from the Managing Committee of the College. He also objects to the oath of loyalty being taken by the teachers and students of the college as Rajputs have always been loyal to the Government and they are above suspicion.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, August 1908.

Scientific education.

45. Mr. Mahesh Charan Sinha, B.A., M.Sc., in a paper on Electro-Chemistery in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for August, remarks :—

"India, too, unless she has decided to sink down to the level of Negroes, Mulattos, Malays and Red Indians, ought to establish schools and colleges where up-to-date science can be taught, not with a view to pay dividends out of the schools or merely to enable a student to work in the factory as a working man, but with a view to train at least some men who can keep up on a level with the best scientists in the other parts of Europe and thus to keep that intelligence in the country existing which can cope with the changed industrial conditions of the improved world, for in the end all science is hitched to produce wealth for the country or to remove human suffering, both of which objects deserve the sympathy and encouragement of men of pelf and power."

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, August 1908.

Modern education and Sloyd.

46. Mr. K. Ramanujan, editor of the Mysore Review, writing in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for August, on the introduction of Sloyd in Mysore, remarks :—

"The Imperial Government has of late been evincing much solicitude for the expansion of useful primary education throughout India. Will they graciously bring their minds to bear upon the introduction of the system into some of the presidential schools, at least, to start with? They may well keep their eyes on Mysore for a time to come and see what degree of success attends its introduction in Mysore, and if Mysore does progress with it they can do no better than by espousing it themselves. And the United Provinces have got the supreme good fortune of being ruled by a gentleman, Sir John Hewett, who is nothing, if not eager, to promote Technical and Industrial Education in the United Provinces. If these lines catch his eyes, may we expect of him to institute inquiries and do something in the direction ? I humbly trust he will."

The Canning College.

47. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd August, has the following :— ADVOCATE, 2nd August 1908.

"The letter contributed by Raja Pirthipal Singh about the future of the Canning College expresses the public feeling. What the province wants is a first class College in Oudh, having fully developed sides in Science and Arts. If the Taluqdars can find money well and good. If the Government can increase its grant and allow the Committee to continue, still better. But if it comes to having a College with an Arts side only maintained by the Taluqdars or a first class College maintained by Government, then we have no hesitation in saying, however regretable it may be, that the Canning College Committee should cease to exit ; we would prefer to have a Government College well epuipped and well managed like other state institutions rather than a second class Taluqdari College."

The Canning College.

48. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 5th August, reproduces the remarks of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd August, on the improvement of the Canning College, Lucknow. HINDUSTANI, 5th August 1908.

"The Cry from Students."

49. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd August, referring to the non-admission of several students to schools and colleges on the plea of want of room and the inability of professors and teachers to give full attention to every individual in an inordinately large class of students, remarks that many young men will for this reason find the door of education closed against them, as many of them are too poor or too young to avail themselves of educational facilities in other towns; and as a result they will either swell the number of applicants for employments in Government offices or the number of the discontented and dissatisfied. ADVOCATE, 2nd August 1908.

The editor advises the Educational department to publish full statistics regarding this, so that the people may make their own arrangements to supplement the efforts of Government.

University courses.

51. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd August, publishes the following letter :— ADVOCATE, 2nd August 1908.

"SIR,—The course for the Allahabad University Intermediate Examination of 1909 has been changed and increased much. Nearly the whole of the English course has been changed and in the translation paper there will be an essay also. In Persian, one book Anwar-Suhaily, has been added for rapid reading and there will be three papers now instead of two.

Now, for the students who have failed in the examination of 1908 it will be very difficult to prepare this additional and new course. Hence some concession must be shown to them. Had the course been slightly changed or only partly changed there would have been no grudge. But the course is perfectly changed and increased, and the students have to prepare all this changed and additional course in one year. Anwar-Suhaily is a book of 400 pages and by no means an easy work. There will be a paper (separate) for composition for which they must work hard separately. And they have the new English course to prepare. All this two years' course is to be done in one year. Possibly they cannot do it. It would be better to hold a supplementary examination in which the plucked students might go in for the same course as last year. And if they are not allowed this concession, they might at least be exempted from the additional course, i.e. they might be exempted from the essay paper in English and Anwar-Suhaily and composition paper in Persian.

One thing more. It is rumoured here that the next University Examinations are to be held in March next and there will be two papers a day. Is this true? If so, let the University be well advised beforehand. This matter has already been more criticised last year and I have not to say much.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 6th August 1908.

53. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 6th August, has the following on the placing of Board schools under Government control :—

Board schools versus Government High Schools.

"It is plain that Government should not attempt to do more than set a standard and that having established a sufficient number of schools to serve as models, it should encourage private enterprise to supply such additional schools as may be needed. It may be necessary for the Government to open and keep control of more than one such school in one district or district head quarters. But generally one such school for each district will answer the present needs. Private schools have only to be remodelled to a certain system on the lines suggested by the rules of the proposed scheme. The only care we ought to take is that sufficient and good provisions are made for the number of school-going boys at any particular place and that the guiding principle of departmental control should be sufficiently elastic and sympathetic as to be easily distinguished and differentiated from such principles obtained in any executive department."

ADVOCATE, 2nd August 1908.

57. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 2nd August, has the following :—

The Anglo-Indian press.

"Mr. Buchanan's reply to Mr. O'Grady's question about East Bengal News and Era is surprising. We understand that the Home department supplies the Secretary of State with extracts from vernacular papers including newspapers conducted in English by Indians. Are these extracts confined to Indian papers only and are no selections made from Anglo-Indian papers to show the vulgarity of their attacks on Indians ?"

ADVOCATE, 6th August 1908.

58. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 6th August, has the following remarks on the Isanagar Estate :—

The Isanagar Estate.

"If officers of the experience of Mr. Fremantle and Mr. Faunthorpe, both of whom have long experience of Kheri, think that it is possible by better management to raise the income of the property and thus place its revenues in a position to pay off the debts, we hope that the Local Government will be pleased to save one more estate of Oudh from disruption. It is true that there will be many more claimants for such benevolent intervention by the Government, but that feeling need not stand in the way of saving this estate which has been ruined not so much by the extravagance of the proprietors but by their incompetence to manage their valuable property."

The Juttogh tragedy.

59. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 6th August, has the following :— ADVOCATE, 6th August 1908.

"The cold-blooded murder of a European nurse at Juttogh is distressing. It has yet to be known what led to the crime. But the shooting of a drabi by a soldier of a Mountain Battery for no offence but because the drabi happened to be the countryman of the murderer of the nurse, is simply thrilling. This is the first case of insensate vindictiveness and we trust that the Corporal will get his deserts and will not be allowed to take shelter under the plea of temporary insanity."

"The Ghaziabad Railway accident case is going on in the District Magistrate's Court. In the course of the evidence the tahsildar said : 'There were 12 corpses, one white man and eleven natives. Mr. Whaley (the Station Superintendent) told me to bury them. I said no ; this cannot be done as some of the bodies will be claimed by their relatives, and others will have to be buried properly. Mr. Whaley then told the Deputy Sub-Inspector to do it, but he refused to do so, as I was a Magistrate and had not ordered him. I then asked Mr. Whaley to take the corpses in the train, and as he refused I had them carried in carts to Ghaziabad.' Is this, we ask, humanity and does this evidence not give colour to the popular belief that the Railway officials are eager to minimise the seriousness of Railway accidents by disposing of dead bodies without giving any chance to the relations of the deceased to find them out ?"

Swaraj in Turkey.

1. The following is an extract from an article entitled "Swaraj in Turkey" from the Sipáhi (Cawnpore), for July :— SIPAHI, July 1908.

"It is a matter of great joy, it is a very auspicious omen and it is a sign of prosperous days to come, that the Sultan of Turkey, too, has ordered that Swaraj should be established in his Empire. Oh! how glorious are the works of God! In one part of the world sorrow reigns supreme, and in another, people are overflowing with joy and lighting lamps. On the 24th July there was wailing in many parts of India [on account of Mr. Tilak's conviction (?)], but on the same night there was rejoicing in Constantinople, its streets were illuminated, and the light playing upon the people's faces said: 'O! Turks, to-day you have become men' . . . . .

'Oh! Almighty God, will such incidents ever have their effect on our country—India? Shall we true [faithful (?)] Indians, both Hindus and Musalmans, ever have the opportunity of going in ships in large numbers to congratulate our king on granting us Swaraj?'"

Revolution in Turkey.

2. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 5th August, welcomes the dawn of parliamentary government in Turkey and congratulates the Sultan on gratifying the long-cherished desire of his people. The editor lays great stress on the granting of equal rights to Musalmans and Christians and thinks that it will lead to a better understanding between the followers of the two religions. He repudiates the rumour that the Sultan does not like popular government and prevailed upon the Shah to prorogue the Persian Parliament. ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 5th August 1908.

Revolution in Turkey.

3. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 13th August, referring to the constitutional movement in Turkey and Persia, remarks :— ADVOCATE, 13th August 1908.

"Our Muhammadan friends have also something to learn in this connection. Those who, against the opinion of the Moslem world outside India, pray against the introduction of representative institutions in India, have either degenerated or do not belong to those glorious races that go to form the cream of the thoughtful Moslem abroad."

The evolution of Asia.

5. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 9th August, has the following :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 9th August 1908.

"We have said that the achievement of Japan does not convey an immediate message to India, and the revolutions of Persia and Turkey do not constitute a spur to Indian effort, and we have said so deliberately. At the same time, it would be positively false to say that events of such portentous magnitude can fail to produce the profoundest effect upon India. All the Asiatic countries that have witnessed such amazing changes are self-governing; India is not, and does not think of becoming self-governing in the sense of putting an end to British rule. It would be a greater error, however, to think that India will remain always the same, or is the same that it was ten years ago. No, the spirit of nations is now moving fast and no one may tell what a year or six months may bring. One of the stock and stupid arguments that we constantly hear is that the educated classes in India are in an insignificant minority and they stand apart from the rest of the country. Those who say this do not believe it, for the educated classes constitute the fulcrum to raise the whole country, they are the pivot on which the whole nation turns. Did the national movement in Persia or Turkey extend beyond the educated classes and are those classes in those countries more numerous than in India? The real distinction, as we have pointed out, is that India is not a self-governing country, and cannot therefore claim a constitution like that of Persia or Turkey. It is not an awakening of the people alone but of monarchs also, whose eyes have been touched with the promise of the glory to come. The old order changeth yielding place to the new, and the evolution of Asia is advancing more rapidly than the human imagination could have conceived before the thunder of Japanese guns awoke the Russian sleepers and revellers at Port Arthur and a Japanese torpedo first laid a Russian battleship low."

Referring to the probable effect of the revolutionary movement in Turkey on India, the editor says :—

"To expect that the quickening life-pulse of nationalism in Asia should produce no effect on India is about as reasonable as to suppose that a bar of steel should be girt round by a powerful electric current without being converted into a magnet. Indeed, no one says so—from a distance. Retired Anglo-Indian officials and proconsuls, church dignitaries, parliamentarians and publicists all readily admit that a new life is coming to the birth in India. The commotion and the unrest are symptoms of natal travail. It is not a passing distemper or a false alarm, but a nation is being born and will shortly come to lusty life. The possibility that Professor Seeley foreshadowed is now in the happening. If it is recognized that there is a divine power guiding the destinies of nations then it is evident that no human power can stiffle or strangle a nation in the birth. What can be done is to prevent the extravagances and excesses. What shape the future of India will take is beyond human ken, but the current of change is running strong and swift and the familiar landmarks are rapidly passing out of sight."

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 8th August 1908.

British justice in India.

6. A correspondent who signs himself "THE DEVIL OF SHANTI BHAWAN", contributes the following notes to the Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 8th August, under the heading "Partly True and Partly False" :—

"The Government has founded courts of justice for the benefit of the people. If a man prevents people from entering these courts, he (is guilty of) trying to incite people against the Government and of bringing it into contempt. Such an act can be dealt with under section 124A., Indian Penal Code, i.e. the Law of Sedition.

The people of India are famine-stricken, and in their miserable state they are helped by the Government. If anyone, in time of poverty, advises them not to use Manchester cloth, which is comparatively cheap, then he incites them to act contrary to the wishes of the Government, and as opposition comes into existence only when the heart is [vitiated (?)], a man giving such advice, too, can be dealt with under the same section.

If a man is convicted, even unjustly, by a Judge; and people hold a meeting to express their sympathy with him, they, too, can be found guilty under section 124A., Indian Penal Code, as abettors.

Many people keep lathis and clubs in their houses. Why do they do so? The Government has appointed chaukidars to watch your houses, has established the police to protect your lives and property, and maintains an army of 75,000 strong to protect you from the encroachments of foreign powers. This clearly shows that you keep lathis in your house on account of your mischievousness, and so you can be dealt with under the Indian Penal Code.

Mr. Justice Davidson [Davar (?)] of Bombay has demonstrated a strange fact. According to him, there can be a headache without the existence of a head. While [accepting (?)] bail for Mr. Tilak, he remarked in his judgment that [there was no reason why he should do so but yet he did (?)]. Well!!!

At present there are two kinds of justice (lit. punishment) prevalent in the world. In one the accused is treated as guilty and convicted before his guilt is proved and in the other a man is deemed innocent as long as his guilt is not proved. What sort of punishment [system of justice (?)] is prevalent in India?

It needs no comments from us.

It is rumoured that Mr. B. G. Tilak will be sentenced to transportation for life on two scores, but the sentences will run concurrently. But Khudi Ram ought to be highly thankful that he will not have to suffer imprisonment during his next life."

The ideal of the British.

7. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 13th August, has the following :— ADVOCATE, 13th August 1908.

"The Indian Social Reformer, in the course of a very interesting article on the moral of Mr. Tilak, sorrowfully traces the descent of appeals of British rule to Indian loyalty to an increasingly lower plane. In the past, we know, British rule stood forward as the great emancipating power, emancipating the people from the petty tyranny of indigenous princelings, and from the thraldom of priest-craft and superstition. Gradually that aspect of it has disappeared. Indeed, Anglo-Indian officials may be found who regret that the princelings had not been allowed to go their own way, and who seem to be almost ashamed of the educational work of England in India. Though its rôle of emancipator was allowed to fall in abeyance, British rule still maintained its character as the protector of the poor against the rich, of the cultivator against the landlord, of the toiler against the exploiter. This is now giving place to a different and less inspiring ideal. The policy of British rule in India at present seems to be to 'strengthen' itself by means of alliances with the most timid of human interests, material interests. Its ambition is to shine as the friend of landlords and capitalists, to appeal to these classes on the ground of their self-interest. Thus is England wrapping herself in the robe of small causes and mean reasons—a policy suicidal to the promotion of enthusiastic devotion to Pax Britannica."

Legitimate grievances.

8. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 13th August, has the following :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 13th August 1908.

"The manner in which several provincial rulers have spoken out almost simultaneously and invited co-operation in maintaining order shows that the movement is not wholly spontaneous and perhaps a hint came from higher authority. However, that is a matter which is not of much public concern. The gravity of the situation is so far realized that the co-operation of law-abiding persons in the preservation of order is considered necessary. Coupled with this invitation and appeal is the menace that every resource of the law will be employed to suppress sedition and revolutionary tendencies. The combination of the two is unfortunate for no one ever thinks that the gentlest or the most sympathetic Governor would hesitate for a moment to prosecute a newspaper for sedition or arrest any one accused of anarchist tendencies. Sir George Clarke is an excellent example. He established direct relations with the press and cordially welcomed all public representatives, but when the need arose he put forth the long arm of the law without any hesitation. The most noteworthy feature of the public utterances of provincial rulers is their narrowness of vision. Not one of them, following the example of Lord Morley, admits that there is a living movement, or a new aspiration, or that behind the turmoil and unrest of the hour a new force is coming into existence. The only admission made is that the Government is prepared to redress legitimate grievances. Legitimate from whose point of view? Clearly that of the Government, for grievances that are considered legitimate from the people's point of view are not redressed. Will it be of any help if some grievances are enumerated? When there is a complaint of overtaxation is that a legitimate grievance? It is complained that there is one law for the Indian and another for the European. Is that a legitimate grievance? Is it right to consider the partition of Bengal a legitimate grievance? To decide what is legitimate one must put himself in the other man's place. Besides, there are other grievances which have no place in the official vocabulary. The fact that the people of India are not a nation is felt as a grievance, but it will not be recognized as one. Is not there sufficient statesmanship to recognize that the whole vantage ground must be shifted and a new era must begin in British Indian history? The redress of grievances can never be entirely satisfactory, but large civic and self-governing rights may be given to the people without the slightest danger to British supremacy. It is because the people have nothing to do beyond earning a living that there is such wide unrest. Give them plenty to do, put a large share of their affairs in their own hands and the discontent will subside. The rigour of the law alone will not bring peace to the country, because in the long run it will have to deal not with criminals but men prepared to suffer and sacrifice in the service of their people."

AL BASHIR, 11th August 1908.

The undoing of the partition of Bengal.

9. A correspondent of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 11th August, referring to the rumoured modifications in the partition of Bengal, remarks that the partition is not a blunder. He expresses his astonishment at the fact that Lords Morley and Curzon both disown the responsibility of the partition.

He notes with regret that if the partition is in any way amended or ended, it will put an end to all the aspirations and hopes which it has kindled in the hearts of the Muhammadans of East Bengal.

In conclusion he emphatically avows that the undoing of the partition will be a foolish and serious mistake.

AL BASHIR, 11th August 1908.

The partition of Bengal.

10. The editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 11th August, expresses his astonishment that Lord Morley and Lord Curzon are now throwing the responsibility of the partition of Bengal upon each other and remarks that such conduct on the part of such responsible and high authorities will simply fan the flame of unrest in India.

SAHIFA, 5th August 1908.

Muhammadans and the Government.

11. A Muhammadan correspondent of the Sahifa (Bijnor), in the issue of the 5th August, remarks that the Muhammadan community has always been and ever will be loyal and devoted to the British Government but that it does not meet with the full measure of patronage it deserves at the hands of its rulers.

He entirely disassociates his co-religionists from having any sympathy with the Congress and the present disloyal, insolent and lawless conduct of the Hindus, whom he holds, one and all, responsible for the existing unrest and chaotic state of affairs in the country.

He further remarks that Maulvi Liyaqat Husain, Saiyid Haidar Raza and such persons, are not the representatives of the Muhammadan community and consequently their imprudent conduct cannot be attributed to the entire Musalman community, which strongly condemns their actions and emphatically disowns them.

He points out that the conduct of the Hindus towards Muhammadans has invariably been very treacherous, and that accordingly it is impossible that the latter will ever have the least sympathy with their opponents.

In conclusion he eulogizes the late Sir Saiyid for his prudence in warning his co-religionists against associating themselves with the Congress from the very outset.

MUSAFIR, 8th August 1908.

Hindus and Musalmans.

12. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 8th August, contains an article entitled "The Lion and the She-goat on the Same Bank", of which the following is a literal translation :—

"The reason why the Hindus up to this time felt a pride in the British Government was because 'the lion and the she-goat used to drink water at the same bank,' and the weak as well as the strong were looked upon with the same eye, as far as justice was concerned. But since the day Sir B. Fuller gave the Muhammadans the title of being his 'favourite wife' the Hindus have become involved in difficulties (and) the 'favourite wife' has grown so impudent (lit. sits upon the head of the Government) that she will not miss even the slightest opportunity to ruin and to wound the feelings of the Hindus. The Hindus are in a sad plight, for neither does the Government protect them [against the Muhammadans (?)] nor does it suffer them to act in their own defence.

And the result of this (the neglect of the Hindus by the Government) is that now-a-days the Muhammadans seek to wound the feelings of the Hindus in every way.

It is worth while to consider that the bawdy comic paper, the Wahabi (Amritsar), in the issue of the 31st July, in a discussion on the Mirzayees, remarks : 'these people (the Mirzayees) are as ignorant of the Quran as a Brahman is of [the taste (?)] of beef.'

It must be remembered that had a Hindu newspaper given provocation in this manner, the editor would at once have been run in under section 153A., Indian Penal Code, but as it has been written by a Muhammadan journalist, nobody dares even so much as to stare him in the face (i.e. to call for an explanation from him).

Under these circumstances, we solemnly appeal, in the name of justice, to the British nation for God's sake to stick to their former policy in all such matters so that the Hindus may not lose all faith in them.

We do not mean that the foul-mouthed Wahabi should be punished for making this remark, but we wish to say that if such writing is permissible by law, Hindus should not be called upon to answer for their conduct when they return tit for tat so that the British rule in India may gain a still stronger footing in the country and be praised by all."

Sedition in pebbles.

13. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 9th August, has the following :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 9th August 1908.

"The Duke in the forest of Arden found tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, sermons in stones and good in everything. Life and time have changed very much since then, and persons in authority are now finding the very opposite of good in everything. Pebbles seem to be the latest craze, and the idea seems to be that bombs may be made of them or they may be used in their crude and nude state of nature as dangerous missiles for dashing out the brains of the inoffensive Feringhee. After the Kankinara outrage, a pandit of the old class was arrested at Bhatpara because some pebbles were found in his house. He had been spending a holiday at Monghyr, it was said, and he had picked them up there. Now, why should a student of Indian metaphysics go out of his way to pick up stones? Stones and metaphysics do not go well together, for it was by kicking at a stone that Doctor Samuel Johnson claimed to have demolished Berkeley's idealism. The police naturally saw an esoteric meaning in this collection of pebbles and challaned the expounder of Yog philosophy at Bhatpara. The police at Delhi and Agra were not slow to take up the trail. A teacher of mathematics of the modern school had been spending his holiday at Hardwar and his wife and children had collected some pebbles. The detectives took up the scent at once, and the student of calculus and quaternions was stopped at the Delhi railway station where his entire personal luggage was thoroughly ransacked. No seditious literature was forthcoming, no chemicals or récipes for the manufacture of explosives. But there were the pebbles. The police dared not touch them, so after a weary and vexatious detention for several hours he was let go. The secret however was too precious to be kept to themselves; so the police at Agra was informed of this remarkable discovery. And then the Commissioner of the Agra division, who apparently has time to spare, embarked upon an inquiry as to the connection between pebbles and mathematics and politics. We are not surprised to learn that with the sedition-hunters pebbles have proved hard nuts to crack. If English proverbs may be relied upon, one inference however seems permissible—those who are suspected of an intention to throw stones do not live in glass houses. Some of our readers will probably be able to recollect how Babu Surendra Nath Benerjea got into trouble over some sacred pebbles which Mr. Justice Norris of the Calcutta High Court wanted to view at close quarters. Some of these pebbles seem to exercise a strange fascination over the ordinary Hindu mind. There is a popular saying current in or near Jubbulpore that every pebble on the Narmada bank is Shiva Shanker. It is time that Hindus should be warned that Shiva Shanker is the god of destruction, and even in his pebbly form he should in future be left to repose at a respectful distance."

Suspects.

14. The following is an extract from an article in the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 9th August, entitled "Wanted: An Official List of Suspects" :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 9th August 1908.

"It seems desirable therefore for reassuring the public mind and putting an end to perplexing anxiety and uneasiness, that an official list of suspects should be openly notified. This will not be a novel procedure and without precedent. In Europe at one time black marks used to be put upon houses infected with plague. Public weal requires that the black dot marking a political criminal or even a political suspect in India should not be confined to confidential official registers. It is in the interests both of the governor and the governed that the disease should not spread. But how can the latter co-operate with the former in stamping out the curse of sedition unless and until they are placed in full possession of facts?"

ADVOCATE, 9th August 1908.

Sedition.

15. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 9th August, referring to the fact that there were no demonstrations in courts in favour of men charged with sedition in these provinces, remarks :—

"But what does the incident mentioned by the Sessions Judge of Aligarh and the fact that Shanti Narain during his trial at Allahabad had few sympathisers in the Court demonstrate ? They prove what no resolutions of public meetings and no speeches can prove, namely that there is no sedition in these provinces, that people have no sympathy with men who use violent language and that the sedition-monger cannot expect any support from the people. Under these circumstances their number can never be large and these men cannot cause any inconvenience to the administration."

Causes of unrest during the year 1907-8.

16. In continuation of his article entitled "The Causes of Unrest During the Year 1907-8" (vide paragraph 27, Selections No. 32, current), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 11th August, remarks that the chief cause that may be assigned to the outbreak of the Sepoy Mutiny of 1857, was the introduction of the greased cartridges which required to be bitten before they could be used.

He further remarks that the atrocious and outrageous conduct of the sepoys and their sudden rising to arms not only against the English but also against all the Christians in the country, was due to blind rashness and religious fanaticism.

In conclusion, he points out that all the rebels reached Dehli and hailed Bahadur Shah as their king, but he did not sympathise with the sepoys in their rebellion against the English.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 9th August 1908.

The Bengal appeal.

17. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 9th August, referring to the loyal manifesto recently issued by the Bengal leaders, remarks that it is a very different document from the trembling protestations of loyalty and denouncement of anarchism that have been lately thrust upon the Government and the people.

"In spirit, in language and in sentiment this appeal is wholly admirable and ought to produce an excellent effect. All sensible and self-respecting people throughout the country will desire to be associated with this appeal."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 13th August 1908.

Imperial Legislative Council.

18. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 13th August, while referring to the election of the Hon'ble the Raja of Mahmudabad as a member of the Imperial Legislative Council, remarks :—

"We are told he knows English and is thus to be preferred to another natural leader who might possibly have gone to the Supreme Council without the qualification. Well, people may derive some solace from it, but did not some of his immediate predecessors also know English ? This, however, is beside the mark in these days when ignorance is bliss and it is folly to be wise. What will the newly elected member do in the Council ? Nobody can foretell, and we are not prepared to judge him harshly in anticipation. In these days of experiments of all sorts, we should not feel impatient if one more experiment is to be tried. For one thing it ought to strike every one what a happy family our non-official members are. No envy, no jealousy, no rivalry, no emulation disturbs the even tenor of their course, and they distribute their favours evenly among themselves. True, there are some naughty fellows, too, among them, but they are not powerful and cannot assert themselves. And it is no concern of the outside public that those of its members who are popular favourites get less than they should get, and that others get more than their deserts. Well, that is a private matter and the sanctity of family life must ever be supreme. Another feature of this family which will strike some people is that differences of creed of individuals do not prevent them from working in harmony. Those of them that are Hindus vote for Muhammadans and those that are Muhammadans vote for Hindus. But this will not bring faith to the critics that sit at Aligarh or the sceptics up above at Simla. Merit or no merit each one must have a fair chance, and the less meritorious you are the more chances you have. That seems to be the motto written over the portals of this family."

19. The editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 11th August, expresses it as his opinion that the main cause of the fraças at the Surat Congress was this bomb conspiracy which has hitherto been a mystery and has baffled the attempts of many wise men who have tried to solve it. AL BASHIR, 11th August 1908.

Alleged cause for the quarrel in the Surat Congress.

He is of opinion that the quarrel arose as the Moderate and the Extremist parties could not amicably agree regarding bomb throwing.

In conclusion, he expresses his opinion that the Moderate leaders also had a knowledge of the existence of the conspiracy, but it appears to be very strange that they did not give the least information to the Government that there was such a conspiracy on foot.

20. The editor of the Riyáz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), in the issue of the 4th August, eulogizes Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk for his prudent policy in allowing the students of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College to discuss politics in the Union Club and to freely give expression to their opinions on the topics of the day. RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 4th August 1908.

Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College students and politics.

He remarks that it is useless to grapple with the feelings struggling in the minds of students. It is sufficient to allow them a free and unobstructed flow, taking at the same time due care to read them thoroughly and correct them, where necessary, so that young and inexperienced speakers may not be led away from the proper course by unhealthy enthusiasm which young men naturally possess in abundance.

The Nawab has hit upon the right course of action and his move is in the right direction.

21. A correspondent of the Sahifa (Bijnor), in the issue of the 5th August, writes that the partition of Bengal can in no way be regarded as the cause of the existing unrest in the country. The flame of disaffection was present in the country previous to the partition which has only fanned it into a blaze of alarming proportions. SAHIFA, 5th August 1908.

Sir B. Fuller's policy.

He approves of the prudent and well-thought-of policy of Sir B. Fuller, the late Lieutenant Governor of Eastern Bengal, and regrets his compulsory resignation.

In conclusion, he remarks that had the Government been a bit wiser and given due consideration to the policy of Sir B. Fuller, it would have easily avoided the necessity for adopting the present repressive measures which are the source of anxiety to itself and of trouble to the people.

22. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), writing in the issue of the 9th August, under the heading "Fuller the Foul-mouthed," remarks :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 9th August 1908.

Sir B. Fuller.

"If after having fallen foul of the Government he had abused the political leaders of India, the mischief would not have been great, for they, like the Government, are fair game. Indian students have been accused of very many things, but no one has yet dared to insinuate that as a class they are depraved and immoral, or that they lodge in prostitutes' houses. We shudder to think the use that will be made of these maliciously false words to inflame the minds of students all over the country and incite them against the Government and Europeans. We can distinguish between a calumniator and a critic; we know that Sir Bampfylde Fuller's view is not shared by other officials or ex-officials, that he is hardly responsible for what he writes, so bitter is the grievance that he nourishes against the Government and the people of this country; but students will not make that distinction and will be encouraged not to make any distinction. The law is powerless to touch him but if any man can be held guilty of a direct incentive to violence, it is the first Lieutenant Governor of Eastern Bengal who has so outrageously libelled the students of India."

23. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 13th August, referring to the insinuations made against Indian students by Sir B. Fuller, remarks :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 13th August 1908.

Indian students and Sir B. Fuller.

"Without disputing the charges brought against Indian students of to-day, that they meddle with politics and are not respectful to authority, it would be wrong to deny that they have displayed remarkable powers of organization, sacrifice and willing service without hope or desire of reward. The much maligned National Volunteers did such excellent work on the occasion of the Ardhoday yog and other religious fairs that even the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal cheerfully admitted it. They worked and slaved for days together, rescuing women and children, finding lost parties, ministering to them in illness and looking to their comforts. Was there a single complaint that any of these young men had forgotten himself, or had been rude to any woman? Their physical training is such that they can endure a great deal of fatigue. Morally and physically the Indian student of to-day is superior to the student of ten years ago. And intellectually there has been no decline. The only thing is that in physical culture, the growth of organization, and the development of a national institution the authorities apprehend a danger to the present rule, or, in plain words, all these young men will become revolutionists. Had there been no question of a foreign Government these young men would have been heartily admired. There was a time when educated men all over the country wanted to be enrolled as volunteers. If the offer had been accepted and the Government had proceeded in the spirit of confidence that such a step implied, the rulers and the ruled would not have drifted as far apart as they have done. But it was declined and the policy of suspicion became confirmed."

MUSAFIR, 8th August 1908.

The Arya Samaj and politics.

24. The editor of the Musáfir (Agra), in the issue of the 8th August, writes that the avowed mission of the Arya Samaj is to spread the teachings of the Vedas throughout the four corners of the world and that it has nothing to do with politics. But the Muhammadan factor in the police, in order to feed its religious grudge, spares no pains to accuse the Árya Samaj as an organized political body.

He advises the Árya Samajists never to lose heart or be confused but to keep up a brave heart and to manfully face the tide of opposition to their noble mission until it ebbs and there remains nothing to oppose them.

In conclusion, he prays the Government not to be misled by the false rumours so ruthlessly levelled against the Árya Samaj by its opponents.

JEDD-O-JEHAD, 3rd and 10th August 1908.

Conviction of Mr. Tilak.

25. Referring to the conviction of Mr. Tilak and the riots that took place subsequently, the editor of the Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad, Hardoi), in the combined issue of the 3rd and 10th August, remarks that all these riots would have easily been avoided if, instead of convicting Mr. Tilak, Government had got rid of him from India by appointing him a member of the India Council.

CITIZEN, 13th August 1908.

Boycott.

26. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 13th August, has the following remarks on boycott in an article entitled "Anniversary of the Swadeshi Movement":—

"We strongly urge, therefore, the repudiation not only of the name boycott but of the policy for which it really stands; and we repeat that, if advantage is taken of this anniversary, to impress upon all concerned that all forms of coercion must cease, the cause of Swadeshi will derive incalculable benefit, for it will part company with a disreputable associate which has brought disgrace upon an essentially good and patriotic movement. We may then hope to obtain a hearing for the sound economic doctrine that the best method of building up manufactures is not to create an artificial demand but to produce cheaper and better goods than those already offering. The Indian Mirror puts the case admirably. 'If we want to drive Bideshi goods from the Indian market,' it writes, 'we must have Swadeshi in their place. Mere exclusion of Bideshi goods does not help in the building of a Swadeshi market. None but a lunatic can imagine that he is going to foster indigenous industries by merely inveighing against foreign industries or destroying foreign articles to the accompaniment of national songs. True Swadeshism is, in short, noiseless and non-aggressive.' This view of Swadeshi, which we hold to be the only practicable conception, points to the conclusion that the great enterprise of restoring and extending an industrial India can only be carried out by the co-operation of the Government, the Anglo-Indian community and the people of the country. In this way alone can the necessary technical training, business experience and capital be obtained. That the Government are willing and anxious to help needs no demonstration. The vigorous action of Sir John Hewett, the sympathetic speeches of the Lieutenant Governor of Burma, and of the Lieutenant Governor of Eastern Bengal, and the measures which Sir Andrew Fraser is adopting to establish a practical system of technical education all show that the authorities are prepared to meet Swadeshi half way. And when trained captains of industry are ready the capital which they will require will not long be lacking if the country is at peace and the good relations of all sections of the community promise that security which is necessary to financial confidence."

II.—Afghanistan and Trans-Frontier.

The frontier.

27. The Sipáhi (Cawnpore), for July, referring to the gun-running in the Persian Gulf, the participation of some Afghan soldiers in the Mohmand rising and the anti-British influence of Sirdar Nasrullah Khan at Kabul, remarks that perhaps in the near future the British Government will become implicated in a war with Afghanistan. The editor, however, is of opinion that as the Amir is a sensible man he will continue his policy of friendship towards England.

SIPAHI, July 1908.

III.—Native States.

The Mysore Press Law.

28. The following is an extract from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 13th August :—

ADVOCATE, 13th August 1908.

"We have read with alarm the proceedings of the Mysore Legislative Council which has in one sitting introduced, considered and passed the Bill for the regulation of newspapers in that State. One wonders that not one non-official member raised a solitary voice of protest against the procedure, much less against the drastic provisions themselves. The Hon'ble Mr. Madhava Rao became the Draco of Mysore and passed, one should say, the most obnoxious measure at one sitting. The enactment is awfully comprehensive and simply outrageous in its provisions."

In a subsequent note the editor remarks that this repressive measure will give a free hand to European exploiters and there will be no one to oppose their doings, as the Maharaja is too weak to do so. He says that by this measure Mysore has furnished a model for further fettering the press in India.

IV.—Administration.

(a)—Judicial and Revenue.

Mr. Tilak's conviction.

29. The editor of the Riyáz-ul-Akhbar (Lucknow), in the issue of the 4th August, defends Mr. Tilak against the attacks made on him for not keeping his promise not to write seditious articles which he made to the Government when he was previously convicted of a similar offence, and remarks that the composition of the jury was such that the judgment in the case cannot in all fairness be regarded as impartial.

The editor expresses his regret at the disturbances and riots that took place in Bombay subsequent to the conviction of Mr. Tilak as they are calculated to make an unfavourable impression upon the Government.

He also regrets to note that the tone of some speakers at the meetings held to express sympathy with Mr. Tilak in his troubles was not very commendable, and remarks that the best and the most praiseworthy expression of sympathy was that given by Sufi Amba Parshad, Sardar Ajit Singh, Munshi Tulsi Ram Sewak, Mr. Amar Nath and Kedar Nath Sehgal, who renounced the world and devoted themselves to a life of rigorous asceticism.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 4th August 1908.

Conviction of Mr. Tilak.

30. Referring to the conviction of Mr. Tilak and to the riots in Bombay subsequent to his conviction, the editor of the Musáfir (Agra), in the issue of the 8th August, remarks that the answer to the question whether the policy of the Government in sending Mr. Tilak to jail has restored peace and order in the country or has it made the gulf still wider between the rulers and the ruled, is self-evident, as the events that followed Mr. Tilak's conviction speak for themselves and need no comment.

MUSAFIR, 8th August 1908.

ADVOCATE, 9th August 1908.

The Urdu-i-Mualla case.

31. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 9th August, referring to the conviction of Fazl-ul-Hassan, editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla, remarks that although the article in question was objectionable, it was not stronger than many articles of the same nature published in the Urdu press. Besides he had not received the customary warning on the occasion of his first transgression. The writer of the article was very leniently punished, and so Fazl-ul-Hassan, who simply published it in his magazine, ought to have been treated still more leniently.

HINDUSTANI, 12th August 1908.

The Urdu-i-Mualla case.

32. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 12th August, reproduces the comments of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 9th August, on the Urdu-i-Mualla case.

ABHYUDAYA, 7th August 1908.

Sentences in sedition cases.

33. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 7th August, considers unduly heavy sentences such as those passed on Mr. Tilak and others in recent sedition cases to be very inadvisable, inasmuch as such severity embitters the feelings of the people against the Government and wins their sympathy for the accused, which is quite the reverse of the object of the Government in sanctioning prosecutions under sedition sections.

The editor expresses the opinion that Government suffers more by the infliction of such heavy sentences than those who are actually punished for writing the seditious articles that are made the basis of a prosecution. He does not mean that political offenders should not be punished at all but that they should be punished in proportion to their offences. In conclusion he says that appeals to High Courts in these cases will not result in the sentences being reduced very substantially unless the Government changes its present attitude in sedition cases in consideration of popular feeling.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 9th August 1908.

Abuse from the bench.

34. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 9th August, has the following :—

"Only the other day, we are informed, a joint magistrate, of about five years' standing, referring to a (civilian) judge of about 15 years' standing, at Bareilly, said in open court to certain barristers and vakils who were engaged in arguing a case before him : 'yeh judgi nahin hai ki tum mari machli pathar par ghiste ho.' We shall not presume to explain what this choice expression means, but surely a judicial officer ought to be able to control his tongue and his temper, and play the gentleman if he is not one."

ADVOCATE, 9th August 1908.

Crown prosecutors.

35. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 9th August, referring to the large sums of money spent on Crown prosecutors, remarks :—

"To engage Counsel on Rs. 1,000 and Rs. 1,500 per diem to conduct these simple cases does not point to wisdom, and in one case at all events a new trial has been ordered by the High Court. One may be anxious to know how much money has thus been spent throughout India on such cases. The practice, untenable as it is on economic grounds, has to be condemned on other grounds as well. If Government Pleaders in even big towns are not entrusted with State cases of sufficient public importance, it means a slur on their ability and waste of public money on undeserved persons. In big towns at least Crown prosecutors should be competent enough to take charge of all cases, so that more Counsel may not be employed. When any case of such serious importance crops up in other towns one of these may easily be induced to go on extra payment which will surely be much less than what would be charged by an independent lawyer practicing in any High Court. To have a standing Counsel but not to put him in charge of any such important case shows want of confidence in his loyalty as well as his ability. It is an implied reflection which Government Pleaders have every right to resent."

MASHRIQ, 11th August 1908.

Political offenders.

36. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 11th August, referring to the refusal of bail to political offenders, remarks that in such cases Judges should be guided only by law and the principles of justice, and their judgments should be totally unbiassed.

ZUL QARNAIN, 7th August 1908.

Murder of a coolie at Delhi.

37. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 7th August, referring to the murder of a coolie by one Davis, a Eurasian, remarks that at this juncture, when the feelings between Europeans and Indians are highly strained, the Government should move very cautiously and decide the case after mature deliberation.

38. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 10th August, referring to the misunderstanding produced in India by the decision of cases by European Judges, in which one of the parties is an Indian and the other a European, remarks that it would be better if such cases were tried by a bench of judges consisting both of Europeans and Indians. OUDH AKHBAR, 10th August 1908.

Europeans and Indians.

39. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 13th August, has the following comments on the introduction of the panchayat system in Patiala :— ADVOCATE, 13th August 1908.

Panchayats.

"The moral and material benefits that accrue from the system are enough to emphasise the need of immediate return to the old and ancient system that made every village a self-contained unit and rendered the administration of its public affairs smooth, inasmuch as it was independent of outside interference, though under the reasonable control of higher authorities. It really marks a lamentable want of statesmanship in the rulers in British India that Native States should set examples as to how to improve the administration so as to broadbase it on the willing allegiance and hearty support of the people."

40. The Agra Akhbár, of the 7th August, complains that the sanitary condition of Nai Basti, Agra, is quite deplorable and that people find it very difficult to walk through the streets in that quarter at night. The municipality, on being appealed to, replied that the streets would be metalled at an early date, but nothing has yet been done. AGRA AKHBAR, 7th August 1908.

The editor complains that Mr. Rogers, the Secretary, seldom leaves the Club premises, and that his substitute, Mr. Mellis, is too busy to inspect the dirty lanes of the city.

41. Referring to the inconvenience caused to women in Agra in taking water from the same stand-posts as the men, the Nasim-i-Agra, of the 7th August, remarks that it is entirely repugnant to the moral sense of Indians and against their customs to allow their women to mix freely with other men, and suggests the desirability of allotting separate stand-posts exclusively for women. NASIM-I-AGRA, 7th August 1908.

Agra water-posts.

42. A correspondent in the Cawnpore Gazette, of the 8th August, complains of the unsanitary and dirty condition of the lanes and streets, as well as of some of the roads in Cawnpore city, and points out the desirability of metalling all kachcha lanes and streets and of providing them with proper drains. He also complains that dirt and nightsoil from the railway station are thrown into the canal which should be stopped at once in the interest of public health. CAWNPORE GAZETTE, 8th August 1908.

43. While complaining that most of the roads and thoroughfares in Shahabad become quite impassable in the rainy season, the editor of the Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad, Hardoi), in the combined issue of the 3rd and 10th August, asks the Shahabad Municipal Board to consider what an inconvenience this is to the public and to make arrangements for the drainage of all roads within municipal limits. JEDD-O-JEHAD, 3rd and 10th August 1908.

45. A correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 12th August, complains that the Lucknow Municipality is going to impose a duty on country-made sugar, and says that sugar is not an article of luxury, but is one of the necessities of life, and besides a duty imposed on country-made sugar would give an impetus to German bounty-fed sugar. HINDUSTANI, 12th August 1908.

EDUCATIONAL MAGAZINE, July 1908.

The Raja of Bhinga.

46. The Educational Magazine (Ghazipur), for July, referring to the Raja of Bhinga's munificent gift of ten lakhs of rupees for a Rajput school, remarks that it would have been well if the Raja had devoted this sum to the raising of the Kshattriya school at Agra to the status of a college. The editor condemns the exclusive policy of the Raja in excluding Kayasthas, Jats, &c., from the benefits of his gift and thinks that the vow of loyalty which the Raja has made binding on all students of his school will not be understood by little boys.

EDUCATIONAL MAGAZINE, July 1908.

Female education.

47. A correspondent of the Educational Magazine (Ghazipur), for July, notes with satisfaction the appointment of paid governnesses to visit zenanas and teach grown-up women and girls.

In a subsequent note he advises the Government to instruct its inspecting officers and members of the District Board, who visit girls' schools, to distribute sweetmeats and other prizes among the scholars.

ZUL QARNAIN, 7th August 1908.

High education.

48. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 7th August, referring to the complaints that many colleges are refusing to admit students on the plea of the want of room in boarding-houses and the inability of a single professor to give attention to each individual in an inordinately large class of students, advises the Government to increase the staffs of its colleges, as the public of these provinces are not prepared to supplement the efforts of the Government. The editor takes the leaders of the day to task for always crying "politics" and remaining indifferent to educational problems.

RAHBAR, 7th August 1908.

Defects in the present system of education.

49. A correspondent of the Rahbar (Moradabad), in the issue of the 7th August, declares that the main source of the existing troubles and unrest in India is the defective system of education in vogue in the country, which is void of all religious teaching.

He urges the necessity of religious education in India and recommends the education of Indians on the lines of the Kangri Gurukul.

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 8th August 1908.

Decay of Hinduism and Hindu literature.

50. Reproducing the full text of an article in the Panjabee (Lahore), entitled "The Influence of English Education on the Hindu Religion and Hindu Literature", the editor of the Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), in the issue of the 8th August, emphatically refutes the arguments advanced by the Panjabee and remarks that English education has in no way been the cause of the decay of Hindu literature. It is the Hindus' own fault, as Government has in no way obstructed the course of Hindu literature but has, on the other hand, encouraged it by opening oriental institutions and the Hindus are quite at liberty to encourage the growth and development of their own literature.

MASHRIQ, 11th August 1908.

Schools.

51. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 11th August, draws the attention of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor to the recent circular of the Educational department restricting the number of students in schools, and remarks that the circular will have a very disastrous effect on educational progress in these provinces. The editor urges those who are philanthropic to open private schools in all important towns.

HINDUSTANI, 12th August 1908.

Jubilee High School, Gorakhpur.

52. A Gorakhpur correspondent of the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 12th August, complains that the Director of Public Instruction has ordered that the names of a large number of students be struck off from the rolls of the Jubilee High School, Gorakhpur, on the plea of want of room and the weakness of the staff. He thinks that instead of doing this it would be more advisable to strengthen the staff and to extend the class rooms.

ADVOCATE, 13th August 1908.

The School-Leaving Certificate Examination.

53. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 13th August, while referring to the abolition of Matriculation classes in several schools, especially the Jubilee High School, Lucknow, and to students being compelled to take up the School-Leaving Certificate Examination courses, remarks :—

"These high-handed proceedings on the part of the department have caused a deal of dissatisfaction and we think the Director should take early steps to remove it. We do not wish to say a word against the School-Leaving Certificate Course itself. Personally we are not enamoured of it. There are parents who for good reasons do not wish that their boys should give it preference to the Matriculation Course. Why should they be forced to make changes in the education of their boys against their will? Such compulsion, we must say, leads people to talk unsavoury things about the intentions of the Government. The air is thick with all sorts of suspicious rumours. Nobody can accuse Sir John Hewett's Government of being inimical to the spread of higher education. Then, why should the Education department act in a manner as to give a handle to dissatisfied people to attribute motives to the Government, which we know have no foundation, but which are readily believed in owing to unreasonable actions on the part of subordinates?

It is not yet too late to remove this unnecessary excitement which has been created in the minds of students and their guardians. Wherever arrangements for teaching the School-Leaving Certificate Course have been made, arrangements for teaching the Matriculation Course should continue and the students should be left free to choose the course which they or their guardians approve of."

The School-Leaving Certificate Examination.

54. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 12th August, complains that in some schools, especially the Jubilee High School, Lucknow, students are being compelled to take up the School-Leaving Certificate Examination courses, although many of them would like to go up for the Entrance Examination. The editor says that he is informed that this is done by the order of the higher authorities.

Indian poverty.

56. The Educational Magazine (Ghazipur), for July, notes with regret that much of the wealth of this country is either sunk in jewellery or is being hoarded up. The writer advises the people to invest their money in recuperative industrial works and thus enrich their country.

EDUCATIONAL MAGAZINE, July 1908.

Rumoured prosecution of some newspapers in the Punjab.

57. Referring to the rumour that the Punjab Government is shortly going to prosecute the editors of the Jhang Sial (Jhang), the Aftáb (Delhi), the Hitkári and the Hindustán (Lahore), for publishing seditious articles, the Riyáz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 4th August, advises the Government to warn them for the present and to prosecute them if this warning fails to have any effect.

Public service.

58. In a leading article, the editor of the Nasir-ul-Akhbár (Meerut), in the issue of the 5th August, makes the following complaints:—

NASIR-UL-AKHBAR, 5th August 1908.

"(1) That litigation in all courts has now become so very expensive that poor men dare not pray for justice while the rich crush them with impunity.

(2) That some officers frequently transfer low-paid office hands to distant places and replace them by their own protegés to the great inconvenience of the former.

(3) That in some offices men of the same caste preponderate and form a clique and do what they like without the least fear.

(4) That sometimes the responsible offices of tahsildar or naib tahsildar are given to vain, inexperienced and arrogant young men who unscrupulously terrorize over their subordinates.

(5) That the salary of naib tahsildars is not sufficient for them to live decently and keep up their position as officers."

ABHYUDAYA, 7th August 1908.

59. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 7th August, says that the Swadeshi movement is concerned more with religion than with politics, inasmuch as Indians who follow the Swadeshi cult save their poorer brethren from starvation by providing them with a means of subsistence. The editor urges the public not to be afraid of Government in using Swadeshi goods, as it is in no way opposed to their doing so. He thinks that they should bring it to the notice of Government if any ill-informed officials interfere with their actions in the promotion of this movement.

60. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 7th August, referring to the murderous assault at Pandharpur on Miss Steele, a Lady Missionary, remarks that her assailants should be severely dealt with, and the Government should, in the interests of law and order, show them no mercy.

It very often happened that they were dragged down from carriages by force by railway employés and thereby got hurt.

(a)—Foreign.

1. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 17th August, says that the political future of Persia is still shrouded in mystery. The internal affairs are to-day as unsatisfactory as they ever were before. The Shah, the ministers and the parliament are still at variance. To add to the complexity of the situation the Anglo-Russian Convention is still there with all its possibilities of commercial and political dangers to Persia. Let us see, says the editor, how it all ends.

OUDH AKHBAR, 17th August 1908.

The Persian crisis.

2. Referring to the grant of a constitution to Turkey, the Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 18th August, remarks that this is due to the Sultan's recognition of the spirit of the age. But the cause for anxiety lies in the fact that it is very possible that his successor, like the successor of the Shah, may set his face against the constitution, and then the terrible scenes of Persia will be repeated in Turkey once again. This, says the editor, is quite possible, for he believes that nationalism and patriotism have not inspired the Muhammadans to the extent that they ought to have done.

OUDH AKHBAR, 18th August 1908.

The Persian and the Turkish constitution.

3. Referring to the affairs of Turkey, the Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 18th August, remarks that if Sir Edward Grey's policy is allowed to continue unhampered by the machinations of mischievous persons, the relations between Turkey and England will become much more friendly. But England should try to help the Sultan in suppressing the mischievous elements in the same way as she compelled him to grant reforms.

(b)—Home.

4. Referring to the visit of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor to Agra and to the speech he delivered on that occasion, the Mufid-i-Ám (Agra), of the 10th August, makes the following comments :—

MUFID-I-AM, 10th August 1908.

His Honour the Lieutenant Governor's visit to Agra.

"The speech had a highly palliative effect on the mind of the public and it is to be hoped that every one will now come to think that the punishment meted out to the sedition-mongers was just the thing required."

The editor agrees with His Honour in holding it a mistake on the part of the citizens that they failed to report the movements of Hoti Lal to the authorities. He however hopes that such mistakes will not be repeated in future.

5. Referring to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor's speech at Allahabad, the Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 14th August, says that the anarchist movement and seditious propaganda should be thoroughly discouraged as they bring calamity in their train. Every good citizen should help the Government in eradicating the seed of sedition and anarchism from these provinces even though to do so may be irksome and dangerous at times.

ZUL QARNAIN, 14th August 1908.

His Honour's Allahabad speech.

6. The Árya Mitra (Agra), of the 16th August, reproduces His Honour's speech at Agra and remarks that his sentiments are very high and noble and that every Indian should feel it to be his primary duty to co-operate with the Government in banishing sedition and anarchy from the country.

ARYA MITRA, 16th August 1908.

His Honour at Agra.

7. Referring to the proposal made in Madras to hold annual dinners for the promotion of ideas of loyalty to the Crown, the Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 14th August, remarks that this is a move in the right direction and that the proposal should be taken up by the other provinces of India also.

ZUL QARNAIN, 14th August 1908.

Loyal dinners.

8. Referring to the letter regarding the loyalty of the Bengalis of the United Provinces sent by Babu Beni Madhava Ghosh, Vakil of the Allahabad High Court, to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor, the Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 14th August, doubts if the sentiments expressed in the letter are genuine. They may be the real feelings of Babu Beni Madhava Ghosh, but surely he cannot be responsible for his fellow countrymen whose relations with Bengal do not preclude the possibility of their coming into touch with undesirable politics of the Bengali type.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 16th August 1908.

Professions of loyalty.

9. Under the heading "The Cauldron of Loyalty", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 16th August, referring to the emanations of loyalty from unexpected quarters that are being treated with all seriousness, remarks that the country is either loyal or it is not. If it is loyal, testimonials and professions of loyalty are superfluous; if it is not, mere professions of loyalty are useless. He says 'people who have been accustomed to a certain way of thinking are likely to adhere to it. The majority of thinking people have no notion whatever of undermining British rule. Attribute it to selfishness if you like and not to loyalty. Selfishness has a stronger hold on men than a mere sentiment of loyalty. What does a revolution in India mean? The overthrow of British rule, and after that—the deluge. For out of that chaos no cosmos can be evolved as all the constructive elements are absent. Every link in the chain of the Government is interlinked with the people, and cannot be snapped without first withdrawing the popular element. Look at the state of things squarely: on one side there is almost universal suspicion, on the other there is not the faintest intention of unsettling a settled order. Anarchism and revolutionary ideas stand apart. They have the fierceness of madness, and they can never be won over or conciliated. On one side is the immense majority of the population, high and low, on the other side is this newly hatched scheme of subversion and destruction. Whether this new party will grow, or whether it will die, does not depend on those who are on the side of law and order, but on the manner in which the administration of the country is conducted. This is fully recognized by English statesmen themselves and it is for them to settle the problem that faces them.'

He further adds 'the signs are not at all reassuring and there is reason to apprehend that the dissatisfaction among a section of the population is growing in intensity, though no open symptoms are visible. The real Moderates are anxiously waiting for a change in the course of affairs, and the introduction of measures which will turn the attention of people to active improvements and works of reform. The times are sadly out of joint and the future is full of perplexity, but there is very little hope that quieter times are coming, or that the unrest will be soon over.'

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 12th August 1908.

The voice from Aligarh.

10. Under the marginally noted heading the Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 12th August, has the following:—

"The voice—the mighty voice—which Sir Saiyid Ahmad raised against the Indian National Congress alienated the Muhammadan community from the political propaganda of that body. But the voice, whose echoe has continued up to this time, seems as if it is dying away now. We therefore take this opportunity to proclaim through our columns his message to his co-religionists once again:—

Sir Saiyid advised the Musalmans to remain loyal to the British Government to the last—for it was by so doing alone that their interests could be safeguarded. Do not listen, he said, to those who call you flatterers and hangers-on for you are none such: the British Government is necessary for the permanence of your national existence—and this alone ought to be your justification. Let others defame you if they like, but you should go on pursuing your own path heedless of what they may say or think of you. You should oppose any effort made to subvert the British Government for that effort really means your own annihilation. It is essential for you to be alive to your duty at this critical juncture when the waves of the anti-British agitatiom have at last begun to strike against the unimpressionable walls of Aligarh also.

The Muhammadans should be up now and helping the Government in every possible way. Their loyalty should not exist in theory alone but in practice also. Associations should now be formed to stop this anti-British agitation, and before any Musalman demands his right, he should see that the position of British Government is safe.

This is that voice from Aligarh which ought to revive the consciousness of duty in the minds of the Musalmans of India to-day."

The repressive measures.

11. While approving of the policy of Anglo-Indian officials in awarding long terms of imprisonment to political offenders, the editor of the Riyáz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), in the issue of the 12th August, advises the Government to refrain from taking repressive measures for sometime longer and see if the concessions that are shortly to be made to Indians by the Home Government improve the situation in India.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 12th August 1908.

Musalmans and politics.

12. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 15th August, in reviewing an article in the Aligarh Institute Gazette by Nawab Mushtaq Husain headed "Students of the Aligarh College and Politics," remarks that the maintenance of British rule in India is the policy not only of the Musalmans but also of all sensible leaders of public opinion.

OUDH AKHBAR, 15th August 1908.

After quoting that portion of the article in which the Nawab Sahib does not see his way to agree with the demand of the Congress for the reduction of British troops and for the granting of representative government to Indians, the editor remarks that his argument cannot appeal to those who have closely followed the questions raised in the councils and the unsatisfactory answers given to them. At one time it is the fear of a Russian invasion which justifies the maintenance of a large number of troops in India, at another the danger is said to lie within the bounds of India herself.

As regards representative government, it seems that the Nawab Sahib is quite agreeable to it only if equal rights of representation are secured to the Muhammadan community.

However, says the editor, we welcome this new change and wait to see the result of the struggle for political rights.

Political agitation.

13. A correspondent writing to the Agra Akhbár, of the 14th August, remarks :—

AGRA AKHBAR, 14th August 1908.

"It is idle and mischievous to preach the doctrine of Swaraj in a country which can be most properly called the land of religious strifes and discords. If you want to further your political ends, you should, as a preliminary measure, send out your religious leaders to counteract the baneful effects of the preachings of your so-called 'leaders of public opinion' and to implant the following ideas into the minds of the public :—

(1) That the British Government is the most benevolent, the most righteous and the most just of all the Governments.
(2) That the drain due to commerce is natural if you hold the principle of free trade to be just.
(3) That a country and its wealth are the properties of Almighty God who confers them on whomsoever He likes.
(4) That India has been always ruled by foreigners and that therefore there should be no bitterness at its being now ruled by England.
(5) That Indians are not 'men of the sword', and never been so.
(6) That if India supplies food to the natives of other countries, it is simply doing the right thing; for to help its brethren and to relieve their sufferings is the duty of mankind.

If these ideas get hold of the mind of the public first, and if political rights are sought in the spirit of respectful submission afterwards, our objects can most easily be achieved."

Politics and the Indian population.

14. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 14th August, quotes the following from the Madras Mail :—

RAHBAR, 14th August 1908.

"The population of India may be divided into the five following heads :—

(1) Those that do not care for anything which does not directly concern them. Their number is 25 per cent.
(2) Fatalists who refer everything to the will of Providence. Their number is 50 per cent.
(3) Those that want to better their lot by the constitutional methods of petitioning and memorializing. These number 20 per cent.
(4) Those that do not see any utility in the policy of mere begging but adopt other unobjectionable methods of political regeneration. These number 4 per cent.
(5) Those whose policy is 'no mischief no gain.' These number 1 per cent.

The last mentioned class should be deported out of the country. The members of the fourth class should be given a chance to reform and to merge themselves with the third. Those of the first and second classes should be given education and thus raised to the level of the third."

The Rahbar recommends this proposal, which emanates from one of their own countrymen, to the consideration of the rulers of India.

ADVOCATE, 16th August 1908.

"Politics for Students."

15. Reviewing Mr. George S. Aurandale's article on "Indian Students and Politics" (vide paragraph 3, Selections No. 32), the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 16th August, says that "the question of the day, as far as the large body of students are concerned, is whether they should participate in any form of political agitation. On the face it will be conceded on all hands that revolutionary methods which of course appeal strongly to the young and untrained enthusiasm of students are best suited to bring ruin to themselves, their families and their country. As to agitation on constitutional lines, too, there are no two opinions about the rule that students are not to take any part except in attending public meetings held to discuss laws in force or bills about to be passed or measures needed for the public weal but yet neither on the Statute Book nor in contemplation. But all students have not the knowledge, much less the training, to understand anything about politics, and such of them should have absolutely nothing to do with political meetings or measures. But college students who have got some ideas about the system of administration in vogue, its machinery and its resources as well as difficulties have, on the other hand, every right to hear lectures in public and discuss politics in their debating clubs, more or less academically. This is because it goes without saying that agitation presupposes education, education as to the science and art of government, the condition and requirements of the people and the best way to secure their welfare through the Government in the country. Students in general, much less those in schools owing to their age and the development possible in that age, cannot be expected to have reached the stage when they are competent to form an independent judgment of their own on any problem of the day, much less therefore to criticise those of others."

He says that Mr. Aurandale's treatment of the relations between Indian students and politics differs from that of others who are as anxious as is our friend that students should not play with fire.

How to best prepare the coming generation to take an intelligent part in the work of their country's regeneration, the editor says, is the problem before the parents and guardians at home, and teachers and professors in schools and colleges. This means a deal of education, very necessary education, in political science, though not active participation in political agitation.

Referring to the course of study and training set forth by Mr. Aurandale, he says "here is a scheme that does not aim at the manufacture of loyalty by persistently harping on the benefits of British rule in season and out of season, but impresses on the student of politics the seriousness of the subject and gives him an idea as to what is meant by the service of the motherland in the political field."

ADVOCATE, 16th August 1908.

Indian youths.

16. Reviewing Sir B. Fuller's article entitled the "'Vision Splendid' of Indian Youth", published in the July number of the Nineteenth Century and After, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 16th August, makes the following observations :—

"Every well-wisher of India and of the British Empire is at the present moment racking his brain to discover the causes of the present unrest in India and to suggest remedies for its removal. There are many causes which have conspired together to bring about the present unhappy state of affairs and the most potent of them is the vilification of our people—old as well as young—by men of the type of Sir Bampfylde Fuller. At a time when every right-thinking person is striving all his might and main to improve the relations between the Indians and the Europeans in this country by pouring oil over troubled waters, it is amazing to find a man who only the other day occupied the high position of a Lieutenant Governor of a province coming forward to malign and vilify youths with an utter disregard of truth and accuracy.

At a time when the Government of India is face to face with a crisis in this country, one of its former servants who even to-day is living comfortably on its pension in England has rendered a signal disservice to it by sorely irritating the people of India."

He says that the article has been read in this country with feelings of rage and indignation and its effects, he is sorry to observe, will not soon pass off. The statements made by Sir B. Fuller are as audacious as they are untrue, and he gives a direct lie to them. This article, the editor says, will work an incalculable amount of mischief outside India, especially at the present moment when it is said Lord Morley is devising ways and means of bringing Indian students under greater control. He respectfully warns His Lordship against the venomous attacks that this disappointed Lieutenant Governor has levelled at the Indian students. He concludes his observations with the following remarks :—

"We admit some students of late have developed a tendency of insubordination. We deplore it as does every well-wisher of the students themselves. But let it be remembered that the vast majority of them are perfectly free from this contagion. They are not to be supposed to be rowdies in disguise. It will be an unwise policy to make the whole class suffer for the indiscretion or stupidity of some. It is by sympathy alone that you can reform an erring youngster. In matters of discipline the gentle means of persuasion is more effective than that of repression. We are afraid, in certain quarters the belief is entertained that restriction of their liberty of speech and action will turn them aside from the dangerous path which some of them are treading. We seriously question the wisdom and forethought of this policy. Such treatment may make them hypocrites but never good citizens. To fill their minds with bitterness at the most impressionable period of their lives will, in the long run, be productive of the greatest mischief to the Government as well as to the country itself. Discipline should be maintained, but they should be allowed to have legitimate freedom of speech and action. The moulding of the character of the youths of a country is a task of paramount importance and those responsible for it should proceed with care and caution."

"Politics for Students."

17. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 19th August, reproduces the remarks of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 16th August, on "Politics for Students."

HINDUSTANI, 19th August 1908.

The Aligarh College and political education.

18. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 20th August, has the following :—

ADVOCATE, 20th August 1908.

"SIR,—I support every word of the article published in the Advocate of the 6th instant under the marginally noted heading. Anti-Congress and anti-Hindu sermons, under the guise of political admonitions, given to the youths of the College and published in newspapers can have no other effect but that of spreading more ill-will between the two peoples of India who in my humble opinion can fraternize and ought to be made to fraternize by the pressure of their leaders on both people. I am also of the opinion that it shall prove fatal to the interest of the Aligarh College and very injurious to the interest of the Moslem community at large if the Aligarh party, on selfish motives, persists in keeping Aligarh the centre of political propaganda. The habitation of the Moslem League ought to be at any other place but Aligarh if the memory of the late leader of the Aligarh party is sacred to his followers. Certainly the political League and the College cannot go together. Sir Antony MacDonnell, when he was at the head of these provinces, laid down that rule and no one can deny that it was a sound rule.

LUCKNOW :
The 17th August 1908. } MASHIR H. KIDWAI."

British rule in India.

19. Referring to the difference of opinion regarding the effects of British rule in India, the Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 21st August, remarks that no one can deny that in some respects, at least, British rule has been a blessing to India. But at the same time, remarks the editor, the condition of the masses is not what it ought to be. The Government should adopt a more liberal policy and the people should be a bit more moderate in the demand of their rights. This, he says, would ensure the permanence of British rule in India and the prosperity of Indians.

OUDH AKHBAR, 21st August 1908.

The present situation in India.

20. A correspondent writing in the Ánand (Lucknow), in its issue of the 13th August, says that the present situation in the country is neither to the advantage of the Government nor to that of the people and that the present repressive policy of the Government does not appear to have succeeded in suppressing sedition in the country.

ANAND, 13th August 1908.

The Government should therefore proceed very carefully in framing its contemplated Press Law, for abuse of power will only intensify the already existing discontent in the country. He urges that before the promulgation of the new Press Law, Government will be well advised if it establishes a board of editors to exercise a wholesome check on the Indian press without interfering with its legitimate liberty. He thinks that such an arrangement would be more appreciated and at the same time would be more effective than the enactment of any fresh repressive press legislation.

KANNAUJ PUNCH, 15th August 1908.

Seditious movement.

21. Referring to the violent tone of the vernacular press, the Kannauj Punch, of the 15th August, remarks that the Government has been led to adopt repressive measures by the abuse of the rights of freedom of speech and of the liberty of the press.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 16th August 1908.

The Indian problem.

22. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 16th August, has an article in which the writer, referring to the unrest and the discontent at the present time prevailing throughout India, says that before it is possible to appreciate the situation in India to-day it is necessary to correctly understand what "discontented" Indians really want. Do they seek a revolution or merely press for reform? Do they wish that the government of India by the British should come to an end and become a thing of the past, or do they desire that it should continue, purged of certain evils, the old order changing, giving place to the new, so that the principle of government may be in keeping with the spirit of the times? The aspirations of the discontented people of this country have not always been correctly apprehended. The Mutiny of 1857, it must be remembered, was an attempt at a revolution and it is extravagantly inaccurate to endeavour to find a paralled to the events of 1857 in the few anarchist and seditious outbursts which have latterly been a feature of Indian discontent. But when Government is called upon to grapple with a movement which though determined is peaceful, avoiding any resort to force then the question how the Government is to deal with it is not so easy to answer.

Between the Mutiny, therefore, and the movement now in progress, there can be no comparison. He says that in 1857 the aim was to effect a revolution by resort to force; at the present time the aim is to bring legitimate pressure to bear on the rulers so that they may themselves reform the mode of governing the country and concede privileges to the people which it is to their interest to withhold. A revolution, from the very purpose it has in view and the means which it employs, is at an end immediately the trial of strength between the Government and the Revolutionists is concluded. A movement for reform, on the other hand, inasmuch as it repudiates a resort to force, avoids any trial of strength, on the issue of which its existence could be made to depend. The success of a revolution depends on the force by which it is backed; the success of a movement for reform on the conviction and sincerity of those who identify themselves with the movement.

As it is impossible to destroy an honest and sincerely peaceful movement to secure reform by any mere repressive action on the part of the Government, how, he asks, should a Government act when it is actually called upon to combat a movement of this character? It is in answering this question that opinion seems to be widely divergent. There are some thinkers who are determined upon confounding a movement for reform with a revolution, and in seeking a solution of the Indian problem they can suggest only the adoption by the Government of these measures which would be most appropriate to put down an attempt at revolt. How futile however is the attempt to check the desire for reform by repressive measures is aptly illustrated by the history of the English church: the evil effects of such an attempt, if persistent, is writ large on the pages of English church history.

He says that it has also been suggested that the Government should permit the representatives of ancient Indian families to co-operate with it in putting an end to the prevailing unrest and disorder, but it is not from the representatives of ancient Indian families that the majority of the advocates of reform are recruited. The race of reformers constitutes a very different set of people and in the peaceful struggle for privileges and rights, they stand on a platform alone and apart from the rest of the inhabitants of this country. As such they will have to be dealt with directly, not through the mediation of any other section of the Indian people.

The writer concludes by saying that whether the Government will see its way to enlist on its side the sympathy and co-operation of this section of the Indian people with its youthful vigour and boundless energy and liberal ideas and thus solve the Indian problem, or whether it will allow it to drift further and further away into an attitude less and less reconcileable with its principles, will be seen in the future.

Causes of unrest during the year 1907-8.

23. In continuation of his article entitled "The Causes of Unrest During the Year 1907-8" (vide paragraph 16, Selections No. 33, current), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 18th August, remarks that after the Mutiny was over, Englishmen wreaked a terrible vengance upon Indians—a vengance which may be held justifiable from their point of view but which cannot be said to be in accordance with the laws of justice and fair play. Muhammadans were the chief object of this terrible retribution; their houses were demolished, their towns were devastated and they themselves were seen hanging on the gallows, and all this for the simple reason that the rebellious army was mainly composed of Muhammadans, and Bahadur Shah in the end chose to be the leader of it. This was why his sons were shot and their heads were presented to him in a basket. In the midst of their fury and rage, Englishmen did not pause to consider the chief causes of the Mutiny and the reasons which led Bahadur Shah to participate in it, but continued their terrible persecution with a ferocity which makes one shudder even at this day. In the heat of the moment the simple facts were overlooked. Maulvis were held responsible for the Mutiny, and its real causes were altogether lost sight of. Here the editor enumerates the causes, which he says were purely religious, based on a misunderstanding. He refers to the cartridge theory and says that the rumour regarding cartridges being greased with objectionable material was the root cause of all the troubles that arose. As to Bahadur Shah's and other Muhammadan raises' participation in the Mutiny, the editor remarks that it was due to the threats of physical violence which they could not but yield to.

AL BASHIR, 18th August 1908.

Appointment of an Indian to the Executive Council.

24. Referring to the resolution passed by a meeting of the Moslem League at Aligarh that the claims of Muhammadans should not be overlooked in the matter of the appointment of an Indian to the Executive Council, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 14th August, deprecates this uncalled-for appeal for racial representation, and urges that at least two Indians should be elected to the Council, and that the basis of selection should not be one of racial considerations but one of merit and popularity.

ABHYUDAYA, 14th August 1908.

The Punjab and its manliness.

25. Some newspapers of Bengal, says the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 14th August, accounted for the prosecutions in the Punjab in the following way:—

"Bengal produces clerks but the Punjab produces soldiers. The latter should therefore be first of all prevented from catching the contagion of sedition."

This mode of thinking, says the Rahbar, can no longer be held justifiable, for plague and famine and some artificial causes also have so affected the Punjab that it can no longer claim a superiority over Bengal. Let us see, says the editor, if we can undo the mischief. If we cannot, misery is to be our lot.

RAHBAR, 14th August 1908.

Mr. Tilak and anarchism.

26. Referring to the card found in the possession of Mr. Tilak containing names of books on explosives, the Kannauj Punch, of the 15th August, remarks that even great men of Bengal and other provinces think that they can defy the Government successfully with their bombs. Mr. Tilak's explanation regarding the card, says the editor, is an example of the many excuses that a bad man can put forward.

KANNAUJ PUNCH, 15th August 1908.

Saiyid Haidar Raza.

27. Referring to the enthusiastic reception accorded to Saiyid Haidar Raza of Delhi by the Nagpur public, the Tafrih (Lucknow), of the 14th August, says that it is very possible that these demonstrations may prove dangerous to Saiyid Haidar Raza, for in these days it is no small matter for a patriotically-disposed person to express his ideas even though they may be loyal and unobjectionable.

TAFRIH, 14th August 1908.

KANNAUJ PUNCH, 15th August 1908.

Mr. Norton and an accused.

28. While deprecating the violent tone of the Bengalis, the Kannauj Punch, of the 15th August, writes :—

"A few days ago Mr. Norton received a card threatening him with violence and death. He had a conversation one day with some of the accused in the conspiracy cases. One of them said that his head would be severed from his body. Mr. Norton thereupon asked what fault he had committed. The accused then said that he was at the bottom of all these prosecutions. Mr. Norton remarked he would see if he could be successful (in sending them to jail). 'Just see if you remain alive till then' rejoined the accused. 'Thank you', said Mr. Norton, and went away smiling."

KANNAUJ PUNCH, 15th August 1908.

The Bombay riots.

29. While denouncing the riots that followed the conviction of Mr. Tilak in Bombay, the Kannauj Punch, of the 15th August, bewails the inauspicious moment that the partition of Bengal was inaugurated—a measure which has been followed by havoc of the most disastrous nature to India.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 16th August 1908.

A Principal and his doings.

30. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 16th August :—

"The historian of our own times will perhaps describe the present situation as one full of surprises, for the desire of doing some new thing, like the Athenian desire of telling or hearing something new, is rather predominant. The contagion has spread to quarters which might have been expected to retain their immunity from it. The spectre of 'sedition' haunts the minds of level-headed college authorities. Newspapers have been placed under a ban, as will appear from the following rule issued by the head of one of the educational institutions here :—'Rule 3—No newspapers are allowed in the Library or in any part of the college buildings.' Perhaps the bacillus of sedition germinates faster within the precincts of a college than elsewhere. This is indeed news to us. We wish there had been some sense in the rule. Information has also reached us (we hope however that such is not the fact), that a certain section of students is admitted after considerable difficulty into the Muir Central College, and that, in fact, some have been peremptorily refused admission. This tells its own tale, but the premier college in the United Provinces might well have been above such sectarian prejudices. We have also heard that the treatment which the students receive at the hands of the head of the institution leaves much room for improvement. Of course, we cannot expect that men should come out from England to emulate a Dr. Arnold here, or that there will come a second Dr. Richardson or Principal Wordsworth to gladden the student world. But what we do expect is that teachers and heads of our public schools and colleges will act with caution and circumspection in dealing with our youths at the present time. The transit from the school to the college is a crisis in student life here. Upon entering colleges the Indian student comes actually into a new life. It is here that the necessity for impartiality becomes imperative to the teacher or manager, and is yet most difficult to display. A professor to have that influence over the students which is essential for their well-being must strive to acquire their confidence and affection. Such an effort in the case under question is, we are sorry to note, only conspicuous by its utter absence. Most of our students who congregate to a central college are recently separated from their homes and other congenial surroundings. They hanker after sympathy and companionship. No great effort is required by any Professor or Principal to be the sole referee or the repositary in the concerns of every individual student. But a martinet, we are afraid, will never succeed. To rule like an autocrat is awarded only to a fortunate few. Those to whom we assign the care and the well-being of our youths can ill-afford to be otherwise than really a 'guide, philosopher and friend.' 'This is no plea,' as one educationist says, 'to abolish authority as a factor in education. Such a course would be stupid, and foolish, and as untrue to Nature's law as the prevailing custom of ignoring the factor of freedom. The two must run their course on parallel lines in the early years with a constant tendency to lessen and dwindle on the part of authority until at last, at the age of adolescence, it vanishes and leaves freedom and friendship the sole line of direction and guidance for the healthy and all-round developed individual.' Guard against license as much as you can. But do not ask the boys to regard life in college as a term of penal servitude. Train them to enjoy and use liberty. Let them understand liberty as a practical matter, a thing of vital importance. For in the absence of such understanding liberty, at whatsoever age you give it to them, will be turned into license and will be made an opportunity for overwhelming selfishness."

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 16th August 1908.

The would-be Viceroy.

31. A correspondent of the Riyáz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 16th August, referring to the rumour regarding the appointment of Sir Antony MacDonnell as the future Viceroy of India, says that if the rumour turns out to be true the appointment will displease the Musalmans of India very much as they cannot easily forget or forgive Sir Antony's policy regarding the Hindi and Urdu question in these provinces.

MASHRIQ, 18th August 1908.

Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan.

32. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 18th August, publishes an article of which a literal translation is as follows :—

"If, as Al Bashir (Etawah) writes, it is true that 'Fazl-ul Hassan, Hasrat, editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla, said before his arrest, that when Lord Minto visited Aligarh, Hoti Lal Varma, too, went there with the intention of throwing a bomb at His Excellency, but that he prevented him from committing that heinous act, then surely Fazl-ul Hassan deserves the sympathy of both the Government and the nation—the nation ought to be thankful to him for the simple reason that the centre of the Muhammadans was saved from a great disgrace, and the Government ought to be grateful to him because a worthy and innocent individual like Lord Minto was preserved from death. It might be asked, however, why Fazl-ul Hassan did not inform the authorities of Hoti Lal's intention.

But we declare that the prevention of a heinous offence, for the commission of which elaborate preparations have been made, is also a great service. If the Government investigates the matter and finds the rumour as to Fazl-ul Hassan's action true, then surely Hasrat is deserving of mercy and sympathy, especially as like other editors, he was not even warned to be more careful in future."

II.—Afghanistan and Trans-Frontier.

ADVOCATE, 20th August 1908.

The frontier policy.

33. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 20th August, discusses the frontier policy of the Government of Lord Minto which, after the quiet of Lord Curzon's régime, was formulated without any regard to the decision so deliberately given by Lord George Hamilton in 1898 and endorsed later on by Mr. Brodrick (now Lord Middleton). The editor says that had not Lord Morley stood firm and seen absolutely no reason for a departure from a policy that ensured quiet for seven years together, and had he not turned a deaf ear to any proposal of even temporary occupation, much less annexation, the jerry buildings on the frontier would not have been saved from being set on fire and the Indian tax-payer would not have escaped from having his ponderous burden—already too heavy in itself—from being further added to. He says that Lord Morley was indeed a better judge of the situation than those on the spot itself, as after events very clearly proved, and that those who were impatient enough then to heap abuse on the Amir ought to hide their faces in shame at learning that the cause of the Afghan fury was given by the Simla Military clique itself. He concludes with the remark that the Blue Book is thus interesting from two points of view. As far as the frontier policy itself is concerned, it reveals the defect of the original sin, the sin of taking possession of the fertile valleys and confining the tribes to the sterile craggy hills. As stones cannot be turned into bread and as hills cannot yield an abundance of crops, raids into the plains below could not be prevented. Thus a constant source of irritation to the tribes and frequent chances of learning mountain warfare for the troops have been the abiding feature of the frontier policy. The other revelation is that the man on the spot is not always the best authority on a given problem. Like one who takes no part in a game, but sees much of it, the student of Indian politics in England, be he in office, in Parliament or in the press, provided he takes pains to keep himself well informed, is not unfrequently better situated to take a correct perspective of a problem and arrive at a better decision than the man actually on the spot. Lord Morley deserves the best thanks of India for his bold stand against the combined efforts of the civil and military authorities for a move forward on the frontier.

III.—Native States.

JEDD-O-JEHAD, 17th August 1908.

The Press Act in Mysore.

34. Referring to the Press Act which has been passed in Mysore and which is said to be more strict and summary than the Act passed in British India, the Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad, Hardoi), of the 17th August, remarks that this is the result of the demoralization of the native states; the editor doubts if this measure would appeal to the British Government as just and honest.

IV.—Administration.

ANAND, 13th August 1908.

Mr. Tilak's conviction.

35. The Anand (Lucknow), of the 13th August, says that a very serious blunder has been committed in indicting such an honest and single-eyed person as Mr. Tilak for sedition. His very appeal to the Privy Council shows his confidence in the English nation and his faith in its justice. Had he been opposed to British rule, he would never have agreed to appealing to the Privy Council. The sympathy which his countrymen have expressed for him in his sufferings shows that although Mr. Justice Davar and the jury might hold him guilty, the country at large looks upon him as innocent.

OUDH AKHBAR, 19th August 1908.

Khudi Ram Bose.

36. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 19th August, referring to the execution of Khudi Ram Bose, remarks that two facts in this connection deserve attention: firstly, that Khudi Ram Bose remained cheerful to the last; secondly, he was not allowed to appeal to His Majesty the King-Emperor for mercy.

Khudi Ram Bose's execution was, no doubt, a warning to many, but to grateful hearts the effect of a pardon tendered to him would have been the same. But in administrative matters, there is very little room for mercy. And religion, too, provides death as a penalty for murder—the authorities therefore can in no way be blamed.

ZUL QARNAIN, 14th August 1908.

Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan.

37. Referring to the conviction of Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan of Aligarh and the sentence of two years' rigorous imprisonment passed upon him, the Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 14th August, remarks that this is the result of his listening to the advice of the "false friends of India."

JEDD-O-JEHAD, 17th August 1908.

Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan.

38. Referring to the prosecution of Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan, the Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad, Hardoi), of the 17th August, remarks:—

"It is in no spirit of criticism that we say that the sentence passed upon Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan is not quite proportionate to the offence he has committed. The Government ought to have warned him in the first instance and then prosecuted him if he offended again. Besides, an article relating to Egypt ought not to have been made the basis of a prosecution—for this cannot but lead to bitterness among the Muhammadan community of India.

Nawab Vikar-ul-Mulk, instead of coming out to give evidence in the case, ought to have published pamphlets with a view to counteracting the effects of the objectionable article in question."

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 16th August 1908.

The Swarajya and the Urdu-i-Mualla.

39. The Riyáz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 16th August, referring to the conviction of the editors of the Swarajya and Urdu-i-Mualla, remarks that both the Hindus and Muhammadans of this province should co-operate in securing pardon for the editors of these papers, not because they have been wrongly punished but because they have been misled by the Calcutta agitators. In a province like ours, the editor says, where quiet reigns everywhere and where the loyalty of the people is unquestioned, the effect of such a pardon would be very wholesome. We do not sympathise with the editors but with our province. If they are not pardoned, the fair name of our province will be tarnished. We appeal to Hindus and Muhammadans to take up the cause of these editors and to co-operate, for co-operation in matters where loyalty to the King is concerned, is highly beneficial to the parties concerned.

'We are sure that if a pardon is granted it will set the people on their guard and make them determined to discountenance any seditious movements in these provinces.'

40. Referring to the Aligarh sedition trials, the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 14th August, says that the accused must now realize the folly of their actions, for they are to suffer for their deeds very soon now.

RAHBAR, 14th August 1908.

The Aligarh sedition trials.

41. Referring to the opinion of Mr. Frederick Harrison regarding the treatment of political offenders in jails, the Riyáz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 16th August, remarks that considering the education and social status of such prisoners it would be fair to make a difference between them and criminals of the ordinary type. Simple imprisonment, the editor says, would be quite sufficient for educated gentlemen.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 16th August 1908.

Punishment of political offenders.

42. Referring to the enhancement by the High Court of the sentence passed upon Durga Charan Sanyal, the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 14th August, remarks that this action is not compatible with the dignity of an Indian High Court. It is sure to lower the prestige of the High Courts of India and create bitterness where it did not exist.

RAHBAR, 14th August 1908.

Durga Charan Sanyal and the High Court.

43. While expressing its satisfaction at the appointment of a Muhammadan Judge to the Madras High Court, the Zia-ul-Islam (Moradabad), for July, says that the whole Muhammadan community feels grateful to the Government for this, and hopes that in all other High Courts also the claims of Muhammadans to seats on the bench will not be overlooked.

46. Referring to the good and useful work done by the Criminal Intelligence Department, the Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 14th August, makes the following suggestions to improve its present condition :—

ZUL QARNAIN, 14th August 1908.

The Criminal Investigation Department.

"(1) That the members of this department should be well paid so that they may not fall a prey to the many temptations with which they are beset.

(2) That only persons of loyal tendencies should be admitted into it.

(3) That the members of this department should not be compelled to furnish fresh information every day for this leads them to concoct stories which do much mischief both to the rulers and the ruled.

(4) That the information furnished by informers should be verified before any action is taken."

(e)—Education.

47. The Rájput (Agra), of the 15th August, advocates the establishment of denominational institutions to supplement Government schools and colleges with a view to suit the special needs and circumstances of the different communities of India. The writer characterises the education imparted in such institutions as of a truly national character and deprecates the attempts that are being made in some quarters to make educational institutions independent of Government control.

TOHFA-I-HIND, 18th August 1908.

Government schools and colleges in the United Provinces.

48. The Tohfa-i-Hind (Bijnor), of the 18th August, remarks that many students are refused admission into schools and colleges on the ground that the class rooms can only contain a limited number of students. This, says the editor, means great hardship and inconvenience to poor students who cannot leave their own towns and seek education in other places. He appeals to the Government to see that the buildings of the present institutions are extended. The cost can be met by public subscription if the Government is unable to give a grant for the carrying out of the work. This is a splendid opportunity, says the editor in conclusion, for opening new schools and those that are dissatisfied with the present system of education should take advantage of it.

ADVOCATE, 20th August 1908.

The School-Leaving Certificate Examination.

49. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 20th August, publishes a letter from Mr. E. A. Richardson, Inspector of Schools, Lucknow division, in which the writer tries to remove the misunderstanding that has been created in the minds of students preparing for the Matriculation Examination and in the mind of the general public by the manner in which the School-Leaving Certificate course has been introduced in the Jubilee High School, Lucknow, and the District High School, Sitapur, to the exclusion of the Matriculation course. The editor, in reviewing this letter, observes that the Department of Public Instruction was not perhaps very happy in its desire to get this departmental examination recognized by the University. He says that there are parents whose intelligence cannot be questioned, who feel that their sons, after passing the School-Leaving Certificate Examination, will be at a disadvantage in the college classes, and they have a grievance that their feelings have not been respected and that their boys have been forced to adopt a course for which they have no liking and Mr. Richardson's explanation will not therefore help much to relieve this grievance. For instance, he does not say why arrangements were not made in the Jubilee School for the teaching of the Matriculation course.

In the opinion of the editor the new course should not have been introduced just yet and the best policy for the department to follow would have been to have introduced the School-Leaving Examination side by side with the teaching of the Matriculation, just as was the case with the School Final Examination. Local public opinion ought to have been consulted, thereby avoiding the present undesirable situation. He suggests that until such time as suitable arrangements for class rooms, &c., can be made for teaching the School-Leaving course, no changes in the present system should be introduced in Sitapur, and that in the Jubilee School arrangements should be made for preparing students for both courses. He concludes by saying that if the new examination possesses all the advantages, which have been claimed for it, then why not wait and watch and see how the results turn out? Why seek then any adventitious aid for it? Why be in such a hurry about it? Surely some regard is due to the students and their parents in the matter. The public feeling in the matter seems to be that the question should be fairly judged on its own merits, as to which of the two paralled examinations should ultimately prevail. If the School-Leaving Examination has intrinsic merits and recommendations of its own, the very success of the first batch of students, and their brilliant career in the College classes will tend to disarm all opposition and lead others coming after them to adopt this examination and no more think of the oldworld Matriculation Examination.

In the same issue the editor publishes a letter from a correspondent who signs himself "VIDYA" on this subject in which he points out that an examination which was designed to fit men for the practical work of life after the completion of their school career and which was established as a non-university examination, should not be declared for all practical purposes equal to the Matriculation.

He further adds that the pressure put on boys to leave the Matriculation course and to take up the School-Leaving Certificate course is not at all acceptable and confirms suspicions that have been already aroused. The correspondent says 'it may be that the heart of the Government is overflowing with the milk of human kindness. It may be that Sir John Hewett is a friend of higher education. But people must look facts in the face and I beg to assert that facts as they exist—settled facts as Lord Morley would call them are more than sufficient to excite suspicion in the breasts not only of the discontented minnows but even among the contented trouts. People think, and you cannot prevent people from thinking, though you may tie their tongues with your ordinances and your acts, that the Government has entered on a crusade against higher education, because higher education has given birth to political consciousness among the Indian people, and the establishment of examinations like the School-Leaving Certificate Examinations, controlled practically as it will be by the Government, and the positive discouragement of University Examinations like the Matriculation, is one of the steps in that direction. Let it be noted that these suspicions have not been produced by the preaching of any agitator or the distribution of any seditious leaflets but solely by the action of the authorities.

Now it may be urged, by those speaking on behalf of the Government, that as higher education has produced consequences which are considered undesirable by the Government, it is at liberty to suppress it. I will not discuss the ethics of the question as to whether the Government is or is not justified in suppressing higher education. But this much I will say: If the Government wants to do so, let it work in a frank and open manner and not in an underhand mole-like way, asserting one thing and doing another, saying "white" and meaning "black." Then we will know where we are. The present behaviour of the authorities—if the suspicions excited in the breasts of many are at all well-founded—is not quite straightforward, not to say anything of the best traditions of British rule.'

Improvement of cotton cultivation.

50. The Vyápári and Karigar (Benares), of the 15th August, impresses upon the United Provinces Government the advisability of improving the cotton cultivation by distributing cotton seeds of good quality at moderate charges among the cultivators just as has been done in the Madras Presidency.

VYAPARI AND KARIGAR, 15th August 1908.

Famine relief in the United Provinces.

51. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 16th August, publishes a letter from Lala Lajpat Rai on "Famine Relief in the United Provinces." The editor remarks that while the famine is not yet over and the need for granting relief still exists, though no longer on the same scale as formerly, the facilities for giving aid to the distressed through non-official agencies are very much hampered by the public in certain centres of the most afflicted districts. He says that the United Provinces Police not only watches the movements of all outsiders but tries to make the province too hot for them all, without any consideration as to what has brought them here. The best way to get a budnám for the Government, says the editor, is to let loose these knights of the baton among people who have as much to do with sedition and anarchism as the Man in the Moon. In this lies the ruination of the Government's prestige not its enhancement.

ADVOCATE, 16th August 1908.

The letter is as follows:—

"In the last week of July I paid a flying visit to Lucknow and Allahabad to confer with local committees as to the period up to which relief work should be continued and also to ask the Provincial Committees to take steps to put in their claims for all Hindu orphans. The Lucknow Committee decided to continue their relief work up to the end of this month, but the reports since received from different quarters as to the incessant harrassing to which famine volunteers are subjected by the police have forced me to issue instructions for the withdrawal of all volunteers from the interior of districts. Relief is still needed as the rains have not yet affected the prices much and people cannot procure funds easily until after the kharif crop has been gathered. The officials, however, seem to be in a state of panic and the police have evidently full license to annoy and harrass all 'outsiders.' Under the circumstance, although with great reluctance and pain, I have decided to withdraw my volunteers in order to avoid all chances of their coming into collision with a police which does not scruple to make up cases on the slightest pretext. The discovery of the bomb conspiracy in Bengal seems to have unhinged the minds of certain district officers in the United Provinces, to such an extent as to make them suspect every one who does not work under them. The police vigilance has consequently increased to an extremely unreasonable extent and unscruplous officials think that now is their opportunity for showing zeal. The result is that strangers are being harrassed and annoyed beyond measure. The temporary orphanages and poorhouses, however, shall be maintained till orphans are allowed to be removed to permanent orphanages or till three months have expired after the famine has been officially declared to be over. The balance of funds in my hands shall be used in providing for orphans and waifs. The authorities of the various Hindu orphanages have expressed their willingness to receive all Hindu children even of low castes (including untouchables) and provide for them. I am anxious that in connection with one or two of these orphanages a decent provision be made for the education of the children of depressed classes. With this object in view I am in communication with the managers of Hindu orphanages. Besides, it is my desire to save a small sum, if possible, to form a famine trust for emergencies. All this, however, depends upon the contributions that I get. So far the response to my appeal has been good for which my best thanks are due to those charitably inclined people who subscribed liberally as well as collected money with commendable zeal. It will be an interesting story that of the distribution of famine relief by my agents in this famine, as the difficulties in their way were tremendous. I hope to issue a complete report of my work as soon as the accounts have been received from the various committees or persons who were entrusted with the work of distribution.

Subordinate appointments.

54. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 16th August :—

"When Lord MacDonnell was Lieutenant Governor of these provinces, he made certain qualifications necessary for the recruitment of the subordinate executive and judicial services. For instance, he laid down that no candidate who had not at least passed the Entrance Examination should be admitted into public offices ; that persons above the prescribed age should be rigorously excluded, and that a knowledge of English was indispensable for certain appointments. These rules were strictly enforced and loyally followed in his time, and very few exemptions were granted, but during the incumbency of his successor much attention was not paid to these salutary rules, and in consequence the morale of the subordinate services was allowed to deteriorate. Since the assumption of the high office of Lieutenant Governor by Sir John Hewett His Honour has not been able, doubtless owing to pressure of other work, to give much attention to this subject, but we hope he will recognize its importance and issue instructions that the orders already promulgated should be carefully followed. It is becoming rather common for officers to apply for the exemption of their nominees, and it is time that some check were placed on indiscriminate applications and nominations. There is certainly no dearth of suitable candidates since education is spreading, and it is inexplicable why persons over age or disqualified by the educational test should be admitted."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 16th August 1908.

Licenses under the Arms Act.

55. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 16th August :—

"The Local Government has issued orders that licenses for keeping revolvers and pistols, &c., should be sparingly issued. The result is that the orders are being rigorously enforced and have given rise to some discontent. All the arms that have been seized in connection with the anarchist conspiracy were either smuggled or illegally obtained. It was not proved in a single instance that a license holder or any one exempted under the Arms Act had given his arms to the conspirators. As it is, licenses for arms have been always sparingly issued, and no unlawful use has been made of such arms. People who apply for licenses are not very likely to join any conspiracy or to abuse their privilege."

Famine services.

56. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 16th August :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 16th August 1908.

"We understand the Local Government will shortly call a conference of officials at Naini Tal at which rewards to persons who have rendered services during the famine will be determined. We wonder whether the names of Lala Lajpat Rai and Babu Abinash Chandra Majumdar will be considered at the conference ?"

57. The Mukhbir-i-Alam (Moradabad), of the 8th August, says that hard work in jails cannot better the moral character of prisoners. Only religious instructions can elevate the moral tone of a man. Pandit Bhoj Dutt in Bareilly.

60. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 16th August, publishes the following from a speech said to have been delivered by Pandit Bhoj Dutt, editor of the Masáfir (Agra), in Bareilly on the 9th August :— ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 16th August 1908.

"Hindu brethren : seven crores of Muhammadans and twenty-five lakhs of Christians have shut the door upon thirty crores of Hindus. Awake ! and root out the Muhammadans and Christians, so that your doors may be opened for ever, and you may lead an independent life—now is the time : Bengal, the Punjab and other provinces have awakened.

The most welcome news is that Maharaj Hira Singh has unfurled the banner that is waving so mightily for the freedom of Hindus. (Do you know) which Hira Singh ? The one who is descended from the Aryan stock and whose forefathers crossed the Himalayan valleys and established Swaraj in the country. Three crores of Kshatriyas belonging to this brave dynasty are to-day present in the country ; the peaks of the Himalayas are very plainly reminding them that the cause of our prosperity was this very Swarajya. It is a matter for congratulation that Kshatriyas have become conscious to-day. Our very existence depends upon these brave men . . . . Let us look upon Muhammadan and Christian children also as a black cobra. These troublesome creatures should therefore be removed at once."

Commenting upon the above, the editor remarks that the meeting addressed by Pandit Bhoj Dutt was attended only by men of his own creed. The lecture is a gross abuse of the freedom of speech granted by the British rulers. Besides these political vapourings, a good deal was also said about the Prophet, Christ, the Bible and the Koran.

ANAND, 13th August 1908.

Protection of cows.

61. A correspondent in the Anand (Lucknow), of the 13th August, attributes all the present degradation of India to the destruction of cows which is being regularly and mercilessly carried on in utter disregard of their utility to the material economy of the country. He appeals to all his countrymen to stop this process and suggests the following means towards this end:—'No Hindus should use leather shoes, as hides imply the slaughter of cattle on a large scale. No Hindus should make gifts of cows to their priests as the latter are too poor to maintain them and are in consequence obliged to sell them to butchers. And no Hindu should sell cows to any one but a Hindu.'

MAHA VIDYALYA SAMACHAR, 8th August 1908.

The Sadhus' problem.

62. The nation is dead that shows no signs of discretion and common sense. Viewed from this stand point the Indian nation, says the Maha Vidyalya Samachar (Hardwar), of the 8th August, cannot be said to be living. For is it not a sheer lack of discretion and common sense to go about talking of Swaraj in a land where a chaukidar can be had at Rs. 2-13-0 per mensem? The country which supplies men for the Detective department of the Government—the country whose sons are steeped in ignorance, where poverty compels people to renounce their religion and where litigation is the order of the day—surely a country like this cannot aspire for political independence. First set your own house in order and then try to impart Western political instruction to India. Do not try to imitate foreigners in everything for your needs are not quite identical with theirs. It is this intellectual bideshism that is the bane of educated India. Materialism has taken such a strong hold of the Indian mind that it has become almost a fashion to be irreligious. Faith and confidence have quite departed from our midst, and mutual distrust and discord have taken their place. There is much room therefore for peaceful work if you simply turn your attention to the evils which have crept in your own society —take for example the question of sadhus. This is a problem to which the attention of Indians may most profitably be directed. Instead of remaining what they are—a set of idle pleasure-loving fools—they can be converted into the most useful instruments for the regeneration of India.

Every one, therefore, who is a sincere well-wisher of his country should try to educate these sadhus who are nothing short of a burden to society for the present. Youthful sadhus should be given a regular training—both mental and physical—and those that are comparatively advanced in age should be taught useful arts. In short, they should be made living examples of what a religious man ought to be, e.g. the true guardian of the intellectual, moral and physical well-being of his followers.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 19th August 1908.

Turkey and the constitution.

1. The democratic form of Government, which is considered so beneficial to a country has done much harm in Persia for the present, says the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 19th August. It has paralyzed the activities of many useful institutions and has caused much bloodshed in the country. Such is the condition of Persia where there are not two different national interests to come into conflict with each other. What then will be the state of affairs in Turkey, where though the head of the Government is a Muhammadan, the stronger element is Christian? This is the dark side of the constitution recently granted by the Sultan. It has, however, infused a new spirit into the almost dying hearts of the Nationalist party in Egypt, and though the difficulties are many, nothing is impossible which is done in the true spirit of self-sacrifice and patriotism.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 20th August 1908.

His Honour's speech at Lucknow.

2. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 20th August, has the following :—

"The most disappointing portion of the speech is the reference to grievances. 'I made a public announcement in darbar at Allahabad that I was always ready to do my best to redress any real grievance. I do not think that there is any real or substantial grievance that remains unredressed.' Is that all? Surely, this is too narrow a conception for the ruler of a province and a statesman. Is the ma bap rule of thumb to endure for ever? Of course these words have only a local application, but even here experience must expand with the need of the times. Whether grievances are real and substantial is not decided by those who have them but those who can redress them, and the two points of view are different. Then we have nearly reached the limit of the period when it will be only a question of redressing grievances. If others can realize that a new life is coming to India, why should not the rulers on the spot also realize it? Sedition and anarchism are different, but is the birth of a national life to be ignored or suffocated? It is by bringing this new life to a healthy growth that the Government will be made firmer and safer and the dark spirits of anarchy and revolution will vanish. Mere repression or force has never yet extirpated them and never will."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 23rd August 1908.

His Honour's speech at Allahabad.

3. Adverting to the portion of His Honour's speech in which reference to the criticism that appeared in the Indian People (Allahabad), about house searches was made, the editor, in the issue of the 23rd August, observes "the reader will note that we have frequently and forcibly objected to indiscriminate and promiscuous house searches as mischievous and politically inexpedient. The Lieutenant Governor made personal inquiry and he is satisfied that at Agra and Aligarh, the searches were not wanton or indiscriminate. We are bound to accept His Honour's judgement. What we cannot accept is the presumption throughout the speech that Hoti Lal's character and reputation were known to all who came in contact with him. He had only lately returned from Europe and no one in these provinces had any notion that a man could go to Europe only to become an anarchist and learn the gentle art of bomb making. We now understand that the gentlemen whose houses were searched were not suspected themselves but some members of their families, probably young boys, who had been in communication with Hoti Lal. The searches at the Vedic Ashram and the close examination of the boys are also accounted for by the fact of the notorious pamphlet having been read and explained to the boys. But no copy of the pamphlet could be found. Is it certain that there was a large number of copies, or only a few that were industriously circulated and then destroyed at a moment's notice? The Lieutenant Governor said nothing about the searches at Benares. The local authorities were not responsible for the search of Babu Subodh Chandra Mullick's house, but Babu Charu Chandra Biswas is a local suspect. No information is yet forthcoming as to what the suspicion against him was. All that we can say is that if Babu Charu Chandra Biswas is not above suspicion, we do not know the man in these provinces who is, and if the search of his house cannot be described as indiscriminate, then every man's house, from the Talukdar's and the Legislative Councillor's down to the petty shopkeeper's, may be searched without incurring that charge. We are content however that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor has declined to countenance indiscriminate searches. That will have the effect desired."

He says that on the occasion of house searches a distinction should be made between well-disposed and ill-disposed persons. What would have happened, asks the editor, if the searches had been kept up? The ideas of people on the subject of house search would have changed materially as they have in Bengal. It would be a calamity, he says, if the Bengal idea on the subject were to extend to the United Provinces.

'If the conviction were to gain ground that no one is immune or free from suspicion, whether he happens to be well-disposed or otherwise, people will become indifferent and will gradually help to swell the ranks of the discontented. You cannot blow hot and cold in the same breath and still expect that things will go on as usual. The Government expressly seeks the co-operation of well-disposed persons in maintaining order. Such co-operation is not possible unless the well-disposed have an assurance that they will not be confounded with the ill-disposed on the uncorroborated information of an unscrupulous informer.'

Referring to that portion of the Lieutenant Governor's speech in which His Honour enjoined on all peaceful and law-abiding citizens to come forward and give information to the Government against those whom they know to be intriguing or plotting against the Government, the editor remarks that according to law, every law-abiding person is bound to give information of any offence committed within his knowledge. The only apprehension, he says, is that His Honour, though fully sensible of the difficulties in the way of giving information, does not quite realize the almost insurmountable difficulty, not in giving, but in getting, information. The revolutionary and anarchist conspiracy in Bengal affords a forcible illustration. The fathers of boys who were deeply involved in the conspiracy knew nothing of the doings of their sons. How could neighbours or strangers be expected to know anything? 'We are certain that if any law-abiding person comes to know that there is an anarchist in the neighbourhood, or that any one is inciting people to violence, he would unhesitatingly give information, but the difficulty is in getting information. Like unto like is the law in crime as in everything else. The anarchist seeks people whom he is likely to convert to his faith, not those who would give him away. The preacher of sedition seeks a sympathetic audience. It is not for want of the will that people are unable to give information, but because of the difficulty in getting any. To communicate mere suspicions would be wrong and might be disliked, while most people have not sufficient leisure to verify every suspicion that rises in their minds.'

INDIAN PEOPLE, 23rd August 1908.

Loyalty manifestoes.

4. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 23rd August, says that loyalty manifestoes have become the order of the day. Because a small section of the people has become misguided and taken to undesirable, and in a few cases, disgusting ways, there is a loud call from the bureaucracy—beneficed and unbeneficed—that all and sundry must come forward and make a declaration of faith. 'We do not feel ourselves called upon to profess or adopt a policy of loyalty, secure in the consciousness that we have said or done nothing to entitle anybody to question it, and what is true of us is true of almost the entire nation. Why then have the Government become so nervous as to feel uneasy unless there are profuse offerings of loyalty, and why should any of our own enlightened countrymen think it their duty to oblige those who do not consult their dignity nor care for their past? Has it never struck either the Government or the loyalty-mongers that there have been anarchical crimes in the West and that still nobody has ever taken it into his head to call upon the respectable people to disavow sympathy for the authors of those nefarious deeds? An objectionable feature of these manifestoes is the uncalled for statement that it is the fashion among loyalty-mongers to make that they will support the Government in any measure they might adopt to root out the new evil. To admit an evil is more easy than to prescribe a suitable remedy with a sense of responsibility and restraint, and it is in our opinion a positive disservice to the country—to the cause of progress—for men who ought to know better to speak and write as if they were willing to give carte blanche to Government in the matter of repressive measures. There are disquieting rumours of contemplated legislation designed to further curtail the liberty of the press and to introduce a system of licensing of national schools, which will have most probably to be resisted. Again, when were the Government deterred from the adoption of whatever measure they regarded as necessary, however obnoxious the people considered these to be? It is quite an exaggerated importance which the loyalty-mongers give themselves when they talk as if their support were essential to Government. Neither the bomb outrages nor the assassins' conspiracy has brought us near to the end of the world or of British rule: both are secure: may they long be so. Let not then either the Government or the people get excited, lose all sense of proportion and moderation, and talk or act for the moment without regard to the consequences of their utterances or doings.'

ADVOCATE, 27th August 1908.

Loyalty by mandate.

5. Referring to the Proclamation addressed by the Governor of Bombay to the people, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 27th August, remarks that it has been a source of some misunderstanding between His Excellency and leaders of society between whom, in spite of what happened within the last few weeks, the best of relations prevail.

He says 'it is no doubt the duty of all law-abiding people to do everything in their power to check the progress of disorder and counteract the doings of those who disturb the public peace. But we wonder why every Indian, however high his position be, should at all be suspected of having sympathy with the organized party of violence? Why should men who for their whole life have been considered peaceful and law-abiding citizens of the Empire be considered as suspects and asked to publicly dissociate themselves from people with whose action they never sympathised? Political disorders are no doubt heinous offences, but not more heinous than murder. Does it ever occur to anybody that as there has been a murder somewhere, it is the duty of every self-respecting neighbour to proclaim from his housetop that he has no sympathy with the murderer?'

'The demand for public dissociation,' the editor says, 'cannot but lead people to believe that they are looked upon with feelings of suspicion, and it is this feeling which creates resentment, particularly so when the Anglo-Indian press takes advantage of the situation and falls foul of people of all shades of opinion, irrespective of the school of politics to which they belong. Those who ask for public demonstrations in the interests of Government do not see the disadvantage which these demonstrations create.'

He fails to understand why these disturbances should make responsible rulers nervous. Why should people be led to believe that the Government has become so nervous that its officials are placing that section of the community in a false position whose support they have already, and which is already doing its best through the press and by personal influence to counteract the prevailing evil.

'Then,' says the editor, 'there is another risk which deters many people from joining these demonstrations. There are opponents of Indian progress like Mr. Rees, in England and in India who are ready to take undue advantage of these manifestations and condemnation of violent writings, and what guarantee is there that these mainfestoes and public denunciations will not be used against Indians, and in their name a demand made for a rigorous press law which will reduce the press to a servile condition? Already the air is thick with rumour that as soon as the present crusade against the vernacular press is over the general press law of the land will be revised and for the offence of a dozen or two newspapers, many of whom have already heavily suffered, the liberty of the entire Indian press will be taken away. Looked at from this point of view, public meetings and demonstrations, instead of being a source of help to the Government, will add to the irritation of the people if they find these followed by more repressive measures. In the present crisis, nothing is more deplorable than any exhibition of nervousness or betrayal of any feeling of want of confidence in well-disposed persons who, whether they proclaim the fact or not, are with the Government and using their influence to prevent the growth of evil influences. It is to the advantage of the country that all these well-disposed persons should not be included in the category of self-seeking Jo Huzurs.'

ADVOCATE, 23rd August 1908.

A further demand for partition.

6. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 23rd August, has the following :—

"At a time when all true well-wishers of the country, Indian and European, are trying to bridge the gulf which has been created between the Government and the people, when efforts are being made to see that no cause of irritation is given to the people of Bengal and the mistake of the Curzon régime not repeated, it was left to politicians of Aligarh to egg the Government of India on to commit another blunder which is likely to throw Bengal once more into great and serious agitation. And yet these Aligarh politicians claim to have the monopoly of the loyalty of the land. The members of the Central Committee of the All-India Moslem League could not have selected a worse time than the present to call an extraordinary meeting of the League to consider certain problems referring to East Bengal. The resolutions dealing with the partition of Bengal and the partition of High Court have each a history of its own. The Hon'ble Nawab Salim Ullah, C.S.I., of Dacca, wrote to the Secretary of the League that he should be helped in demanding of the Government of India a division of the High Court. The letter of the Nawab of Dacca was sent round to the members of the Executive Committee, many of whom sent their written opinions to Aligarh in which they strongly objected to taking up the question of the partition of Bengal. But the members of the League present at Aligarh thought otherwise and they carried the following resolutions nem con :—

'III.—That the All-India Moslem League views with great anxiety the agitation against the partition of Bengal, and hopes that the Government will firmly adhere to those settled facts which have relieved the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal from the disabilities under which they laboured. Any modification whatsoever in the partition will produce an extremely harmful effect from one corner of India to the other.

IV.—That in view of the present situation, and considering the overwhelming number of the Muhammadans in Eastern Bengal and Assam, and to bring the administration of justice within easy reach of the public in general and the Muhammadans of the province in particular, the League respectfully draws the attention of the Government to provide this newly-created province with a separate High Court.'

We have nothing to say about the third resolution as it is not yet too early to say how the partition is likely to be amended. If amended, one does not know if it will be on the lines suggested by the London Daily Telegraph, namely, by the appointment of a Governor in Calcutta and two Lieutenant Governors at Calcutta and Dacca or if it will take the shape of the separation of Behar and Orissa from the rest of Bengal. As to the fourth resolution, we must say that in the name of the League a line of action is being taken which will lead to a strong agitation in Bengal. The opinion of Bengali Hindus might not be cared for, though we doubt whether Lord Minto's Government will ever care to face Bengali public opinion with any such proposal. But in this matter it is not the Bengali Hindus alone whose opposition has to be counted, the great non-official European community of Calcutta is equally opposed to any division of the High Court. We would our friends at Aligarh had shown more prudence in the matter and not gone to befriend the Nawab of Dacca at the risk of making the task of Government still more difficult in Bengal."

HINDUSTANI, 26th August 1908.

A further demand for partition.

7. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 26th August, reproduces from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 27th August, an article headed "A Further Demand for Partition."

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 19th August 1908.

The Moderates and Extremists.

8. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 19th August, referring to the speech of Babu Surendra Nath Banerji delivered on the occasion of the boycott anniversary, remarks that the difference, if any, between the Moderates and Extremists lies in the fact that the latter are more sincere than the former. The outspoken need not be feared as much as those who practise duplicity and resort to secret methods.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 20th August 1908.

The future of the Congress.

9. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 20th August, has the following :—

"Must then the impression last that 'the National Congress is Bedlam, and its representatives are Hooligans?' Will the accumulating traditions of the past twenty-three years go for nothing? Will India's unauthorized parliament no longer voice forth New India's aspirations and needs? We confess that the signs are not at all reassuring. After the Conference at Allahabad, from which so much was expected, we have not had the least sign to assure us that the organization is not really dead. Have the recent events so much demoralized the band of Moderates, that it is no longer possible for them to make any associated efforts for the sustenance of an ideal which has been fed for a quarter of a century with the earnest endeavour of the best and the noblest of India's unfortunate sons? If the party of evil and dark deeds must know that they have no place in this country, surely it is then necessary that the party of constitutional reform must make head, must show that they are loyal to their own traditions and that the blow they received last year could only stun them for a time. The announcement of the programme about the next session of Congress will relieve the situation of its strain. This ominous silence will be over. Government and the people will have some refreshing, some healthy food for thought; for this doleful, this eternal tale of bombs, anarchism and prosecutions is as much demoralizing to the people as it is unnerving to the Government. Let us then shake off this lethargy, this overpowering desire to sleep as of men caught in a snowstorm—the sleep from which there is no waking. Courage begets success as fear begets failure. Thoughts of weakness actualize weakness from within and attract it from without. Let us then think of the strength which lies in the righteousness, the very sacredness of our cause, and the thoughts of strength will both build strength from within and attract it from without."

The Philosophy of Revolution.

10. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 15th August, contains an article headed "The Philosophy of Revolution", in which the editor tries to prove that in all countries, except India, political changes have been brought about by a slow and regular process of evolution, while a political revolution has taken place only in India. India, he thinks, reached its zenith prior to the wars of the Mahabharata, and these wars, which were of the nature of a disastrous revolution mark a turning-point in its history. These wars, although of a very short duration, had a very baneful effect upon the country and thenceforward its decline was very rapid. The editor thinks that just as the decline of India was very precipitate, its rise, too, can be accomplished in the same manner, i.e. by a revolution. "I have tried to prove," he says "that it was only in India that decline was due to a revolution, and it is in India only that progress can be made by means of a revolution, and in no other country has a revolution taken place nor could one take place in any other." He proceeds to discuss the means by which India can regain its former greatness and says that a study of the Mahabharata and the causes of India's decline will show that the best guide for future action is the Bhagwat Gita, as it inculcates the conscientious performance of duty and self-sacrifice, which are the only means by which the condition of the country can be materially ameliorated. In conclusion, he says that there are many misconceptions among the public about the teaching of the Bhagwat Gita and promises to publish a commentary on the book in the columns of the Swarájya at an early date.

SWARAJYA, 15th August 1908.

The Asiatic revival.

11. The Saddháram Prachárak (Kàngri, Bijnor), of the 19th August, referring to the revival of political consciousness among the people of China, Japan, Persia, Turkey and Egypt, remarks that Indians, too, have awakened, but only partially. Hence it is that their steps are tottering and their movements are sometimes misguided. This accounts also for the conduct of those infatuated youths who find sanction for such diabolical deeds as bomb-throwing in the sacred books of the Gita and in the Upanishads'—writings which, if studied in their true spirit, would turn their minds from political agitation and create in them a desire to reform their own characters.

SADDHARAM PRACHARAK, 19th August 1908.

Unity in India.

12. A correspondent of the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 21st August, while discussing the probability of the fusing together of the heterogeneous races of India into one compact whole, remarks that it can be accomplished, although there are many obstacles in the way, if the people have a will to bring it about. He thinks that the universal dissemination of primary education, the reviving of industries and commerce, and the reverting to the old system of settling disputes by means of panchayats would be very helpful in this direction.

RAHBAR, 21st August 1908.

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 16th August 1908.

Christ a as political leader.

13. The Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 16th August, referring to an article in the Hindustan (Lahore), in which the writer has tried to compare Ajit Singh and others with Christ, inasmuch as both have made great sacrifices for their countries, remarks that the organ of the Christian society, the Tajalli has taken strong exception to this comparison. But, says the editor, no one can interfere with any man's convictions whether right or wrong. To compare political leaders with Christ is, however, not so great a crime as to claim a superiority over Him; and Qadiyani Mirza did claim a superiority notwithstanding. Besides, what has Tajalli to say to the opinion entertained about Christ by the Jews?

The editor, in conclusion, remarks that religion is simply to reform the world and politics are so closely allied with religion that it would be no disparagement to call a religious man a political leader. Besides, if politics are too corrupt to be associated with the name of Christ, why do Christians themselves go in for them so keenly?

SADDHARAM PRACHARAK, 19th August 1908.

Arya Samaj and the Government.

14. The Saddharam Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 19th August, says that even up to the present day Government looks upon the Arya Samajists with eyes of suspicion. The Arya Samajist officials of the Government themselves misrepresent their own sect and thus secure redemption from official displeasure. To such Arya Samajists, says the editor, we would give this bit of advice that they keep without the pale of the Samaj, for if matters where secular authority clashes with spiritual, they cannot take refuge with Providence but go over to the earthly power, they would be better out of the Samaj.

AL BASHIR, 25th August 1908.

Causes of the unrest in India during the year 1907-8.

15. In continuation of his article entitled "Causes of the Unrest in India During the Year 1907-8" (vide paragraph 23, Selections No. 34), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 25th August, proceeds to prove that had Bahadur Shah taken an active part in the Mutiny, he would have been followed by the Musalman gentry of Meerut and other adjacent districts, who remained faithful to the British Government. He also says that the Musalmans had no hand in the distribution of chapátis, and if they had, it was only on account of a superstitious belief that distributing chapátis would ward off an epidemic which was prevalent in the country.

But, notwithstanding all this, they fell a prey to the machinations of the Hindus and were mercilessly persecuted, and suspicions were entertained even about men of the position of Sir Saiyid Ahmad.

ADVOCATE, 27th August 1908.

The unrest in India.

16. Under the heading "The Makers of Unrest", the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 27th August, has the following:—

"In considering the persistent efforts made in the Anglo-Indian press to fasten the authorship of the present unrest on Indians alone and the loud call on the part of the Government everywhere on sober people to dissociate themselves from the party of violence, it is necessary to remind both the Government and its apologists throughout India that the mote is not to be found in one eye alone. Hence the value of what the Hon'ble Babu Radhacharan Pal, Municipal Commissioner and Member of the Bengal Legislative Council, said on the present situation at the entertainment given him in recognition of his services to the people in both spheres of activity. It had become the fashion with some people, he said, to attribute unrest solely to Indians, but if one were to take a dispassionate view of the situation, one could not ignore the fact that it was due to disappointed hopes and to the vagaries of misguided and overzealous officers, to the systematic contempt of public opinion by Government and to the overbearing manners of a class of Europeans who, intoxicated with the pride of race, look down upon Indians as a subject race. While not mincing matters in probing the malady to its very root, Mr. Pal was no less convinced of the necessity of restoring both communities, Indian and Anglo-Indian, to cordial relations between them. He is a practical politician who knows the irreducible factors to be reckoned with and not one of the day dreamers who persuade themselves that some unpleasant but inevitable fact exists not because they do not wish it to be so."

17. Referring to the prosecutions for sedition in India, the Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 16th August, remarks that violent preachings and incitements have come to an end now, but the danger of the situation was much exaggerated by selfish persons who wanted to create a panic among the less courageous Anglo-Indian officials. The charge of sedition was enough to ensure a prosecution for Mr. Tilak. But wicked and ill-disposed persons have created imaginary bomb manufacturers in Bombay also, simply to add to the rage of the rulers.

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 16th August 1908.

Anarchism and its origin.

Now to consider the other side of the picture. The disappointment of Indians was increasing every day. Deferred hope makes the heart sick; and so it was with India. It was in this state of the public feelings that the partition of Bengal was thrust upon India. Strong agitation on the part of the Bengalis was followed by Swadeshi and boycott and to crown all there appeared the anarchist with his bomb on the scene. What next? We do not know. This, however, is certain that if the partition is modified, there will be no more noise in Bengal.

18. Referring to the appeals made by Khudi Ram Bose in the different courts and ultimately to the Viceroy, the Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 16th August, remarks that cowards who fear death cannot be called " martyrs ". The truth is, says the editor, the Indian anarchist is not made of the same stuff as his European confrère. But, if afraid of death, why does he commit such rash acts?

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 16th August 1908.

The Indian and European anarchist.

19. The Saddharam Pracharák (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 19th August referring to the sentence passed in the Tilak case, remarks that in spite of all difference of opinion in political matters, every section of the Indian people sympathises with Mr. Tilak in his present misfortune.

SADDHARAM PRACHARAK, 19th August 1908.

Traitors among Indians.

Whatever his adversaries may say to the contrary it is pretty certain, says the editor, that Mr. Tilak was in no way connected with the Bombay riots. Those that take advantage of such circumstances and further their own ends by bringing about the ruin of a particular man, are surely great enemies of society.

The Panjabee and the Hindustan of Lahore, continues the editor, are living examples of how political opinions are influenced by considerations of expediency. As long as these papers thought it safe and beneficial to their interests, they continued to advocate the principle of independence and hatred of the foreigners. But no sooner did they find themselves to be the object of official displeasure than they changed their front and adopted different tactics.

The Panjabee severed its connection with L. Hardayal who was considered to be a dangerous agitator and even managed to send him off to Europe. And the Hindustan does not hesitate to publish articles of loyalty side by side with those advocating freedom and hatred of everything foreign. Lord Minto merely threatened to deport, but the proprietors of the Panjabee have really put this idea into effect. Are not such persons the real enemies of the country?

20. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 24th August, referring to the introduction of constitutional Government in Turkey, remarks that now the Nationalists of India cannot be blamed if they demand reforms in the administration of India, especially as the Liberal party is at the helm of the ship of State. The often-quoted argument that the people of Europe only are fit for self-government cannot hold good any longer, in the face of what is taking place in Turkey and other Asiatic countries.

OUDH AKHBAR, 24th August 1908.

The Turkish constitution and its effect on India.

The introduction of parliamentary government is easier in a peaceful, well-governed country like India than in Turkey where chaos reigns supreme. The people of India do not hanker after a revolution or a sudden change in the government; they simply want the gradual recognition of their rights and privileges. The Musalmans of India, too, says the editor, may take a hint from their co-religionists in Turkey, whose patriotism did not deter them from throwing in their lot with the followers of other religions, against the advice of the spiritual head of their own religion.

21. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 26th August, notes with regret that the Musalmans are keeping aloof from all political movements and look upon the Swadeshi movement with distrust, although it is meant for their own good. The editor thinks that if the

The Musalmans.

Musalmans persist in their present policy, they will become, in course of time, so much worn out by mutual dissensions and internecine quarrels, that at last they will be incapable of making any progress.

OUDH AKHBAR, 24th August 1908.

Mr. B. C. Pal's American tour.

22. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 24th August, referring to the proposed American tour of Mr. B. C. Pal, remarks that the Americans can render very little help to Indians; they will simply listen to their grievances, and may perhaps think that the people of India are dissatisfied with their English rulers. The remedy lies in the hands of the English themselves, but they cannot be impressed as long as a strong and united public opinion in India does not exist and mutual dissensions are not settled.

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 16th August 1908.

Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan.

23. Referring to Al Bashir's statement regarding Fazl-ul Hassan's action in preventing Hoti Lal from throwing a bomb at His Excellency the Viceroy, the Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 16th August, remarks that if the statement is true, Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan is much to be blamed, inasmuch as he did not bring the intention of Hoti Lal Varma to the notice of the authorities.

For his own part, the editor hesitates to believe the rumour.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 19th August 1908.

Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan.

24. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 19th August, referring to Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan and his laudable action in preventing Hoti Lal Varma from throwing a bomb upon His Excellency the Viceroy in Aligarh, says that it is proposed to send a memorial to the Local Government with a view to securing pardon for Saiyid Fazl-ul Hassan.

HINDUSTANI, 19th August 1908.

The Urdu-i-Mualla case.

25. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 19th August, referring to a statement in Al Bashir (Etawah), to the effect that it was F. H. Hasrat Mohani who prevented Hoti Lal Varma from throwing a bomb at His Excellency the Viceroy during his visit to Aligarh, remarks that this is improbable as Hoti Lal landed in India towards the middle of April while the Viceroy visited Aligarh in the beginning of the month: besides, it is impossible that Hoti Lal should have dared to throw a bomb in Aligarh before the anarchist organization was complete in Calcutta. The editor says that this rumour has been set afloat to make the charges against Hasrat Mohani of a graver character.

TAFRIH, 21st August 1908.

The Urdu-i-Mualla case.

26. The Tafrih (Lucknow), of the 21st August, referring to a statement in Al Bashir (Etawah), that F. H. Hasrat Mohani, the editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla, prevented Hoti Lal from throwing a bomb at His Excellency during his visit to the Aligarh College, remarks that if the editor of Al Bashir knew of Hoti Lal's intention beforehand, he ought to have informed the Government. His failing to do so makes him guilty of an offence.

JEDD-O-JEHAD, 24th August 1908.

The Urdu-i-Mualla case.

27. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 24th August, referring to a statement in Al Bashir (Etawah), that it was F. H. Hasrat Mohani, the editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla, who prevented Hoti Lal Varma from throwing a bomb at His Excellency the Viceroy during his visit to Aligarh, remarks that if the news be true, Hasrat Mohani deserves commisseration from the Government and gratitude from the Musalman community for saving them from suspicion.

AL BASHIR, 25th August 1908.

The Urdu-i-Mualla case.

28. The editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), publishes, in the issue of the 25th August, a rejoinder to an article on the Urdu-i-Mualla case in the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 19th August, contradicting the statement in Al Bashir that F. H. Hasrat Mohani, the editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla, prevented Hoti Lal Varma from throwing a bomb at the Viceroy at Aligarh, and remarks that His Excellency did not visit Aligarh in the beginning of April but on the 22nd of that month, and the Hindustani itself has acknowledged that Hoti Lal reached India towards the middle of the month, so it is just probable that he was present at Aligarh during the visit. As to the event being planned to take place prior to the bomb outrages in Bengal, the editor remarks "our fellow countrymen (the Hindus) selected Aligarh for the murder of Lord Minto in order to throw the blame on the Musalmans." In the end he says that if the news is true, the whole Musalman community should be grateful to Hasrat Mohani.

In a subsequent issue, while referring to a proposal to present a memorial to Government on behalf of Hasrat Mohani and the editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), he remarks that this can be done only in case they repent of what they have done.

Khudi Ram Bose.

SWARAJYA, 15th August 1908.

29. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 15th August, contains the following obituary notice of Khudi Ram Bose :—

" 'We acknowledged that you were the bravest among ten thousand, when you placed your throat under the dagger.' Srijut Khudi Ram Bose, the true and worthy son of India, a conscientious performer of his duties and the truest follower of the Bhagwat Gita, has at last fallen a martyr to (the cause of) India. The words which he uttered a few moments before his death disclose the secret of his thoughts. He said to his counsel and patron : 'I will die like true Indian Rajputs who think it an honour to die on the field of battle.'

And the lion (K. R. Bose) has actually done what he said, i.e. when he was brought handcuffed to the gallows, there was a halo of light round his face, he was looking very cheerful and happy and his smiles made others weep, but he stood calm and serene till he met his doom.

Srijut Khudi Ram Bose's action may be deemed criminal, but no one can deny that in him was seen the perfection of self-sacrifice. Besides being acquainted with the secrets of the true teaching of the Gita, he understood perfectly the question of the performance of duty, and this was the reason why Sri Krishna's holy teaching was apparent from every word he uttered.

The scene at the gallows lasted only for a moment, for our martyr embraced death in a way that even the spiteful sky was forced to say :—

'That you should mount the scaffold, and lose your life! did I rear you up for this day?' The merciless hangmen had scarcely completed their work when mother Bharat held her true and worthy son to her bare breast and after a short time his corpse was borne away by his brethren and was deposited (lit.) in the burning place according to (the rites of) the Hindu religion."

Mr. Tilak.

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 16th August 1908.

30. Referring to the agitation in England for Mr. Tilak's release, the Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 16th August, remarks that the movement is quite premature and misguided.

The editor suggests the sending in of a memorial to His Majesty the King-Emperor signed by the representatives of the different sects in India. He holds that the crude and imprudent enthusiasm of his followers is responsible for all that has befallen Mr. Tilak.

The proposed Tilak Ashram.

ARYA MITRA, 24th August 1908.

31. The Árya Mitra (Agra), of the 24th August, referring to the proposal of Sufi Amba Prasad regarding the establishment of an Ashram for the political education of Indians, remarks that such an institution would be of doubtful utility, for true progress is possible only through religious education.

Success of the boycott movement.

MOHINI, 18th August 1908.

32. The Mohini (Kannauj), of the 18th August, after quoting a long comparative statement showing the import of goods in the years 1904, 1905, 1906, and 1907, comes to the conclusion that the boycott movement has been eminently successful. The editor, remarks that the movement is not actuated by a desire to harm others. It is simply the result of a desire to bring about the economic regeneration of India. Self-preservation is at the bottom of this movement, and if in preserving themselves, Indians harm others, the fault does not lie at their door but at the door of those who have come in the way of their healthy growth and development.

Racial hatred.

SWARAJYA, 15th August 1908.

33. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 15th August, referring to an article in the East Bengal and Assam Era, which is calculated to incite hatred between Europeans and Indians, remarks :—

" Our justice-loving Government has not as yet taken any notice of the article. Will an Indian newspaper be treated in the same way if it publishes a reply to this article even if it is couched in moderate language? Is the inciting of racial hatred and the urging of general massacres another question?"

SWARAJYA, 15th August 1908.

Ode.

34. The editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), contributes the following political ode to the issue of the 15th August:—

"Indians, you have lost your vitality, although you are nominally alive,
You can be safely called the dwellers in Heaven.
Look to yourselves, and take care of your bodies and souls.
You are covered with scars (left by sores), O! dwellers of the land of flowers and pan (betel-leaf).
Oh! how the Feringhees are troubling us; be witnesses (of this) O! denizens of the sky.
You are nearing the place of your destination, why do you not reach it in a body?
Why have you slackened your pace (lit. why have your feet become rivetted to the ground)?
Why do you not move on any longer, although you possess hands and feet?
Why does silence reign supreme among you, although you are endowed with tongues?
What are imprisonment and jails and what are gallows and the cross?
You may test us in a hundred ways, O! ordeal-imposers.
How long have you been pressed down by an incubus of sorrows?
How have you managed to survive, O! hard-lifed people?
You have no industries, and your arts are now extinct,
What is now your stock-in-trade, O! you bankrupts?
Give expression only to what you feel; why are you poisoning (others) O! sweet-tongued men?
The hunter [the British Government (?)] is the enemy of (our) life, and the flower-picker (the exploiter) is our rival.
In what atmosphere are you flying, O! people of the nest?
(What is your present condition, O! people of India?)

35. The Árya Mitra (Agra), of the 24th August, says that Babu Ram Dass, B.A., the new editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), has also been arrested and sent to Cawnpore where he will be charged very likely with exciting race hatred and with bringing the Government into contempt. These frequent prosecutions, remarks the editor, are incompatible with the doctrine of peace which the Lieutenant Governor is preaching in our provinces these days.

SWARAJYA, 15th August 1908.

Khudi Ram Bose's appeal to the King-Emperor.

36. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 15th August, referring to the prevention of Khudi Ram Bose from appealing to the King-Emperor, remarks:—

"Would there had been any one to remonstrate with them [officials (?)]. If the superintendent of a jail can trample law under his feet, then what is the use of making such laws? 'Dear Khudi Ram Bose, instead of seeking mercy from tyrants you should have prayed to God to give you strength and fortitude to undergo the ordeal cheerfully and gloriously, for you are a believer in the Bhagwat Gita, and your faith teaches that death is only an illusion. May God give you strength to succeed in your holy mission in your next life.'"

37. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 20th August, referring to the acquittal of the accused in the Allahabad murder case by the High Court, remarks :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 20th August 1908.

The Allahabad murder case.

"It is time that Mr. Rustomji took some rest, for he is undoubtedly overworked. There have of late been an unusually large number of murder cases before him and there are a number of them still awaiting trial, and as a matter of fact Mr. Rustomji has had to work at very high pressure for some time past, and it is but fair and just that he should be relieved for a time. There can be no question that the best and most capable officer cannot bear the strain of excessive work for an indefinite length of time, and it is no reflection upon him if the quality of his work tends to deteriorate."

38. Under the heading "Some Allahabad Criminal Cases", a correspondent writing to the Citizen (Allahabad), of the 23rd August, with reference to Babu Badri Prasad's case, in which three out of the four accused, whom Mr. Rustomji, Sessions Judge of Allahabad, convicted of murder and sentenced to death, have been let off by the High Court, observes that the High Court's decision in this as well as in the other two cases, shows how erroneous were the views of Mr. Rustomji in those three cases and how he was overruled three times within seventeen days. These cases, the writer says, show Mr. Rustomji's tendency to convict accused persons upon shaky, flimsey, and futile evidence. As all three cases are of public interest, and all come from the same district, the writer asks the editor to include his remarks in his journal without mentioning his (the writer's) name. CITIZEN, 23rd August 1908.

The Allahabad murder cases.

The other two cases referred to are :—

(1) King-Emperor versus Mahadeo Teli of village Makhowpur, thana Pura Mufti, district Allahabad, who was convicted by Mr. Rustomji, Sessions Judge of Allahabad, under section 302, Indian Penal Code, on the 11th August 1908 and sentenced to death. The accused was acquitted by the High Court on appeal.

(2) King-Emperor versus Jagannath in which the Sessions Judge disagreeing with the unanimous verdict of "Not Guilty" as regards the accused, referred the case to the High Court under section 307, Criminal Procedure Code, intimating that in his opinion Jagannath's guilt was clearly established and rendered him liable to conviction under section 457, Indian Penal Code, but the Honourable Judges of the High Court, after carefully considering the whole matter and hearing all that the Government Advocate had to say, accepted the verdict of the jury and acquitted the man of the offences with which he had been charged.

39. The Cawnpore Gazette, of the 18th August, has the following :— CAWNPORE GAZETTE, 18th August 1908.

Uneducated persons as magistrates.

"If an uneducated person renders a public service, he should not be compensated by being appointed an honorary magistrate or a civil judge, but should be granted land or should be given a title. To discharge the duties of an honorary magistrate or a civil judge, a man must be educated and should have some knowledge of law."

40. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 27th August, has the following :— ADVOCATE, 27th August 1908.

Hindu versus Christian evidence.

"Tinnevelly is the birthplace of new and queer, no less mischievous, judicial dicta. Special Sessions Judge, Pinhey, now shedding light on the Madras High Court Bench—we shall not with the man in the street say, by way of recognition of his services to the executive government—looked upon light punishment for an offence which is more a matter of opinion as misplaced leniency and went to the length of sentencing Chidambaram Pillay to transportation for life twice. Now comes another Daniel to judgement in the person of Mr. Spencer, the permanent Sessions Judge, who has gone one step further and made a strange discovery. We are familiar with the fact that magistrates generally and Judges occasionally differentiate between prosecution and defence witnesses, taking the former as the only truth-tellers. In Eastern Bengal, we were not unoften treated to the scene where Muhammadan evidence has more weight with judicial officers. Judge Spencer has now found out a new distinction between Hindus and Christians. In the Tinnevelly riot case, addressing the assessors, he remarked 'that the oath which the Christian witnesses took was a matter of greater sanctity to them than that simple affirmation was to Hindu witnesses.' And yet he lamented the 'absence of respectable persons' as witnesses, who, he said, 'were now reaping the consequences by paying a punitive tax.' Surely as the Rais and Raiyat very pithily puts it, 'Those who do not kiss the Bible, must kiss the rod.' Thus is the ghost of unrest being laid by the officers of the Government."

HINDUSTANI, 26th August 1908.

Tahsil officials.

41. A correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 26th August, complains that the petty officials in tahsils, such as teachers, sub-registrars and hospital assistants, are grossly oppressed by Tahsildars, and that if they do not submit to their high-handedness, they are complained of and punished by the heads of their departments. He requests the Government to inquire into the matter.

The Swarajya and the police.

42. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 15th August, has the following :—

"From the time the Government has extended its kind patronage to us the police have found a new source of amusement. We have received complaints from different places in these provinces, that the police are dissuading people from buying the Swarájya and have even recourse to force to prevent the sale of the paper. We cannot understand how such unlimited authority has been delegated to the police and would like to know if there is any limit to their mischievous proceedings."

The Police.

43. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 21st August, referring to the high-handed proceedings of the police in connection with the Rawalpindi cases, remarks that the present discontent owes its origin to a large extent to the oppressive acts of the police. The Government should not hesitate, therefore, to punish such unscrupulous members of the force as bring discredit upon it. We can say, says the editor, without any fear of contradiction, that the prestige of the Government will be much enhanced if only it keeps a sharp eye upon the doings of the police. Punish offenders by all means; but, prey! see that the innocent do not get entangled into the meshes of the police.

45. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), in its combined issue of the 16th and 24th August, referring to the proposed improvement of Allahabad, Lucknow and Cawnpore, complains that the claims of Benares have been entirely ignored in this connection, although its importance is not less than that of any of these cities, not to mention the fact of its being frequented by thousands of pilgrims and European visitors. The roads in the city are in a sadly deplorable condition, and require a good deal of improvement.

ZAMANA, July 1908.

English education.

46. Pandit Madho Ram, B.A., discusses in the Zamana (Cawnpore), for July, the comparative merits and drawbacks of the introduction of English as the medium of instruction in India. While admitting that it has to some extent denationalized the people by making them indifferent to their own vernaculars and by retarding their progress, he opposes the idea prevailing in certain quarters that English education has been an unmixed evil and the sooner an end is put to it the better. He points out that as the result of the study of Western literature and science—

(1) Superstition has been dispelled and people now have healthier and more wholesome religious opinions.
(2) An end has been put to early marriages, which lead to an ever recurring increase in the number of widows.
(3) People do not any longer waste their earnings in marriages, and have learnt how to make money.
(4) Patriotism was unknown but now a man in Madras feels for people in the Punjab.
(5) People now understand what philanthrophy really means; they spend their money in endowing schools and colleges, instead of in pampering beggars.
(6) English serves as a medium of intercourse between the different people, and hence the National Congress has become practical.
(7) That the vernacular languages of the country have been developed and brought within the reach of everyone.

The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 25th August, referring to the recent circular of the Educational department restricting the number of students in different classes in schools, remarks that it will have very disastrous effects on education and that it is the first fruits of Lord Curzon's educational policy.

"The hearty thanks of the public are due to the Department of Public Instruction, and especially to the Inspector of Schools, Lucknow division, for promptly redressing a public grievance. Convinced of the genuineness of the guardian's desire to have freedom in choosing a course for their sons in the High School section, arrangements are being made for teaching both courses, the Matriculation and School-Leaving Certificate, in both the Jubilee High School, Lucknow, and Sitapur High School. Students will be at perfect liberty to choose whichever course they may find beneficial to themselves. There will be no pressure on any boy to join a class for which he or his guardians feel no inclination."

ADVOCATE, 27th August 1908.

The Agra College.

50. Under the heading "Is There a Remedy ?" a correspondent writes to the Agra Magazine, for June (received in August), in continuation of his letter published in the issue of May last, about the complaints and grievances of the Agra College students. In this letter he tries to show how a better state of things can be brought about and how the difficulties can be tided over. The first remedy that he proposes is to change the present incompetent and unsympathetic staff, on account of which the Agra College just at the moment enjoys a unique but unenviable reputation. He says that some of the professors are deficient in intellect, some in morals, and all in the higher virtue called sympathy which attracts man to man and brings about the union of hearts. They not only do not know their subjects and cannot satisfy their students, but they also cannot command respect nor inspire confidence, and that is why the College is getting unpopular day by day and losing the respect of the public. In the opinion of the writer, an unpopular principal or an incompetent professor is a public scandal, a standing disgrace to the educational institution and has therefere no right to be on the staff. He says that the success of students in the University Examinations is not the right criterion to judge the ability and competence of professors by. A black man can of course be easily removed with a stroke of pen, but not so easily can "an undesirable white man" be got rid off, as the latter is backed up all round. Every European official, University Inspector, ruler of a

AGRA MAGAZINE, June 1908.

Province and even an University Examiner is inclined to show some consideration for him if he is in danger. The second remedy is the suppression of the functions of the principal of the college and the secretary of the board of trustees.

This unholy combination, like the anomalous combination of the executive and judicial powers, in one and the same officer of the Government, he remarks, is responsible for "a multitude of sins", and is a crying scandal. He is strongly of opinion that one of the reasons why the affairs of the Agra College are going from bad to worse is this unhappy combination, and he feels convinced that the College can never prosper unless and until the principal and the secretary are two distinct individuals.

He then asks for the appointment of some new trustees who will give a helping hand in the great work of building up the nation, as the present trustees of the College, with a few honourable exceptions, are incapable of independent action. He says 'we want men of steady independence, of unbending soul, men who know their duty, love their country, uphold the right cause, and have the courage of their convictions. We want men who neither fear official frowns nor court official favour. Such men alone can help us in our need, but never a weak-kneed would-be Raja or a flattering would-be Rai Bahadur.'

INDIAN PEOPLE, 23rd August 1908.

Law students in Allahabad.

51. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 23rd August, points out that one of the results of the establishment of the University School of Law and the consequent centralization of the teaching of law in Allahabad has been a rush of students, but unfortunately no adequate arrangements have been made for the housing of law students at Allahabad. The official and non-official boarding-houses will not, as a matter of convenience or policy, be available for law students, as law is considered a step-sister to politics, and the Indian lawyer is an eye sore to the administration. The editor says that it is very undesirable that students should live in private houses where they are forced to keep company with all sorts of men and are without any kind of supervision or care. But as nothing has been done, the law students must help themselves and the public must interest themselves in this question of paramount importance. A law student requires a good library, a good teacher to guide him as to what to read profitably, and an atmosphere and surroundings peculiar to himself. Cannot vakils and barristers of some standing and experience, he asks, open private boarding-houses for law students, where a good library, proper supervision, and healthy food and teaching might be obtained, with profit both to the students and the manager? He believes that such an experiment, if undertaken, is bound to be appreciated and must be successful.

The Swadeshi movement.

52. A correspondent of the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 21st August, referring to the rapid spread of the Swadeshi movement, remarks that if the passion for indigenous goods continues for a few years, the Swadeshi movement will become a success. But in view of the obstacles the movement has encountered, and is still likely to encounter, the editor exhorts his countrymen to go on working for the cause heedless of all opposing forces. It is only by such stern application to duty that the success of the movement can be secured.

The writer further reminds his countrymen of their glorious past and says that if they keep that perpetually before their minds' eye, they will draw a wonderful inspiration from it which will ultimately lead them to success.

HINDOSTHAN, 23rd August 1908.

The Swadeshi Steam Navigation Companies.

53. The Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 23rd August, referring to the prosperous days of "Bharat Varsh," remarks that the ship building industry was not unknown in India in former times. But the devastating influence of time has done its work and now the Indian sailor is satisfied with his rough and crude boat.

We are glad, however, to hear, says the editor, that in the Madras Presidency a splendid capital has been invested in the Swadeshi Steam Navigation Company, and we appeal to our countrymen in other provinces to follow the example of Madras if they are sincere in their desire to see prosperity restored to India once more.

ADVOCATE, 27th August 1908.

Our Cotton Industry—Advance Swadeshi.

54. The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 27th August, says "the history of the Indian Cotton Mill industry for the last three years reveals the wonderful hold the Swadeshi movement has got on the country. What was only in a slowly, very slowly, smoky stage during the period previous to 1905, flared up into bright flames in the latter half of the year, has since continued to grow as much in depth as in width and promises to turn into a regular conflagration. At the first flash of the red light, many people, including the mill-owners, took it for a fire made of straw whose fuel supply would soon be exhausted, leaving the country in greater darkness. It was bright, no doubt, but would surely be short-lived. So opined they. But the shrugging of shoulders by those who comforted themselves as more knowing, more capable of looking into and reading the future, came to naught. Thank God, the Swadeshi movement has outlived the pessimism of the calculating, making them more pessimistic, shot far ahead of even the most optimistic, making them take heart and go on with the service of the country with redoubled energy and full hope."

He further observes "considering the vastness of the Indian market, the few mills that we have got in the country can hardly clothe the people even for a half-year, that is, meet the first demand of one piece of cloth per head, if the Swadeshi vow were to be taken by even ten per cent. of the people. But as the movement is surely gaining ground and increasing in volume, greater and greater will be the demand for Indian-made cloth. In order to meet this growing demand, we must have a very large addition to the productive capacity of our mills. The mill-owners have realized the fact in no time as well as the general public. So one notices with pleasure the extension and growth of weaving, which has taken a decided step forward, and this addition along with the opening of new mills makes the success of the movement doubly sure."

In conclusion, he remarks "even a cursory glance at the output of factories and workshops of other articles of everyday use no less convinces one of the all-round desire of the people to improve their own industries. That every year we find an addition to the existing mills, factories and workshops is a sure indication on the one hand of the steady growth of the movement and is on the other a very practical reply to those before whose eyes walk in night as in day strange hobgoblins of unrest and anarchy. When year after year new companies are coming into existence, new capital—indigenous capital—is more and more invested, it is pretty clear that the Indian people at least, particularly the owners of money who would be the last to throw away their hard-earned or carefully guarded wealth, do not believe in any such nonsense as sedition running rampant or anarchism burrowing under the solid foundations of British rule in India. The very development of the Swadeshi movement should be an eye-opener to those among the officials who seem to have lost or are on the point of losing their balance of mind and act as a pricker to the day-dreams of certain interested Anglo-Indians who refuse to be convinced. Surely it is impossible to awake the man who sleeps awake."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 23rd August 1908.

Investment of Indian wealth.

55. Referring to Sir E. Cable's recommendations for the appointment of a committee of inquiry composed of European and Indian financiers to ascertain to what extent Indians can be induced to invest their savings in Indian railways, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 23rd August, observes 'from the point of view of the man in the street it seems to us that the most important reason for this state of affairs is that the management of such railways is directed by a board in London. If it is desirable to have Indian wealth attracted towards railways, surely it is not impossible to have boards of management in India. Certainly, India is not quite so devoid of men, European and Indian, of such business capacities as are able to manage the affairs of railways. Another reason, and to which our esteemed contemporary, the Bengalee, draws attention, for the apathy of the Indian capitalist towards railways is to be found in the fact that Indians are practically debarred from the higher appointments in railways, whether owned or managed by the State or private companies. This practical ostracism of the Indians from all offices of responsibility on railways is really disgraceful and we may take the liberty of suggesting that instead of such a committee of inquiry as Sir E. Cable suggests we might have a committee to go into the question as to how far Indians are capable of occupying high and responsible offices in railways.'

MASHRIQ, 25th August 1908.

The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 25th August, referring to the same subject, advises the Government to take steps to induce Indians to invest their savings in Indian railways.

The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 15th August, contains an article in which the writer says that he saw Shanti Narayana, the late editor of the Swarájya, in a dream and he noticed that he had become very thin and emaciated owing to the insufficient and unpalatable food supplied to him in the jail and the hard manual labour demanded of him. Narayana said that he was content with his lot, and his only source of anxiety was the Swarájya, as he was afraid that its enemies might destroy it altogether or convert it to their own slavish views. After narrating his dream, the writer exhorts all persons interested in the paper to try to push on its sale till it reaches 10,000 copies.

MUSAFIR, 23rd August 1908.

59. The editor of the Musáfir (Agra), of the 23rd August, in an appeal to the Government, complains that since politics have come to the forefront in India, the Árya Samaj has been subjected to all kinds of calumny and vituperation by its enemies, and as a result, the officials now think it a political body. The Árya Samajists of this province, he says, are in the "throes of death," though being persecuted by their opponents. These persecutions have been redoubled since the inauguration of the Suddhi Sabha for the conversion of Musalmans to the Árya faith and the starting of a fund to maintain itinerant preachers. The police officers in most places are Musalmans and wherever there is a religious lecture by a member of the Samaj, they at once appear on the scene. At a meeting attended by a posse of constables armed with regulation lathis, the audience gets considerably thinned in a short time. The Árya Samaj has been carrying on its religious work without obstruction for the last thirty years, and it would be a matter of great injustice if it is now put under a ban.

The Arya Samaj.

The editor, on behalf of the Árya Samajists, prays that the police should be forbidden to take notes of Árya Samaj lectures, and if they do so, there should be two literate officials, one a Hindu and the other a Musalman. He further prays that in places where the Tahsildar is a Musalman, the Sub-Inspector should be a Hindu, and vice versa, otherwise the Árya Samaj will be in a very precarious condition.

In a subsequent note, he complains that the police do not take notes of religious lectures delivered by Christian and Musalman religious preachers, but confine their attention to those of the Arya Samaj only. If this state of things continues he is afraid that the Hindus will become still more discontented.

JAIN GAZETTE, 24th August 1908.

The Parasnath Hill.

60. The Jain Gazette (Deoband, Saharanpur), of the 24th August, publishes a poem in which the writer expresses his dissatisfaction at the decision of the Government regarding the erection of bungalows on the Parasnath Hill and advises his co-religionists to adopt Swadesi which, he says, is a sure remedy for the many evils from which India is suffering just now.

SWARAJYA, 15th August 1908.

A tiger in Benares.

61. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 15th August, complains that the Collector of Benares ordered the arrest of an Ahir who with great courage killed a tiger, that had come into the city, and remarks "had the man been a European he would not have been sent to jail but rewarded and honoured."

SWARAJYA, 15th August 1908.

Mr. Tilak and the Maharaja of Baroda.

62. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 15th August, has the following :—

"When Srijut Tilak Maharaj passed through the territories of the Maharaja of Baroda, the patriotic Maharaja went barefoot to the station to see him, and after making an obeisance from a distance went back. It is rumoured that he told the sergeant, in whose custody Mr. Tilak was travelling, that the Government had acted very foolishly in convicting such a 'god.' The sergeant telegraphed this fact to the Government."

His Honour's speech.

1. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 30th August, comments on His Honour's speeches at Allahabad and other places with satisfaction and remarks that he was courteous in his speeches and hit on the right point without offending any one. The editor thinks that the Government is perfectly justified in summarily punishing those who want to undermine it and that if the English were to leave India, the country would be invaded by the neighouring turbulent Musalman tribes, and would shortly become a scene of bloodshed and rapine. He notes that the public did not show any interest in hunting down conspirators or bringing their literature to the notice of the Government.

CITIZEN, 30th August 1908.

Hoti Lal Varma.

2. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 30th August, has the following :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 30th August 1908.

"At the trial of the second batch of conspirators, a letter was produced by the prosecution written by Hoti Lal Varma to one A. C. Chakravarti, which to a certain extent connects Hoti Lal with the Bengal anarchists. The letter is dated from the Amrita Bazar Patrika office and is as follows :—

'Dear Chakravarti,—Please manage my boarding and lodging. There is a very important letter waiting for you. I want a place very soon. I went to see you at about 10-30 a.m., but could not see you. Please come as soon as possible so that I may tell you everything.

Amrita Bazar Patrika Office. Yours sincerely,
H. L. Varma.'

Of course the language of the letter is guarded, but that alone is sufficient to arouse suspicion. This letter was found in the house of Bijoy Bhattacharya, who was arrested and is being tried. A book was also found at the same place containing formulæ for manufacturing bombs. Bijoy said this book belonged to Hoti Lal and had been left with him. Chandra Kumar Chakravarti, to whom the letter was addressed, is the headmaster of Contai school. There is a warrant out for his arrest. What we should like to inquire is whether Sir John Hewett's theory is to be applied to the Amrita Bazar Patrika office and whether it is to be searched. The Calcutta police have not searched it, though the letter has been in their possession for some time. We hope the justice of our contention that the mere fact that Hoti Lal was staying somewhere or was in communication with some does not prove that those persons were in league with him, will be recognized. He could not possibly have told the Amrita Bazar Patrika people that he was an anarchist or a bombmaker."

The Tilak Ashram.

3. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 22nd August, publishes the following appeal :—

SWARAJYA, 22nd August 1908.

"Is Tilak Maharaj, the national martyr and the prophet of (our) national and political liberty, no more amongst us? Shall (the quality of) our work deteriorate if no one steps into the place left vacant by him? When Guru Gobind was on the point of death, the Sikhs asked 'Maharaj, who will be our guru now?' 'The Granth is your guru,' he replied, 'you do not need a human guru any longer.' This clearly implies that the guru imparted (to his disciples) all that he had to teach and it remained for them to follow his precepts carefully, enthusiastically and firmly. In the same way, Tilak Maharaj has bequeathed to us his teaching. He has clearly and explicitly told us what we should do now. There have been very few religious leaders whose work has been accomplished during their lifetime, and there have been very few reformers and patriots who have tasted the fruits of their labours (during their lifetime). Men plant trees and their children eat the fruit. Those who build houses and forts, simply lay their foundations; it is for their descendants to complete them. Christ fell a martyr to the tyranny of a king at a time when he could not be spared by his country and his people, and no one sympathised with him. A crown of thorns was put on his head, people abused and ridiculed him and spat upon him, but does not a third of the people of the earth now regard him as their Saviour? Shankracharya left this world while a comparatively young man, but is there a Hindu living who does not regard him as his national and religious leader? Did his mission remain unsuccessful after his death for want of another Shankracharya? Swami Dayanand was poisoned by his enemies while he had still a good deal of work before him. Is the Arya Samaj defunct (in consequence of his premature death)? In the same way, if our political guide has been taken away from us (by force) shall his mission remain unaccomplished? It is impossible that this should be the case. God himself desires our salvation. God has demanded of us a heavy sacrifice and we have made it. God demanded a heavy sacrifice from Abraham in order to test him, and he consented to put his beloved son, Isaac, to the sword, but God was satisfied that his servant when weighed was not found wanting. Our sacrifice is now over and we have secured the good will of God. Tilak Maharaj was fifty-three years old. He was a man just as we are, and one day or another he would have departed from amongst us. Would you have been gratified if your dearly-beloved leader and guide had died in his bed of fever or of some other disease instead of being parted from you, fighting for your salvation to the last moment with a drawn sword in his hand? That lion-hearted old teacher has proved to you that young men can do much more work. Come, let us put into practice his teaching (lit. legacy). Let us show him, while he is in prison, that we are no unworthy followers of his and that notwithstanding the active opposition of the whole world, we will not allow his name to be forgotten, and ten to one we will accomplish his mission in his own lifetime.

Tilak Maharaj has completed his teaching, has indicated to us a direct (royal) road and has illumined (the country) with his precious thoughts; so there is nothing to prevent our fearlessly following the path indicated by him.

But this teaching cannot survive long unless we produce young men to disseminate it. Such martyrs can be produced only by a great effort. So Sardar Ajit Singh and myself have hit upon the idea of founding a lasting memorial to Tilak Maharaj, which will be of great use to our country and will keep the memory of our leader fresh and green as long as the Indian nation exists and will engrave it (lit.) on our hearts.

The idea is to establish an Ashram (a home of service) at a place to be selected by a majority of votes with an up-to-date library containing books dealing with the politics and history of all nations and of India in particular. It will be free to all. For young men who pursue political and economic studies, clothing and ordinary food will be provided, if they are in poor circumstances, so that they may carry on their studies without any anxiety. In fact, it will be a political school or University, where great men will teach gratis. A statue of Tilak Maharaj will be put up in the Ashram and his name will be inscribed beneath it.

Political education has as yet been carried on in a very irregular and desultory manner. A lecture is delivered, a (newspaper) article is written, or a pamphlet is published. But the time has come for us to take stock of our ways and means, to collect our scattered energies, and then to inaugurate a regular system of (political) education, in the diffusion of which, Tilak Maharaj has been separated from us.

It is our duty, now, to place on a proper and permanent footing this political teaching, in which Tilak Maharaj spent his whole life; to push on the work he carried out so ably as a journalist throughout his life, by turning out able journalists from the Tilak Ashram; to produce in the Ashram brilliant orators who will proclaim his opinions throughout the country; to decorate the walls of the Ashram with paintings from the eventful life of Tilak Maharaj; and in fact to bring together everything that is calculated to have a soothing effect on his soul, so that he may see that the work he began is progressing by leaps and bounds.

People wishing to contribute to this philanthrophic scheme and desiring to demonstrate their love for their teacher may send their remittances by money orders or otherwise to me to the following address. Lists of such persons (if they wish their names to appear in print) will be published weekly in the newspapers and work will be commenced as soon as there is sufficient money to make a beginning. In any case, the amount of the sums collected will be published in the newspapers from week to week. Only the names of those will be published who do not object to their names appearing in print.

SUFI AMBA PRASAD,
Manager, the Tilak Ashram, Lahore."

4. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 1st September, referring to the appeals of Hasrat Mohani and Shanti Narayan to the Allahabad High Court, remarks that whatever may be the result of these appeals we request His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of our Provinces to take pity on the forlorn condition of these editors.

Hasrat Mohani and Shanti Narayan.

MASHRIQ, 1st September 1908.

Hasrat Mohani is a man of very little means, and owing to his imprisonment, the members of his family are now suffering every sort of privation, his wife and daughter being almost at the point of death.

The editor, in conclusion, takes exception to the order of the District Magistrate, Aligarh, regarding the forfeiture of Mohani's property, especially now when an appeal has been filed in the High Court, and the last word in the matter has not yet been said. Sir John Hewett's government, continues the editor, has been a blessing to us in more than one respect, and if following out his wise policy, he grants a pardon to these journalists, he will earn the gratitude of every section of the United Provinces public.

5. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 31st August, referring to the departure to England of Messrs. B. C. Pal, Khaparde and Lajpat Rai, remarks that they have left the country to ensure their personal safety. The editor thinks that they will be better able to carry on their propaganda from England by means of secret agents.

Departure of agitators.

JEDD-O-JEHAD, 31st August 1908

6. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 1st September, remarks that a century ago it was quite uncertain which nation would rule over the destinies of India. The Mahrattas, the Muhammadans, the French and the English—all were trying to gain the supremacy, but at last Britain came out of the struggle successful. And now we find that the people and the native princes of India are both equally anxious to render their homage to the crown of England. As for India—a country possessing such a variety of races—it was only in the fitness of things that a third nation should come and rule over her.

The British Government.

MASHRIQ, 1st September 1908.

The prosperity and happiness which Indians enjoy under the ægis of the British Government, needs no mention here. It would suffice to say that Indians of to-day are not what they were a century ago. The signs of progress are visible in every department of life and a bright future is within sight. What is wanted for the present is cordiality—cordiality on the part of the rulers and the ruled. We have a bit of advice for both. The former would do well to imitate the policy of Sir John Hewett and the Governor of Bombay, and the latter would be well advised if they reposed more confidence in their benign rulers. We hope Lord Morley's scheme will meet the situation.

7. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 3rd September, has the following under the marginally noted heading :—

The duty of the Government.

INDIAN PEOPLE. 3rd September 1908.

"Maintenance of order is not the only duty of the Government, though it may be the first. Mere maintenance of order does not ensure the permanence of any Government; constant progress and expansion do. The character of the people governed has as much to do with the continuance of a rule as the character of the rule itself. A standard that was sufficient ten years ago may prove inadequate now. A Government does not exist merely to redress grievances, nor does any Government really redress all grievances. Let alone a foreign Government like that of India, the British Government cannot redress all grievances in England itself. No, the wisest, if not the first, duty of the Government is to read the signs of the times aright and to anticipate the changes that are occurring. Even the Government of India does not spend all its energy in redressing legitimate grievances. The idea of a council of Notables is not a redress of any grievance. The Notables had no grievance—they never have any—and the Ables did not want a council of Notables. But in the judgement of the Government, the exigencies of the times demanded that a council of Notables should serve as a counterpoise to a conglomeration of Ables. But it has yet to be carried out. Prompt in maintaining order, that is, in prosecuting and punishing political offenders, inordinately slow in carrying out reforms or in changing the character of the administration, is that the duty of the Government? The very best well-wishers of the Government have warned it that a reform if it is too late is worse than useless, and we are afraid some of the projected reforms are already too late. If the impression gets abroad that while repression is real, reform is only shadowy, it will not help to relieve the situation at all. The Government need not lay stress on its first duty, for the whole country is witnessing how zealously it is being performed, but let it show the world that it is equally alive to its other duties."

BRAHMAN SARVASWA, January 1908.

Political agitation.

8. The Brahman Sarvaswa (Etawah), for January (received on the 27th August), says that British rule in India being established by Divine Providence, it is sacrilege to try to subvert it by bomb-throwing and other means of violence. Bomb-throwing can do little injury to the Government, but is sure to damage the people's cause, inasmuch as the ordered progress of the country will be hampered. What the people have to do is to see reforms introduced in the administration of the country by means of political agitation on constitutional lines. The Swadeshi movement and the boycott of foreign goods are within the bounds of constitutional agitation and should therefore be firmly adhered to as a means of bettering the economic condition of India.

YAD-I-BAIZA, April and July 1908.

Unity in India.

9. The Yad-i-Baiza (Sikandrabad, district Bulandshahr), publishes in its issues for April and July, an article on unity in India in which the writer points out that there are two obstacles to its consummation, the one being the difference in religion and the other the question of politics. The Musalman conquerors of India, unlike their co-religionists of Baghdad and Spain, had little taste for learning, and could not appreciate the beauties of the Vedic religion ; so they treated the Hindus just as ordinary savages of Central Asia. The Hindus, on the other hand, were the slaves of their inherited prejudices to such an extent that they could not take any lessons from Islam. Thus both communities remained ignorant of each other's religious beliefs and a mutual understanding could not be arrived at.

As for political differences, most of these can be laid at the doors of European writers on Indian history, who have painted Musalman rulers in the blackest colours and hence even the most cultured Hindus distrust Musalmans. Among the more recent causes of the split, the editor mentions the keeping aloof of the Musalmans from the Indian National Congress, which however he thinks perfectly justifiable on their part.

In conclusion he exhorts both the Hindus and Musalmans to sink their mutual differences and to work in harmony for the advancement of their country.

ALMORA AKHBAR, 31st July 1908.

The present situation in India.

10. The Almora Akhbár, of the 31st July (received on the 28th August), says that the unrest of which one hears so much on the platform and in the press is only confined to words and has had no far-reaching effect. There is no doubt that bomb-throwing has been resorted to in Bengal and that assaults have been made upon Europeans here and there. But that should neither disconcert the Government nor the people, for that is all the work of a few desperadoes. The editor says that it will in no way be productive of any good if, for the faults of a few scoundrels, the whole nation is to be suspected and distrusted . . . Government and the people are equally interested in the maintenance of peace, and the latter are firm in their devotion to the British Government. It is however to be regretted that sympathy between the rulers and the ruled has fast been declining for some time past.

The editor urges that the Government is not opposed to the Swadeshi movement and that the people can encourage it, provided they cause no breach of the public peace. He further says that it is to the credit of the officials that they are not led away by Anglo-Indian papers which calumniate Indians. But it is certain that the present press prosecutions would have been avoided had Government accorded similar treatment to Indian and Anglo-Indian papers in their excesses against each other. He concludes with the exhortation that Government and the people alike should follow a policy of forbearance and sympathy in the interests of peace and quiet in the country.

SWARAJYA, 22nd August 1908.

The policy of repression and its effect.

11. No doubt, says the editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), in the issue of the 22nd August, we have to suffer a good deal of hardship and calamity for the sake of national regeneration these days. Not only are our primary rights of free speech taken away from us, but we have had to sacrifice many precious lives in the service of the motherland also. Our dearest ambitions and our national aspirations have all been crushed under the iron heel of oppressive rulers. We are being consigned to jails like ordinary felons and still we are told that all this is for our good.

Our editors, lecturers and students are persecuted because they have all combined to bring about a national awakening among the dormant races of India. But the question that faces us now is should we renounce our mission because we are not allowed to proceed with it peacefully? No, we must bear in mind that we will have to pay very dearly for our liberty. Our oppressive rulers will not relax their policy of repression. We must, therefore, nerve ourselves to face every difficulty. And in truth, for our own part we see the hand of Providence at work behind the repressive policy of our rulers. There are some among us, no doubt, to whom the temporary lull, due to this policy of the Government, appears as a proof of the total extinction of all enthusiasm for political regeneration, and in despair they cry out: 'Repression has at last succeeded.' Such persons even go to the extent of denouncing the actions of a few morally courageous men as foolish and imprudent. These people seem to base their opinions upon superficial observations alone. They do not realize that there is also a force at work within. Re-action is the law of Nature, and a suppressed people must reawaken. Oppressions with which they are sought to be cowed down, only evoke the man in them. And at last the sufferings of men like the aged Durga Charan Sanyal and the young Khudi Ram Bose infuse a fresh lease of life into their drooping hearts, and instead of being afraid, they are fired with new energy which carries them safely through every difficulty and ultimately leads them to success. Mark how the sufferings of our young men have strengthened the cause of the Swadeshi movement and you will be convinced then of the futility of the repressive policy of the Government.

The fetish of prestige.

12. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 27th August, has the following:— INDIAN PEOPLE, 27th August 1908.

"The whole of Anglo-India worships at the same temple, the presiding deity of which is known by the name of 'Prestige'. No word occurs in Anglo-Indian literature so often as this word, and Anglo-India would not be Anglo-India without its prestige. It is the fetish that grips within its claws like an octopus the whole of Anglo-India. It is the Juggernauth that tramples and kills the best virtues of the Britisher as we know him at his 'home' and as we have read of him in his books. It is the shibboleth of Anglo-India—it is its watchword and battle cry—it is the gospel of its ideas on Indian politics. Whether in the Legislative Councils or in carriages in railway trains, the Indian is not to sit side by side with the Anglo-Indian, for then the prestige of the latter might suffer. Indians are not to have high and responsible offices in railways—the dumping ground of 'half-castes' and 'country-breds' who love to call themselves 'Imperial Anglo-Indians' because even the never-do-wells do not like to be subordinate to a mere 'native.' An Indian is not to have charge of an important district because then the prestige of the Joint Saheb and the Barra Saheb of the police would suffer. It is the same cry everywhere. Prestige, Prestige, Prestige and nothing but Prestige. The crumbs of the loaves and fishes of office might be given to the salaming Khansama's son or the illiterate not-able, but not to men who by sheer dint of ability have risen to the top. Because a man's prestige might suffer in the presence of his intellectual peers but not in the presence of his inferiors. Permanent settlement, like what they have in Bengal, might be the ideal form of settlement, of revenue-paying areas, but then such settlements are not to be extended to other parts of India, because they would have the effect of estranging the people from their district officers, i.e. weaken their prestige. The mistake committed by the greatest Viceroy, but one, of India in partitioning the fair province of Bengal is not to be rectified, for then the prestige of future Viceroys might suffer. The doctrine of 'settled fact' is merely a paraphrase of the doctrine of the 'worship of prestige.' Prestige is sacrosanct, and everything that tends to weaken it must be put down with a strong hand. An attempt is being made in Bengal to separate the judicial and executive functions of the district officers—honest John is making an honest effort. It is glad tidings to the thinking portions of the Indian communities, but it is too much for our local contemporary—the Pioneer. Here is what it says: 'In Bengal a district officer's prestige—such as it is in these days—depends almost entirely upon its magisterial powers. Of these it is now proposed to deprive him, and it is difficult to say how his position will not suffer irretrievably in the process. Indeed, when we recollect that the chief object of the Congress Extremists was to bring the British Government into contempt, it is difficult to imagine how a better plan for achieving that result could have been devised by those whom Lord Morley described as 'our enemies.' The 'prestige' of our contemporary shields him from many unpleasant things, but all the same the logic and good taste of writings like these is as clear as daylight to those who have eyes to see. Our contemporary seems to be indignant because the steering of the administrative machinery of British India is not in the hands of men in the quill driving dens of Anglo-Indian journalists. It is well for India, as well as for England, that there are still some men at the helm of Indian affairs whose prestige does not blind them to their love of justice and fair play."

NASIM-I-AGRA, 27th August 1908.

Political agitation.

13. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 27th August, referring to the present method of political agitation among Indians, remarks that it is not at all wise to indulge in such bitter criticisms of the actions of the Government. The Press Act and other repressive measures, says the editor, owe their origin to our own foolish conduct; for if we had not created such a dangerous situation, the Government would never have resorted to such legislation. Even now, if we behave with due courtesy and fairness, there will be no occasion to bring those Acts into effect in future.

ABHYUDAYA, 28th August 1908.

Public opinion and the present policy of the Government.

14. According to David Hume, every Government, says the editor of the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), in the issue of the 28th August, is in reality based not on the strength of an army, but on the public opinion of those whom it governs. And in India, too, the British Government has in reality been so far based on public opinion. If it is anxious regarding any measure, it is on account of public opinion being against it. In theory this principle is literally true. But it is deplorable that in practice the Government sometimes does not keep this fact before it, e.g. in the matter of the partition of Bengal. It is, however, a matter for gratification both to the rulers and the ruled, that a few of the English officials realize the importance of keeping public opinion in their favour, and take practical steps towards this end. Among such officials may be mentioned the names of the Governor of Bombay, the Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces, and the new Lieutenant Governor of Eastern Bengal and Assam. During the régime of Lord Curzon, this policy was totally disregarded, and for two years after that as much attention was not paid to it as is being done now. Had this policy been borne in mind, many of the deplorable incidents of that period would have been averted. For the last few months, Government have been very anxious not to allow the spread of seditious feeling among the people, and it has taken steps to punish those who tried to arouse hatred against it. This is the primary duty of the Government and no one can blame it for doing so. But at the same time, it will not be improper to consider whether the present policy of the Government frustrates or conduces to the attainment of this object. The vernacular press is the chief medium in disseminating true or erroneous ideas regarding the Government, and consequently the latter has begun to keep a very close and strict eye upon its writings. The result has been that in all provinces except the Punjab, the editors of vernacular papers have been, or are being, prosecuted and convicted. No one can object to the action of the Government against a paper if it publishes writings with the definite object of creating hatred of the administration. But sometimes Government has prosecuted papers that have merely honestly criticised a particular Government policy or measure. It was not politic to prosecute them, unless their writings and the special circumstances connected with them, clearly proved that the intention of the writer was to create hatred against the Government. It is the duty of all the well-wishers of the country to invite the attention of the Government and the people alike to the defects in the administration of the country and urge the introduction of such reforms as may ensure the happiness, prosperity, and contentment of the people. For the last twenty-five years, the educated classes have been urging the Government to introduce reforms, but except in a few cases, their representations have been disregarded. Besides, such deplorable incidents have taken place during the last two years as have created great excitement among the people. No one can deny that the present policy of the Government is repressive, and it is the inevitable result of such a policy that it aggravates the evil that it seeks to remove. The Government should therefore proceed very cautiously in taking action against newspapers that criticise its policy and measures severely or foolishly. It must be borne in mind that those who are most outspoken in their criticism of Government, are its most sincere friends, if their intention is the introduction of reforms in the administration of the country. It is best to give a warning, as has been done by Sir John Hewett, to newspapers for the first offence. But if only pure repression is to be used, the discontent will be intensified and the object of good government frustrated, although the action of the Government may be within the letter of the law.

The feeling in the country.

15. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 30th August, has the following under the marginally noted heading :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 30th August 1908.

"It is no exaggeration to say that there is a widespread feeling of consternation throughout the country. The anarchist conspiracy and the revolutionary movement are supposed to be a great danger, but they are infinitessimal and have been nipped in the bud. The real revolution is the change that has come over the minds of the people, and the great shock to the public faith in the statesmanship of the Government and the administration of justice. To the many professions of loyalty all over the country, we attach no importance. They are merely responses to a requisition : there is nothing behind them. We do not question the sincerity of these professions, but we utterly refuse to believe that the professed loyalists are more loyal than those who do not think it necessary to make any professions. What has happened to shake the loyalty of the people ? Some newspapers have been convicted of sedition ; a number of young men are accused of making bombs and planning assassinations. Is there a single sign that the whole country is going over bodily to these movements ? Neither anarchists nor seditionists will revolutionize the country or the people, but it is essential that at least the old standard of the administration in all its branches should be maintained unimpaired. The painful conviction is growing on the public that political trials now stand on a different footing from ordinary trials. The sentences passed are not commensurate with the offence. Every judge and magistrate thinks it necessary to remind the accused that sedition is punishable with transportation for life. A man has been sentenced to that punishment for a first offence. The sentences vary in different provinces without any apparent cause or justification. The whole atmosphere is charged with suspicion. It is not statesmanship in these circumstances to set any store by the chorus of loyalty ; statesmanship should take note of the still small voice that is urging the thoughts of men to bitterness, shaking the faith of the well-disposed people in the sympathetic and progressive character of the administration. Truly, the times are big with events which will come to the birth at their appointed time, but the mind is filled with misgiving and the eye fails to penetrate the gloom of the future. The question is, are the Government and the people coming nearer each other, or are they falling more and more apart from each other ? It would be a very sanguine individual who could answer this question in the affirmative."

The Government and the people.

16. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 31st August, referring to the recent utterances of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor and the attempts that are being made by the Governments of other provinces to suppress sedition, condemns the imprudence of those who are mischievously annoying the Government and creating hatred between the different races in the country, and remarks that their number is very few, and all respectable persons are on the side of law and order. OUDH AKHBAR, 31st August 1908.

A seditious leaflet.

17. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 22nd August, has the following :— SWARAJYA, 22nd August 1908.

"Ye sons of Bharat, arise ! take up the naked sword in your hands, and in return for the life of a Bengali, cut off the heads of a hundred Englishmen like an ear of corn."

Such is the subject matter of a leaflet which, in spite of the vigilance of the police some disaffected (lit. embittered) persons have stuck up at different places in Dacca.

SADDHARAM PRACHARAK, 26th August 1908.

Prosecutions for sedition.

18. The Saddharam Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 26th August, remarks that prosecutions for sedition have become so frequent now-a-days that they hardly come as a surprise upon the people, who do not get sufficient time even to sympathise with, or rejoice at, the sufferings of the accused. In a subsequent note, the editor repudiates the charge that is so often brought against the Punjab, e.g. of being a backward province, and remarks that it has sent at least two persons to England to carry on the work of political agitation, e.g. Lala Hardayal and Pandit Ram Bhoj Datt, B.A., LL.B.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 3rd September 1908.

Anarchy and sedition.

19. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 3rd September, referring to the condemnation of the anarchist propaganda by Sir Charles Bayley in a speech at Jorahat in Assam, remarks :—

"All this is perfectly true, and very well put. But why should it all have been so? To this question there is no satisfactory reply. Is it enough to say that the spirit of imitation has seized the imagination of some men, who have turned to sedition and anarchy? There must be some deeper cause for the appearance of movements never before known in India. Revolutionary tendencies are spreading with alarming rapidity among the younger generation of India. The young men engaged in the Bengal conspiracy had no thought for their lives or safety? What could have prevailed upon them to engage in such a desperate enterprise? In what way has British rule inspired hostility so intense, when we are constantly told that it is for the good of the people of India, and benevolent? Many of the rulers of the country have sincerely and earnestly tried to introduce large and substantial reforms. Why have not their efforts been appreciated? Are the measures now being taken sufficient to eradicate finally anarchy and sedition from India, or will they tend to increase the number of desperate and defiant persons? The whole question is so intensely perplexing that no rational or reasonable solution appears possible."

SWARAJYA, 22nd August 1908.

Bombs or boycott.

20. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 22nd August, remarks that India has become a field of battle these days—battle between the rulers and the ruled—and in view of the fact that no party will willingly acknowledge its weakness and yield, peace is well nigh impossible. Besides, it is unnatural to expect from the ruling class that they will loosen their hold upon people they govern; nor is it possible for the subject race to get reconciled to a state of perpetual bondage and servitude.

When such is the state of affairs, a settlement is possible only after a serious struggle : and such a struggle has already begun. Who will survive—the nationalists or the Englishmen? God only knows. But it is admitted on all hands that the odds are in favour of the ruling class; for while Englishmen command all the resources of a mighty Government, Indians are still plunged in misery and destitution : a war! . . . How is it possible then? That's the rub. Some of the nationalists, after a good deal of deliberation, have come to the conclusion that "bombs" would solve the problem very well. They have, therefore, begun to use them against the swords and maxim guns of the ruling class. Whatever temporary success they may have achieved, we have our doubts as to the ultimate success of this new method of agitation : for wherever we turn our eyes, whatever history we may refer to, we find that the throwing of bombs has never done any lasting good to a country. On the contrary, the ultimate loss which follows retaliation on the part of the persons injured, takes away every justification for their action. It is expedient, therefore, to bid adieu to the bomb and to resort to the other potent methods of passive resistance, e.g. boycott.

Even if you do not hold boycott superior to, and more efficacious than, the "bomb," you will agree that bombs are to be adopted only as a last resource after every other remedy has been tried. But since you do not subscribe to this and have not even realized the might of Swadeshi and boycott, you should refrain from expressing an opinion. Besides, what a great disgrace it is for Indians to raise their hands first against their enemies. It is entirely opposed to all the Hindu rules of warfare. Is it not irreligious, therefore, for you to aim at the life of Englishmen? They may have given you much trouble, and subjected you to much calamity and oppression, still there is no justification for you when you use a bomb against them. Death is a penalty for death alone, and unless they aim at innocent lives—which they have never done up to this, whatever their other shortcomings may have been, you should never—never use your bomb against them.

All your troubles can be removed through boycott alone—you say you die of hunger, well take a vow not to send your corn to foreign countries. You say you are penniless! Why then take to swadeshism. That will do away with all your complaints.

You say you don't receive proper treatment at the hands of Englishmen. If so, why do you go to Englishmen at all? If you don't get justice in the courts, why don't you settle your disputes by arbitration? Surely no one can interfere with your social rules, and those that do will have to suffer. Do you feel the disgrace you are put to on railway journeys? If so, why not pay the rude clerks and guards in their own coin. Are you physically incapable—if so, boycott the railways. But, pray, why do you use bombs? They cannot be of any avail to you when you have no mastery over yourselves. Try to acquire self-control. See that you practise Swadeshi and boycott to your utmost. Bind together the different hearts with the chord of love, and then you will find that no power on earth can come in the way of your national progress and development.

Political crimes.

21. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 4th September, referring to an article contributed by Mr. Frederick Harrison to some of the newspapers regarding political crimes, remarks that they may somewhat arbitrarily be divided into two heads: (1) crimes which aim directly at the overthrow of a Government; (2) crimes which have reference to the demand for national rights by the governed. The first sort of crime, says the editor, does not exist in India. All political agitations here are confined to a natural aspiration for an increased share in the administration of the country. It is idle therefore to be dreaming of sedition here—if sedition means an attempt to overthrow the Government: the first class of criminals have been always dealt with strictly and summarily. But the proper method to prevent the springing up of the second class of criminals is, the editor points out, the recognition of popular aspirations kindled by a liberal education. Lord Morley's recipe will prove more beneficial than Lord Curzon's in this respect.

OUDH AKHBAR, 4th September 1908.

The Moslem League and the partition of Bengal.

22. The Anand (Lucknow), of the 27th August, strongly deprecates the action of the Moslem League in passing a resolution in support of the partition of Bengal at a time when the Government is trying to restore peace and quiet in the country and when Sir Charles Bayley is taking every step to conciliate the discontented people of his province. Such an attitude of the Muhammadans, the editor thinks, will only keep up the existing tension of feeling between the rulers and the ruled.

ANAND, 27th August 1908.

The Bengalis' demand for self-government.

23. The Kannauj Punch (Moradabad), of the 1st September, referring to the Bengalis' demand for self-government, remarks that in view of the dissensions that are rife among the various communities of India, the idea of Swaraj at the present moment is preposterous. Besides, Indians have not as yet given proof of their ability to govern themselves, otherwise Swaraj might have been granted to them as it was granted to the Turks.

KANNAUJ PUNCH, 1st September 1908.

Progress and reform.

24. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 30th August, referring to the inordinate delay in the introduction of reforms which have been promised during the last two years, remarks:—

"Have not the people a just cause for dissatisfaction in respect of all the above mentioned matters? And is it in human nature for discontent not to prevail and even increase when side by side with this apparent disinclination to be active in the direction of progress and reform, such high speed is maintained in retrograde motion? There have been repressive acts of the legislature and measures of administrations without trial, transportations with trial, quite an unending crop of sedition prosecutions with their invariable accompaniment of excessive sentences, prohibitions of meetings, security proceedings against respectable men, imposition of punitive police and alleged unjust assessment of this degrading impost, &c., &c. May we venture to ask whether the prosecution of a gentleman in Mr. G. Subramania

ADVOCATE, 30th August 1908.

Iyer's position, of his age and health—and he is a man who has declared his adherence to the Constitutional party—is an act of public necessity and of wise policy, and whether it is calculated exactly to mitigate unrest and make the people thankful to the Government? We will take the liberty of suggesting, with all respect, that a more effective means of putting down the alleged excess of agitators as well as the criminal tendencies of would-be assassins than of fishing or canvassing for loyalty demonstrations and manifestoes—we may be pardoned for a little plain speaking—is for those in power and authority to show a livelier sense of the necessities of the situation and make some real advance towards real reform in the constitution and in administrative methods. Meanwhile, let the hammering process be suspended: enough has been done to vindicate not only the strength of the law but the might of the Government: more of it will but render more difficult the restoration of good feelings between the Government and the people as well as between Europeans and Indians; surely a consummation not wished by anybody with sanity to lose."

Progress and reform.

ZUL QARNAIN, 28th August 1908.

Persia and India.

26. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 28th August, referring to the tyrannous deeds of the Shah in Persia, remarks that India ought to be thankful to the British Government for all the peace and prosperity that she enjoys at present.

OUDH AKHBAR, 3rd September 1908.

The effect of Turkey and Japan upon India.

27. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 3rd September, remarks that the change that has come over India is due, not to the success of popular movements in Turkey or Japan, but to the liberal education Indians have received under the ægis of the British Government for the constitution granted to Turkey is not the result of the success of any agitation there. It is the voluntary recognition by the Sultan of the rights of the people. Similarly, if the British Government confers any sort of representative government on Indians—as it will do some time or other—it will be the result of the sense of justice and fair play inherent in the British nation. But Indians should see that they are polite and moderate in their demands.

SWARAJYA, 22nd August 1908.

Indian coolies in Mauritius.

28. A correspondent of the Swarájya (Allahabad), writing in the issue of the 22nd August, under the heading "Is slavery entirely suppressed?" complains that Indian coolies are grossly ill-treated in the Mauritius and that the agreement they sign condemns them to a refined form of slavery. The magistrates are all Europeans and no cooly can expect justice from them. He advises the people of India to start an agitation on behalf of their countrymen in the Mauritius.

JEDD-O-JEHAD, 31st August 1908.

The frontier.

29. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 31st August, referring to the ever-recurring internecine feuds between the frontier tribes, advises the tribesmen to constitute themselves a republic under the suzerainty of the British and cultivate arts and sciences, otherwise their constant broils will force the Government to annex their territories and thus put an end to their perpetual feuds.

BRAHMAN SARVASWA, January 1908.

Conviction of Mr. Tilak.

30. The Brahman Sarvaswa (Etawah), for January (received on the 27th August), says that the conviction of Mr. Tilak has caused sorrow throughout the country. The editor fails to understand why Mr. Tilak was convicted when his arguments in his defence could not be refuted and considering that he declared that he was not opposed to British rule in India. He expresses the opinion that the acquittal of Mr. Tilak would have tended very much towards checking discontent and securing the good will of the people for the Government.

Durga Charan Sanyal.

31. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 22nd August, referring to the enhancement of the sentence passed upon Durga Charan Sanyal by the Calcutta High Court, remarks that the sentence was so barbarously heavy that it has surprised even some of the Anglo-Indian officials. The accused has been held guilty in spite of the verdict of the jury. Had a European prisoner been treated in this way, the Judges would have been turned out of their seats. But, poor Indians! who is to vouchsafe a hearing to them?

SWARAJYA, 22nd August 1908.

Shanti Narayan's appeal.

32. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 22nd August, under the heading "My Appeal", remarks :—

"Srijut Shanti Narayan's appeal has been filed in the Allahabad High Court. Though we do not expect justice, yet the desire of those in favour of appeal will be gratified (to some extent) and at the same time British justice will be seen in its true colours."

SWARAJYA, 22nd August 1908.

The Dehli murder case.

33. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 22nd August, has the following :—

"A punishment of only four days' imprisonment has been inflicted upon the Saheb Bahadur who kicked a poor punkha cooly of Dehli into the eternal sleep of death. Really this (instance of) justice must have sent a thrill into the soul of Nausherwan. It is only proper now to sentence the murderer of Miss Hooper to four days' imprisonment also. But this is not to be since it is the white house that has been set on fire."

SWARAJYA, 22nd August 1908.

The Jutogh cases.

34. Referring to the two murders committed at Jutogh, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 27th August, makes the following observations :—

"We have no desire of making any comments while the cases are pending, but we must say that these two cases and their results will be followed with very close attention throughout the country. The soldier has been committed to the Lahore Chief Court and will be tried by a jury; the Khansama has been committed to the Umballa Sessions and will be tried without a jury. This man's crime is undoubtedly the more dastardly and revolting, but the Corporal also committed a cold-blooded murder. With these two men, the administration of justice itself will be on trial. If the scales are held evenly, well and good; if the two men are tried or punished differently it will have a serious effect upon the country, with so many evil influences already at work. Let the law be strictly enforced, but let it at the same time be evenly and impartially administered. The Khansama has been already found guilty, the Corporal will be tried on the 18th September."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 27th August 1908.

The arrest of Mr. G. Subramania Iyer.

35. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 27th August :—

"The arrest of Mr. G. Subramania Iyer on several charges of sedition is in one sense a more serious event than the arrest and conviction of Mr. Tilak. For a number of years Mr. Tilak has been known to be at variance, not only with the Government, but also with a large number of his educated countrymen. After his first conviction for sedition he was generally guarded in his language, and there is an honest difference of opinion as to whether the articles for which he has now been convicted are really seditious. But Mr. Subramania Iyer holds a very different position in the country. He is the oldest and ablest publicist in the Madras Presidency. Along with the late Mr. Viraraghavachariar he founded the Hindu and made it one of the leading papers in the country. He gave valuable evidence before the Welby Commission, and is a recognized authority on financial questions. By temperament he is sober and reasonable, and neither in his speeches nor in his writings is there any sign of excitement or passion. It is almost incredible that a man like him should be guilty of sedition, when there is not a single seditious word in all his writings and speeches. Mr. Iyer is of advanced age and is suffering from a terrible and incurable malady. Latterly, he has been somewhat outspoken in his opinions and has even been regarded as an Extremist. But neither in the Congress nor out of it has he ever expressed sentiments like those of Babu Bepin Chandra

INDIAN PEOPLE, 27th August 1908.

Pal or Mr. Tilak. The fatal fascination of the vernacular language has brought Mr. Iyer to his present position. Our own idea is that he is not the writer of the impeached articles. He generally stays away from Madras for the sake of his health, and his working powers have considerably diminished. If a man's past is of any help to him, then the whole life of Mr. Subramania Iyer as a public writer and speaker militates against his being charged with sedition, but it is the country's misfortune that the Government in its campaign against sedition makes no distinction between conscious and unconscious offenders and the history of a man's whole life does not avail him."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 30th August 1908.

Mr. Subramania Iyer.

36. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 30th August, while referring to the refusal of bail to Mr. Subramania Iyer, remarks :—

"The insinuation by the Government Advocate that Mr. Subramania Iyer may break bail and escape to Pondicherry, whence he cannot be extradited, is neither courageous nor courteous. To say nothing of a man of his honourable record and public position, it is morally wrong to regard a man charged with a political offence as a common criminal. A thief is a thief in every country and under every law. A political offender is a martyr and hero in the eyes of many. Some political offenders are among the greatest men of the world. A man who preaches sedition must be prepared to face the consequences, for if he were to abscond, he would lose the sympathy of those on whose support he counts. In cases of sedition, bail should be the rule and not the exception, and if the example of Calcutta were everywhere followed, both in the matter of bail and punishment, there would be a greater chance of political trials being shorn of their needlessly severe character."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 3rd September 1908.

Mr. Subramania Iyer.

37. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 3rd September, notes with satisfaction that the whole of India has expressed regret at the arrest of Mr. G. Subramania Iyer. Mr. Iyer is a man of mild and sober views and always supported the Government on important occasions and the Madras Government recognized his ability and listened to his advice. The best thing would have been to warn him and that would have been sufficient. There is little hope that he will be acquitted by judges and juries, and the only hope now lies in the Madras Government. The editor exhorts the leading men of the Madras Presidency to wait upon the Governor, and to request him to extend a free pardon to Mr. Iyer on tendering an apology as in the case of Mr. A. C. Banerjee of Calcutta.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 30th August 1908.

Sentences in sedition cases.

38. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), writing in the issue of the 30th August, complains that the Indian law of sedition is very vague and that writings that would attract no attention in England are regarded as seditious. Another noticeable fact in this connection, he says, is that only the editors of vernacular journals have been prosecuted on the plea of their papers being conducted by uneducated persons, but this is not correct as Messrs. Pranjpe and Tilak are both highly educated men. He further complains that sentences in Bengal have been lighter than in Bombay, Madras or the United Provinces.

"The Yugantar's express purpose was to excite hatred against the Government. Behind it stood the band of anarchists now awaiting trial. Nevertheless, the highest sentence in the case of the Calcutta paper in connection with the last furious and frantic article published in it, was a sentence of three years. It was inflicted by the officiating Chief Justice, who considered it sufficient for the ends of justice. If sedition has anywhere assumed most serious proportions, it is in Calcutta, but even in the worst case, a sentence for transportation for life, or for a shorter period, has not been considered necessary. Is sedition in Madras, or Bombay, or the United Provinces less dangerous than in Bengal ? If not, why this great and striking disparity in the sentences ? Why do the sentences some times appear just and at others vindictive ?"

ABHYUDAYA, 28th August 1908.

The police and famine volunteers.

39. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 28th August, referring to Lala Lajpat Rai's letter in the Advocate regarding the ill-treatment of famine volunteers by the police, remarks that the police are to a very large extent responsible for creating bad feelings in the minds of the people against the administration of the Government. The editor says that the police should be clearly given to understand that they have no right to interfere with a work which is not unlawful and that they are liable to punishment if they do so. He expresses the hope that Sir John Hewett will take steps to restrain the police from preventing people from attending to the charitable work of relieving the famine-stricken.

Government schools.

41. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 28th August, referring to the proposal regarding the admission of a limited number of students to a class, remarks that if the Muhammadans do not take to founding new and independent schools for themselves, they will suffer a good deal of loss in the long run. ZUL QARNAIN, 28th August 1908.

The Agricultural College, Cawnpore.

42. A correspondent writing to the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 30th August, notes with satisfaction the attempts that are being made by the Government to improve the Cawnpore Agricultural College, and remarks that to attract a better class of students than those wishing to qualify themselves as kanungos, a degree must be conferred on students passing the prescribed tests. He also thinks that separate classes should be held for kanungos and students studying for degrees. The minimum qualification for admission ought to be the Matriculation or the School-Leaving Certificate Examination. ADVOCATE, 30th August 1908.

In conclusion, he says, the Agricultural College at Cawnpore is the only institution of its kind in these Provinces and it is the duty of the Government and of the public to make it really a first-rate college. Swadeshism does not consist in merely repeating in a solemn tone the Swadeshi vow once every year; it consists in improving and multiplying the means that help us to become more prosperous and happy than what we were before.

Commercial education.

43. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 1st September, referring to the useless and theoretical discussions regarding the subject of commercial education, remarks that the need of the moment is the introduction of primary education in commerce, in the shape of book-keeping, typewriting, &c., in the existing schools. A thorough reform in the several systems of education, the editor holds, would clear the way for reform in technical education. MASHRIQ, 1st September 1908.

The Muir Central College.

44. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 3rd September, has the following :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 3rd September 1908.

"The Principal of the Muir Central College, Allahabad, has passed an order to the effect that all junior students must call on him at his place at least once a year. This has raised quite a flutter in the student world, and many are the hushed consultations that are being held to consider this new aspect of things in the class, study, or the corridor. Circumstances have made them hold on to the theory of "natural enemies" for such a length of time, that it is no wonder that they should be questioning whether this luck is not too good to come to them in this way. Every attempt at social amenities, however awkwardly made, has our sympathy, and this order, we earnestly believe, is the harbinger of many things good to follow. It is wonderful to contemplate how far a little good nature from the elders will go with the right sort of boys. Every one of them will feel that he, young as he may be, has some use in his little world, has some work to do, some experience to gain. Social amenities have a virtue of their own. The student finds himself at once lifted up to a higher social and moral plane, and it is always pleasant to contemplate the easy friendly footing on which the pupils can live with their masters, perfectly respectful, yet with no reserve and nothing forced in their intercourse. We hope the experiment will be continued in the spirit in which we believe it has been conceived, and leave our students the better for a few kind words kindly spoken."

ADVOCATE, 30th August 1908.

The sugar industry.

46. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 30th August, referring to the probable destruction of the Indian sugar industry by the abolition of all import duties on foreign sugar, remarks :—

"How to save the situation is the great problem of the day. As we have said more than once, unless the cost of production can be reduced by about 50 per cent. the Indian sugar industry is meant to go to the wall. One well-known authority puts the solution thus: 'A slightly-increased local produce, the general introduction among cultivators of the knowledge of making white sugar (good enough for all ordinary use), and some improvement in the existing position of the European sugar factories in India, may altogether kill the import trade in sugar, which, though large, is relatively not so. By instituting improvements in the cultivation, and especially in the manufacture of sugar, in the principal sugarcane-growing localities of India, a vast impetus can be given to this industry. Such encouragement can have but one result, the lowering of prices of the raw article, while the raw article itself will be of a very superior quality, that is, to all intents and purposes, sugar and not gur. If the European sugar factories in India can secure such gur at a cheap price, they cannot only stop the import of beet and other sugars, but actually invade the markets of Europe and America.' This means not only revival and the keeping of the money used on foreign sugar in the country, but also bringing money instead of sugar from abroad and adding to the national wealth. The Government can help by lessening land revenue for a time only on sugar fields, lowering the water-rate in canal areas, and allowing Municipalities to raise the octroi duty on the foreign sugar and reduce it on the indigenous variety. Otherwise blank despair is before this industry."

48. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 2nd September, referring to the prosperous condition of the Indian industries in the past, remarks that their hopelessly bad condition at present is due to the selfish policy of foreign commerical nations, and in support of his contentions, the editor quotes passages from Sir William Digby's book "India for Indians."

The Sarda Canal.

49. A correspondent of the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 2nd September, while taking strong exception to the protests of the Talukdars of Oudh regarding the construction of the Sarda Canal, remarks that Government should look to it that this canal is connected some where with the Gumti river for the convenience of the districts through which it passes.

50. Referring to the proposal to hold a conference for considering the best method of granting rewards to the famine relief officers for services rendered during the recent famine, a correspondent of the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 2nd September, suggests that instead of cash payments, famine relief officers should be granted tahsildarships, naib tahsildarships or sub-registrarships, according to their qualifications.

51. Lala Har Dayal, M.A., in an article in the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 22nd August, complains that the Hindu population of India is daily decreasing, while the number of Christians and Musalmans is on the increase. The decrease in the case of Hindus he ascribes to their ever-growing poverty.

52. Referring to the success of five Indians at the last competitive examination for the Indian Medical Service, the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 27th August, remarks 'the policy of jealously excluding Indians from many departments is a misguided one. All Indians who proceed to England should be encouraged to join some department of the public service, and the number of revolutionists will dwindle down as if by magic. The police, the forest, the engineering, the telegraph and a score of other departments are recruited in England, but over them all there is the same legend "no Indian need apply." Small wonder if young men shut out from the public service of their own country hold Mutiny celebrations! The Government can win them over to its side with the greatest ease, but prefers to set detectives to follow them all over Europe and America.'

53. Referring to the strike of compositors in the Government Press, Allahabad, and to the participation of Muhammadans also in it, the Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 28th August, remarks that this is due to the temptations held out by the Hindus and not to any desire on the part of the Muhammadans to paralyse the activity of any department of the Government.

This incident, says the editor, cannot serve as a lesson to "those who think it impossible for the Muhammadans to participate in such agitations," for it clearly shows that the hand of the "Devil" was at work in tempting the innocent Muhammadans from their true path of duty.

54. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 31st August, referring to the order of the Government of Bengal prohibiting the reproduction of seditious articles, remarks that if the public are kept in the dark as regards articles on which prosecutions are based, they will draw wrong inferences from the punishments awarded to the offending journalists.

AL BASHIR, 1st September 1908.

Hedjaz Railway and the editor of the Watan.

1. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 1st September, referring to the large amount of money collected by the editor of the Watan (Lahore), in aid of the Hedjaz Railway, remarks that this is a proof of the fact that success is sure if a work is done systematically and with some definite object in view.

The Turkish Constitution.

2. A correspondent writing to the Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 2nd September, expresses grave doubts as to the proper working of the constitutional Government in Turkey as friction is sure to arise when such government is introduced into a country inhabited by races widely differing in habits, religious beliefs, languages, &c. He, moreover, thinks that the Turks have not yet proved themselves worthy of governing themselves and that the "Young Turks" are little better than the Indian Extremists. He is of opinion that a parliamentary government is not the best form of government. The best government, he says, is that under which the people are the happiest, and in support of his arguments he points to India.

VEDA PRAKASH, August 1908.

Sir John Hewett's speech at Agra.

3. Reviewing Sir John Hewett's speech, which was delivered at Agra on the 6th August, the Veda Prakash (Meerut), for August (received on the 7th September), remarks that were the spirit of anarchism now rampant in Bengal to reach the United Provinces, there is no doubt that it would completely ruin the industrial development of these provinces which His Honour is doing so much to foster. The editor says that the Extremist newspapers are doing an incalculable injury not only to the Government but also to the people, inasmuch as they vitiate the taste of the latter and hamper their general progress. He urges that the press should do its best to support the conservative forces of order and peace and co-operate with the Government in combating with and eradicating sedition and anarchism from the country.

KALWAR MITRA, September 1908.

Sir John Hewett's speech at Agra.

4. Reviewing His Honour's speech delivered at Agra, the Kalwar Mitra (Allahabad), for September, recapitulates the various blessings that British rule has conferred upon India and remarks that the English are greater friends of the Kalwar community than the higher castes of India which, in their selfish greed, ruined every other community. The editor, in conclusion, assures the Government of the continued devotion and loyalty of the Kalwar community.

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 1st September 1908.

His Honour's speeches.

5. The editor of the Awáza-i-Khalq (Benares), while reviewing His Honour's recent speeches in the issue of 1st September, remarks that His Honour has done well in taking the people into his confidence, but he should not stop with mere promises, but put his high ideals into practice and instruct his subordinates to do the same. The people expect to be treated in a more considerate manner and they should be indulged in this. Their standing grievances must be redressed. In this connection he mentions the recent assessment of income tax in Benares, which he thinks is exorbitant.

SWARAJYA, 5th September 1908.

Sir John Hewett's speech.

6. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 5th September, referring to Sir John Hewett's speech, remarks that it is gratifying to learn that the Lieutenant Governor of a province also stands in need of public support. But the wonder is that assistance is sought from the people in the face of such humiliating treatment as has been meted out to them in the form of house searches, deportations, imprisonments, &c., during the last few years. That Indians are responsible for the present unrest, because they do not report the movements of "agitators" to the authorities, is the common complaint of Anglo-Indian officials; but it is obvious that even now there is enough of self-respect left in them to deter them from acting as honorary informants. If you really want to suppress this unrest, says the editor, listen to my advice. Do not lend ears to your detectives. Have confidence in the leaders of the people. Listen to their complaints, grant them their rights and there will be no more unrest then.

7. Mr. Naginlal H. Setalvad, M.A., discusses in the Hindustan Review (Allahahad), for September, the question of the utility of the introduction of western institutions into India. He examines the various arguments that are advanced by those who hold that western institutions are unsuited to India. Referring to the argument that the Oriental loves one kind or another of despotism and that the government of a people by themselves is a meaningless term, he points out that this may have been true of Indians of the past, but Indians of the present day have been educated in western sciences and literature and have imbibed western ideas of representative government and personal liberty. They have come to believe that representation and taxation go hand in hand. Had they been a white race (e.g. Boers) they would have been granted autonomy, but being of a brown complexion they are denied these privileges. Englishmen of a certain class think that they have given the Indians railways, bridges, tramways and roads, and with these they should remain content. But would an Englishman be content with similar treatment? The same is true of the educated Indian.

India and western institutions.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, September 1908.

It is contended that Indians have hitherto shown no capacity for managing their own affairs. To this the writer replies that it is absurd to base one's arguments on the precedents of the past when the character of a people has completely changed.

"What is wanted is the sense of responsibility, and the sharing of that responsibility by all orders of the people. A nation has to learn self-government just as it has to learn everything else: and nothing helps so much as to put the nation—the whole nation—in charge of its own destiny. It is as absurd to say that Nationality must not be granted until the people are quite fit to rule as it is to say that a man must not go into the water until he has learnt to swim."

To the argument that educated Indians form a microscopic minority in the country, he replies that the educated classes do not form an exclusive caste, and that their members are drawn from all sections of the people. The people have confidence in them, and look to them for guidance. They do not in the least care for the opinions and views of the so-called "natural leaders", the chiefs.

He complains that the experiment of self-government has been tried in this country in a very crude form. The working of the mofussil municipalities, he thinks, is a farce, as all the members, mostly nominated by the Government, "dance to the tune of the magistrate." If the experiment has proved a failure, it is owing to the insincerity of the Government, he thinks, and not to the incapacity of the people. Of the evils that have resulted from such a system, he enumerates the introduction of free trade, which is highly injurious to indigenous arts and industries, the unsanitary condition of the country, and the disinclination of the Government to spend any substantial sum of money on education.

8. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 5th September, while referring to Sir Agha Khan's speech at Poona, remarks that in view of the dissensions between different sections of the people of India, no one can maintain that representative institutions can flourish in India, and must admit that the suzerainty of the British is extremely necessary for peace and prosperity in the country.

Representative government in India.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 5th September 1908.

9. "It has been the fashion," writes Mr. V. B. Mehta, Barrister-at-Law, in the Hindustán Review (Allahabad), for September, "for about a century for Europeans to write and for Asiatics to accept that Europe has always been an inseparable unit, an indivisible entity, whilst Asia never had any unity at all." He proceeds to controvert this theory. He says that there was little affinity between the various races of Europe before the introduction of Christianity. A little political unity, he admits, did exist under the Roman empire, but it was changed into a sort of spiritual bondage when the Popes became stronger than the Emperors. It was Christianity that brought together the heterogeneous races of Europe and made them unite to resist the advance of the Moslems. The union of these races is now strengthened by co-operation in scientific inventions and by the exchange of artistic and philosophic thought between men of different nationalities. Adverting to Asia he says: "Asia is one in spite of her differences in races and languages. She is quickened from India to Japan and from Arabia to Turkey by the high spirituality and the vastness of her conceptions. She is bound together by the bond of imagination before which any other kind of bond is naught. Race differences count for nothing whether in Asia or Europe." There has been a constant interchange of ideas, he maintains, between different races both in Europe and in Asia, the various races of Asia, do not differ from each other more widely than those of Europe, and the languages, too, by constant interaction, have borrowed from one another. "There is the same mixture ethnologically. The Semitic and the Mongolian united with the Aryans in India and Persia and obliterated their superficial ethnic and linguistic differences."

The unity of Asia.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, September 1908.

Referring to the unity of religion in Europe and to the variety of beliefs so often alluded to by European writers, he remarks that to the superficial observer it may appear that Asia is divided into four distinct religious groups, but on close observation it would appear that Islam, which is outwardly more related to Judaism and Christianity, is connected psychically with Hinduism through Sufism which may be defined as emotionalized Vedantism. Buddhism is an offspring of Brahmanism, while the religion of Zoroaster has strong affinities with the Vedic religion of India. "Thus we see that through the various faiths of Asia runs a thin thread uniting them one with the other, turning the apparent disunity of Asia into a psychic harmony." Referring to the unity in art and letters he says :—

"Side by side with the spread of religious ideas, there was a constant intercommunion in matters intellectual, emotional and imaginative in Asia. We have never been so exclusive and have never been living in water-tight compartments as the European socialists think. A more mischievous and absurd theory could not have been coined to defame the Oriental world. There was a great deal of intercourse in early times between India and Persia. The art of Persepolis influenced some of the architectural details of the Hindu temples. Everyone knows that the game of chess, originally invented in India, was borrowed by the Persians from this country and from Persia it spread throughout the two continents, and to-day we find chess-players in India, Japan, Turkey, England and America ! !"

In conclusion the writer remarks :—

"The greatness of Asia is not dead. It will again flower in Oriental magnificence as it did through four thousand years of the past. The Asiatic countries had developed each one of them a separate type of excellence and when pieced together, they form a perfect whole. The Hebrews stand for sublimity, the Indians for deep, abstruse thought, the Chinese for pure Rationalism, the Arabs for an ethereal imagination, the Persians for passion and poetry, the Japanese for a living throbbing Art, the Turks for supreme valour. Each type of Asiatic civilization is a part individually, forming together with the others the organism of Asia. The future of the East depends on the union of its component parts and once the various nations of the Orient are united together morally, there is nothing that they will not be able to do. A new civilization, born of the melange of her various old ones, combined with what is really good in the present-day civilization of Europe and America, will spread throughout Asia, and the result of it will be as Napoleon had predicted, the domination of Asia over the world, as in olden times."

CENTRAL HINDU COLLEGE MAGAZINE, September 1908.

Political evolution.

10. The Central Hindu College Magazine (Benares), for September, reproduces from the Madras Christian College Magazine, the second instalment of a paper entitled "Some Aspects of Political Evolution" read by Professor Corley of the Madras Christian College at the annual meeting of the South Indian Association. (Vide Selections no. 33, paragraph 4.)

SWARAJYA, 5th September 1908.

Political agitation.

11. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 5th September, remarks that opposition to Government in any country is due to four causes :—

Firstly—To some defect in the administration.

Secondly—To the demand on the part of the people for certain petty political rights.

Thirdly—To a desire to replace one Government with another.

Fourthly—To secure national liberty.

In the nineteenth century all political agitation in India was of the first and second classes. Demand of petty political privileges, such as permanent settlements, the granting of higher executive and judicial posts to Indians, &c., was all that Indians aspired for. It is these petty ideals which are responsible for the failure of all political agitation during the last century.

The third cause of opposition, e.g. a change of Government, says the editor, cannot be a motive for the political agitation of the present day ; for let it be remembered that whoever comes next will tighten his hold over India more closely and will "suck the remaining blood of Indians."

As to the fourth cause, e.g. national liberty, there is no Indian who does not aspire for it. The craving for liberty is a natural one and is found among the lower animals also.

Supposing, then, we set our ideal before us ; how are we to attain it ? Begging, of course, will not do. Lord Minto promised reforms, but what has he done ?—deported, imprisoned, gagged and oppressed those who were educated and pure spirited, the cherished leaders of the people. Bombs, too, will not meet the case. They will simply introduce bloodshed into the country and create robbers and plunderers who will not hesitate to take advantage of the situation.

'There is only one remedy then, dear countrymen ! Follow the example of your illustrious ancestors. Make ready to live and die for your country. Give up your petty quarrels and dissensions. Take up the banner of Swarájya and let the voice of Swadeshi, boycott, and national education penetrate everywhere.'

Politics.

12. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 6th September, has the following under the heading "Beware of Politics" :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 6th September 1908.

"Do you take part in politics ? Do you take any interest in the political situation of the country ? These queries will now invariably be met with an emphatic 'No.' Whomsoever you ask this, and in whatever grade of society, the result is the same, the same terrified glance this way and that, the same reply 'How can you ask it, have I either time or inclination for such things ?' What are we coming to ? We wonder the cultivation of a science, the knowledge of which is one of the highest aspirations of civilized man, is here proscribed. Yet this forbidden topic, like the ancient forbidden fruit, has an enchanting taste and receives an all-engrossing attention wherever a few men come together. It has, therefore, been very rightly remarked that if you close the safety valve of open discussion, you correspondingly increase the danger, and undertake the risk of an explosion. An Englishman shorn of his politics is not worth the name, and this is the lesson writ large on every page of the history of England. The divergence of principle from practice is therefore all the more bewildering and inexplicable. Few English people, it is said, to-day recall, if they ever knew, Dr. Arnold's dictum that the desire to take an active share in the great work of government is the highest earthly desire of a ripened mind. But there are people beyond count in England, in all walks of life, with whom interest in politics is as intense and as continuous as it was with Dr. Arnold. Tens of thousands of these people have no expectation of ever being in the House of Commons or even in a municipal council. Politics is chiefly an intellectual interest with them, put into active exercise whenever an occasion demands. But no man or woman in England ever apologises for being a politician ; just as no one in any country will ever think of apologising for being a member of a Browning or a Dante society, or for a love of music. But then one is apt to be reminded of the present-day aphorism that an imitation of the West in the altogether different conditions of the East would be attended with failure, that this is true only in politics and that those grand principles of which one hears have a sorry trick of getting fermented in the brain in this land of bright sunshine."

Sedition cases.

13. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 4th September, says that since the abolition last year of the rule of obtaining sanction from the Government of India for prosecutions under section 124A, Indian Penal Code, there has been quite a large number of sedition cases in almost all the provinces. But the Government, the editor says, should bear in mind that cases under section 124A produce their good or evil effect in every part of the country and it will therefore be advisable that the Government of India should reinforce the old rule and should advise the Local Government in deciding in what cases action should be taken under section 124A, Indian Penal Code. He further urges that in deciding this point, Government should be guided not merely by the fact that the alleged seditious articles or speeches come within the purview of section 124A, Indian Penal Code, but by the criterion whether action under that ABHYUDAYA, 4th September 1908.

section in a given sedition case will lead to good or bad results in the administration of the country. "Although we are not in favour of seditious writings, yet in our opinion it is sometimes much better in the interest of good administration not to take any action against a partially delinquent newspaper than to enforce the penalty of the law. Action should be taken only in cases in which the charge of sedition is plainly made out and in which abstention from prosecution is most likely to create ill-feeling among the people. Action should not have been taken against Mr. Tilak and G. Subramania Iyer, inasmuch as although the articles they wrote may have been technically seditious, yet they were not such as could have justified the Government in prosecuting the writers, having regard to the purposes of good administration."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 6th September 1908.

The law of sedition and its working.

14. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 6th September, has the following under the marginally noted heading :—

"We have said that the law of sedition is very vague, but no law is more certain or unerring in its application. Its very vagueness makes it terrible. Judges may differ in their interpretation of the word 'disaffection', but the accused never escapes. In the initiation of proceedings there is no difference between sedition and many other cases in which Government sanction is necessary. A Government servant cannot be prosecuted for bribery and corruption as a public servant without the sanction of the Government, but a conviction does not necessarily follow a prosecution. The opinion on which a prosecution for sedition is sanctioned is the same as is available in other cases in which the Government prosecutes. The law officers are the same; there are no special experts engaged to advise the Government in cases of sedition. It may be the Government Advocate, the Legal Remembrancer, or the Advocate General, but none of them is infallible. In cases of acquittals, the Government sometimes appeals on the advice of these officers, but these fail as often as they succeed. All the material in sedition cases before the legal advisers to the Government are translations of certain vernacular writings. The first opinion is formed by the Criminal Investigation Department, and then legal opinion is obtained. If it is favourable and a prosecution is sanctioned, there is an end of the matter. The arrest of a man on a charge of sedition means his conviction. The presumption that every man is innocent until proved to be guilty, does not apply in his case; the presumption in his case is that he is guilty until proved to be innocent, and that never happens. Why must it be assumed that the Government and its legal advisers are invariably right in sedition cases only, but in other cases subject to the human liability to error? If legal opinion may be mistaken in other cases it may just as well be mistaken in sedition cases. This is what differentiates political from other offences. Sedition is an offence that means danger to the State: if the State comes forward and says that a particular piece of writing is seditious, the courts are bound to accept that view. Of course it is open to a jury to differ and to acquit a man charged with sedition, but we doubt whether any Judge would accept such a verdict, or, rather, like Sir Robert Rampini, go on discharging the jury until one is found of the same opinion as the Judge. When it is a question of exciting hatred against the Government, we freely admit that the Government is entitled to the strongest support of the courts, but mistakes may be made; until however one is detected prosecutions for sedition will stand by themselves in the administration of criminal justice."

SAMRAT, 22nd June 1908.

Anarchism in Bengal.

15. The Samrát (Kalakankar), of the 22nd June (received on the 9th August), strongly condemns the mischievous and criminal actions of the anarchists in Bengal, as wantonly interfering with the ordered progress of the country. The editor urges the necessity of moderation in demanding rights from the Government and remarks that unless Indians prove their fitness for self-government by the cultivation of union and patriotism of the right sort, they can never expect to obtain Swaraj.

VEDA PRAKASH, August 1908.

The bomb in Indian politics.

16. To hold bomb throwing or other means of violence as conducive to the progress or welfare of India, says the Veda Prakash (Meerut), for August (received on the 7th September), is but sheer folly and madness. All nations that have made remarkable progress in civilization, have done so through their social, moral and intellectual virtues. Those who put obstacles in the way of ordered progress, and disturb public peace by riots, are not the friends of their country but its enemies. They are also enemies of the Government and it is but meet that Government should adopt every possible means to punish them.

AL BASHIR, 1st September 1908.

The red pamphlet.

17. A correspondent writing to Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 1st September, remarks that the red pamphlet issued by some mischievous Muhammadans was the result of the excesses, selfishness and short-sightedness of their Hindu brethren whose actions they could no longer tolerate. The persons concerned in the circulation of the pamphlet were tried by a magistrate who found them guilty and sentenced them to six months' rigorous imprisonment. On an appeal to the High Court, the sentence was reduced, and this has led the Hindu press to bitterly criticise the action of the Judges. The organ of the Rajput community, the Rajput, has also joined in this chorus of vile vituperation without any regard to the effect its writings may produce among the Kshatriyas of these Provinces. To insinuate that the sentence was reduced because the accused were Muhammadans, is imprudence and short sightedness. Besides, what can be said of those who are constantly doubting the honesty and veracity of others?

The higher section of the Muhammadans has condemned the sentiments embodied in the pamphlet. Still, wicked, mischievous, unprincipled and base born persons do not scruple to create bad blood between the rulers and the ruled. However, we trust, continues the writer, noble-minded Hindus and the Government both look upon these liars with an eye of contempt and think them more ignoble than dogs. The wonder is that these foolish persons lose sight of the ill-treatment the Muhammadans receive at the hands of their Hindu brethren. A Muhammadan is shot dead at Dacca, a number of them are butchered in Burma on the occasion of Id, mosques are burnt to ashes in Gujranwala: all this happens and the Government is not even moved to punish the miscreants responsible for these atrocities. Strange persons indeed! mark their sense of justice.

They do not even hesitate to find fault with the highest judicial officers. We refrained from comment when Justice Mitra interpreted Swaraj as self-government and now we find that hostile criticisms are often indulged in and cowardly attacks made upon the Judges of the High Court by some of the Indian newspapers.

MUSAFIR, 30th August 1908.

Fresh conspiracies in Etawah.

18. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 30th August, referring to last year's conspiracy in Etawah, remarks that mischievous persons have again taken to furnishing the authorities with false accounts implicating Hindus. The rumours that they have set afloat are to the following effect:—

(1) That a certain Bengali anarchist is secretly teaching bomb making to the Etawah public.
(2) That funds are being raised for Mr. Tilak.
(3) That Mr. Tilak's son has come to Etawah with a view to raise the public against the Government.

The editor hopes that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor will exercise the discretion that characterised his actions in the matter last year.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 6th September 1908.

Lala Lajpat Rai and Bipin Chaudra Pal.

19. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 6th September, has the following under the heading "Westward Ho!":—

"Lala Lajpat Rai has gone to England and Babu Bipin Chandra Pal has also proceeded to Europe. This terrible coincidence has set the wiseacres of the Anglo-Indian press shaking their heads and lifting up their hands. What other motive can these men have except to push the revolutionary propaganda in England and America? A Madras paper shrieked and almost tore its hair when Babu Bipin Chandra Pal was passing the city and the ship was lying in harbour. To miss such a golden opportunity would be criminal, and Lord Morley would never be forgiven by his successors. Of what earthly use is the Regulation for the deportation of political offenders if it is not enforced against Babu Bipin Chandra Pal? It is not clear what is to be done with Lala Lajpat Rai. He cannot very well be deported again so soon after his release. The fatuous folly of these hysterical vapourings cannot too severely be condemned. It is known that there are Indian revolutionists in England and America, but they have not been taught by any Indian. The presumption that Lala Lajpat Rai and Babu Bipin Chandra Pal are preachers of revolution is gratuitous. Are revolutionary ideas disseminated by this man or that man, or do they come themselves like the winds of heaven? Individuals do not count in great commotions. The natural explanation given by English thinkers and writers should be sufficient to prove that revolutionary movements are not dependent upon individuals, but upon a general leavening and should be taken seriously."

AL BASHIR, 1st September 1908.

Causes of the unrest in India during the year 1907-8.

20. In continuation of his article entitled "The Causes of Unrest in India During the Year 1907-8" (vide paragraph 15, Selections no. 35), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 1st September, goes on to prove that had Bahadur Shah taken an active part in the Mutiny, he would have tried to win over the other native ruling chiefs to his side. And since nothing is forthcoming to prove any such attempt on his part, he was clearly not concerned with the rising of 1857. The editor also contradicts the assumption that the annexation of Oudh was the cause of the Mutiny.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 6th September 1908.

Loyalty meeting at Benares.

21. The following is an extract from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 6th September :—

"We have had telegraphic information of a successful meeting in the Town Hall on Wednesday last, presided over by no less a personage than His Highness the Maharaja of Benares. If this action on the part of the citizens is able to hasten in any appreciable degree the much-wished-for response as shadowed forth in the resolutions, we would heartily congratulate our Benares friends. But their earnest wishes, even though so influentially expressed, will, we are afraid, meet with very little courtesy from those who have no faith in protestations from high housetops. We would not for a moment listen to the whisperings of sly birds into our ears that these phenomenal manifestations may in any way be prompted by feelings of self-aggrandisement, but there are at times aspects of such phenomena which stand as foils to such manifestations and must needs draw our attention. In earnestness and dignity the three resolutions of the meeting have very little to be desired. Indeed we are happy to mark a tone which has been so long absent from many resolutions of a like purpose. But the Maharaja could very well have kept within himself his knowledge of the piece of comparative criminal jurisprudence learnt of an itinerant German. For us, the opposite principle is very valuable. The whole history of British criminal jurisprudence or for the matter of that our own Shastric lore, would give a lie to the German proposition. Every man's house in India may not at present be his castle. We are not perhaps in a position to prevent a daylight or a 'midnight' police raid, but we cherish the principle that it is better by far that a thousand guilty persons should escape than that one innocent man should suffer. It will be an evil day indeed when we shall be asked to unlearn this."

OUDH AKHBAR, 8th September 1908.

The Musalmans of India.

22. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 8th September, referring to affairs in Turkey, remarks that the Musalmans there have effected a rapprochement with members of other nationalities with a view to bringing about a peaceful settlement of affairs. Will this, asks the editor, have any effect upon the Musalmans of India, or will they still continue to stick to their policy of "exclusion"?

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 5th September 1908.

The election of the Raja of Mahmudabad as a member of the Supreme Legislative Council.

23. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 5th September, while referring to the election of the Raja of Mahmudabad as a member of the Supreme Legislative Council, remarks that the opinion expressed by the Hindu press that the Raja's election has proved conclusively that the Hindus are not prejudiced against the Musalmans and that it is not necessary for the Government to have class representatives on its council reform programme, is not true. The editor thinks that this is a clever move on the part of Hindu politicians to hoodwink the Government and prevent it from doing justice to the Musalman community. The Raja of Mahmudabad repeatedly tried to be elected a member of the Provincial Legislative Council but failed in his efforts. No sooner, however, was the Government's intention of introducing class representation declared, than the same gentleman is returned a member of the Imperial Council. This clearly shows that the Hindu electors had some sinister motives in electing him. Besides this, the Musalmans cannot have much confidence in a man who has been elected by a majority of Hindus, although he may belong to heir own community.

The India Council.

MASHRIQ, 8th September 1908.

24. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 8th September, referring to the rumour that Mr. Malabari is about to be appointed a member of the India Council, remarks that it would be better if Mr. R. C. Dutt or Mr. Amir Ali could be selected, who are two of the recognized leaders of the people.

The Indian problem in South Africa.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, September 1908.

25. Mr. L. W. Ritch, Secretary, South Africa British Indian Committee, London, in an article on the Indian Problem in South Africa, in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad) for September, condemns the exclusive policy adopted by the European colonists in Canada, Australia, and South Africa. Referring to Australia, he says that there are many parts of the country which can be developed only by Asiatic labour; but he thinks that the exclusive policy adopted by the white colonists of South Africa is entirely unjustifiable, as the number of natives in the country is ten times as great as the number of white people. The Bantus and other natives of South Africa, he says, are intelligent and amenable to civilization. With regard to Indians and other Asiatics, he says :—

"The conduct of the Transvaal and of Natal towards their settled Asiatic population, is all of a piece with the native policy. Indeed, as great as it is, it almost certain that the anti-Asiatic attitude is, to a great extent, a corollary of that policy. The South African politician regards with disfavour the introduction of an alien coloured element, largely on the ground of his dangerous influence upon the quickening self-consciousness of the native. During the recent struggle, there were not wanting frank admissions that the disinclination on the part of the Asiatics to submit unquestioningly to the dictation of the 'Whites' was calculated to react dangerously upon the native mind. The question of colour is thus seen to occupy pride of place. Curious as it may appear to those whom distance enables us to see in truer perspective, the fact of prejudice, deep and unshakable, based upon the matter of colour alone excites no surprise in the Africander. The Grondwet of the Transvaal Republic laid down as a fundamental article of its constitution 'that there should be no equality between white and coloured.' Trade jealousy and an ignorant intolerance of unfamiliar customs and manners have contributed largely towards the anti-Asiatic antagonism. The presence of indentured labour—Chinese in the Transvaal and Indian in Natal—has likewise furnished much fuel to the racial fire. White labour, if not presently assailed, feels itself potentially threatened. The recent success of the Asiatic passive resistance against the Transvaal Registration Law, while it undoubtedly raised the community in the opinion of a section of the Europeans, has seemingly but strengthened the determination of the several colonies to either rid themselves altogether of their Asiatics or else to reduce them to the dead level of the native. A party leader recently delivered himself of the view that coloured immigrants should be given no rights beyond those enjoyed by natives. It should be remembered that the disabilities imposed upon Asiatics by the late Transvaal Republic have never been removed, so that 'taxation without representation' is still true of British Indians who are moreover incapable of owning fixed property save in locations set apart for them, to which they are furthermore liable to removal. The Indian opposition to the Registration Law was justified partly on the ground that there was reason to suspect that registration would at no great interval be followed by compulsory removal to locations. The experiences of the Indian community in 1903, when locations, in some instances miles away from the towns, were marked out and the Indians ordered to remove to them, may have afforded reasonable excuse for some such suspicion. Like the law itself, the locations still exist, and telegraphic news is just to hand to the effect that the new draft Gold Law of the Transvaal embodies a clause which will operate to deprive Indian merchants and other traders of their right to trade in Johannesburg and other towns situated in the mining area, save in locations.

Natal confessedly owes her prosperity, nay, her very existence to the labours of the patient and poorly recompensed Indian coolie. For forty years Natal has drawn on India's manhood for her own physcial upbuilding. To-day the Colony feels itself capable of dispensing with India's assistance. Perhaps the coolie labour, with power to repatriate the used-up corpus, might still be tolerated, but public conscience in England, if not within the Colony itself, is sufficiently sensitive to revolt against such a proposal which, however, has not infrequently been submitted for sanction to His Majesty's Government. The Indian trader must, however, be got rid of at any cost, and so news comes to hand that a Bill is to be introduced at the next session of the Natal Parliament with the object of repatriating—or expatriating ?—Asiatics during the next ten years, always allowing compensation where vested interests are disturbed. Far-reaching as this decision may be, the blow to those immediately concerned might be tempered by the qualifying element of compensation were it not for the existence of a law, the Dealers' Licenses Act, which virtually empowers Licensing Boards established in the several districts of the Colony, to withhold in their absolute discretion, renewals of existing shop and other trading licenses. These Boards are not infrequently composed of local European shopkeepers, themselves the bitterest opponents of Asiatic traders, and when the fact is recalled that last year no less than thirty renewals of old, established, and reputable Indian shopkeepers were refused in one district alone, and that a similar policy has already been initiated this year, some idea may be gathered of the probable value of the compensation clause above referred to.

The disabilities herein specified by no means constitute a complete list ; rather are they suggestive of the general attitude of the European Colonist towards the Asiatic. Whether such attitude can be maintained indefinitely, time alone will show. This at least is certain that it is a complete reversal of the principle which guided the original building of the Empire and that it is being maintained without any regard for the welfare of that Empire as a whole and in the narrowest and least Imperialistic spirit."

The murder of the approver.

26. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 9th September, referring to the opinion expressed by the Statesman (Calcutta), that the murderers of the approver, Norendro Gossain, must be seriously dealt with, remarks that this opinion will be endorsed by the more sober Indians also, but it would be more politic to deal leniently with them, as to do so would have a highly palliative effect on the unthinking masses.

ADVOCATE, 10th September 1908.

The Tinnevelly riot case.

27. Referring to the judgement in the Tinnevelly riot case, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 10th September, observes "from sentences of excessive severity in sedition cases to the same in cases of rioting, which are supposed to have a political complexion, is but an easy transition. We are not, therefore, justified in being wonder-struck at the action of Mr. C. G. Spencer, I.C.S., Sessions Judge at Tinnevelly, in imposing on persons accused of complicity in the riot that took place at that town in March last—sentences of seven years' transportation and five years' rigorous imprisonment and heavy fines—sentences unheard of in such cases. When the fact that these sentences have been awarded to men who were pronounced not guilty by the assessors is borne in mind, their severity comes into bolder relief. It is true that the Judge was not bound, by the opinion of the assessors, but to the ordinary layman it does strike as a matter of simple commonsense that it should have gone towards a mitigation of the sentence awarded. Some of the accused were, however, men of education and fame, position in society, and the temptation was therefore the greater, in all probability, for the trying Judge to punish them with unexampled severity."

He says that "on reading Mr. Spencer's judgement, which is published in full by the Madras papers, surprise altogether ceases at the manner in which Mr. Spencer disposed of the case. The occasion was wanting for Mr. Spencer to distinguish himself exactly to the same extent that his friend Mr. Pinhey did in the case of Chidambaram Pillai and Subramania Siva, but that he has utilized it to the full in the same sense as Mr. Pinhey did is abundantly evident from many passages in his judgement which might have possibly been appropriate in the mouth of the counsel for the prosecution and which were so injudicial as to destroy that confidence in a Judge's serene impartiality which is so essential in the interest of all concerned."

The editor quotes a few passages from Mr. Spencer's judgement which, he feels confident, will satisfy the readers that the strictures passed by him on the judgement are fully deserved.

In his opinion there has been a miscarriage of justice and Mr. Spencer's judgement ought to be enough to satisfy impartial public opinion that the Judge did not bring an entirely unbiassed and judicial mind to bear on the case, and while the sentences are in any case unjustifiably severe, the conviction was not just in the case of some of the accused.

Tempering justice with mercy.

28. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 10th September :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 10th September 1908.

"Mr. G. Subramania Iyer's is not the only case in which the Madras Government has wisely desisted from enforcing the full rigour of the law. In another case in which a young preacher was charged with sedition, he was sentenced to transportation for five years. There was another case pending against him, but in the second, the Government entered a nolle prosequi. The Governor of Bombay has twice remitted the sentences passed on batches of persons recently convicted in the riot cases, as they were merely misguided men excited by others. These acts of mercy and several other acts of personal kindness shown by Sir George Clarke are having an excellent effect in soothing the irritation in Bombay. In our own provinces we have it on the authority of the Lieutenant Governor that newspapers as a rule are not prosecuted for sedition without warning, but no consideration is being shown to Hoti Lal Varma. He has been sentenced to seven years' transportation for sending a seditious telegram and is now being tried for circulating a seditious pamphlet. Evidence has been produced to show that he is a revolutionist and possibly an anarchist, but he has not been charged with waging war against the King or conspiracy. The sentence already passed upon him is quite sufficient and we think the Local Government would have exercised a wise discretion by withdrawing the second charge against him. The great object of punishment in such cases is not only that it should be deterrent, but also that it should commend public approval. Ferocity is no part of retributive justice. Sentences recently passed in political cases have been freely designated by the most temperate organs of public opinion both here and in England as 'barbarous'', 'savage,' 'vindictive' and 'ferocious.' Such sentences excite the indignation of peaceful people, while they tend to multiply the numbers of the desperate and the defiant."

Income tax in Benares.

29. The Bhárat Jiwan (Benares), of the 7th September, complains that the recent enhancement in the income tax on shopkeepers and others in Benares has been quite arbitrary and that it is calculated to injure trade very seriously. BHARAT JIWAN, 7th September 1908.

The Benares Municipality.

30. Referring to the precarious financial condition of the Benares municipality, the Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 8th September, suggests the abolition of certain posts, such as that of Secretary to the municipality, and the reduction of the salaries of various other officials. The editor also proposes the holding of an annual fair like that at Ballia or Sonepur (Harihar Chhater), where cattle shows might be periodically held. He would also like to see municipal taxes reduced on articles of daily consumption. AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 8th September 1908.

The Cawnpore Agricultural Station.

31. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), reviewing the annual report of the Cawnpore Agricultural Station, in the issue of the 6th September, remarks that apart from showing the genuine interest which the Government takes in such matters, agricultural experiments of this kind are of very little value to the general body of the cultivators who from their habits and education are ages behind the standard at which the value and effect of such experiments can be fully appreciated and employed. The quality of the result obtained, as shown in the report, says the editor, does not give us any hopeful prospect of scientific agriculture in the future, the only use that the cultivators can presently make of such farms is that here and there they can obtain and introduce a superior variety of seed or useful agricultural implements.

ADVOCATE, 10th September 1908.

The aim of agricultural education.

32. The following is from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 10th September:—"Following in the wake of the organization of the Department of Agriculture, Imperial and Provincial, we have the founding of new or the better equipping of existing agricultural colleges in several parts of India. What is the object of all this attention and expenditure? Not to get revenue officers with some knowledge of agriculture, not to turn out agricultural graduates who would not go to the land, but mainly to bring the new knowledge to the actual tiller of the soil, so that he may learn to follow the best methods in his daily work. So, a class in a college is not so great a necessity as practical demonstrations to comparatively ignorant people. Such education must, to be of real value, affect not so much the schools as the villages; it should aim not at teaching boys to pass examinations but at strengthening the tillers of the soil in their efforts to gain a livelihood. Such teaching should advance from the practical to the theoretical, from the land and the implements of husbandry to the science on which practices are based. Nay more. It should create captains of agricultural industries who armed with the knowledge will ultimately command the capital and have the enterprise to take to this occupation, justifying the education given them and putting heart in the ordinary cultivator to venture into new paths of progress."

AL BASHIR, 1st September 1908.

Muhammadans in the Jail department.

33. A correspondent writing to Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 1st September, remarks that owing to the high-handedness of their fellow countrymen, Muhammadans are being cruelly deprived of their rights and there is no one to raise a voice for them. Wherever you may turn your eyes, whatever department you may take up, you will find Hindus and Hindus alone preponderating everywhere. And since Muhammadans have always avoided them and associated with the Government they are openly repulsed and looked upon with contempt. To prove his contention, the writer gives a comparative statement showing the number of Muhammadans and Hindus in the Jail department and comes to the conclusion that the former are in the minority. He appeals therefore to the leading Muhammadan journals to take up the matter of a more liberal introduction of the Muhammadan element into this department.

The editor in a subsequent note also remarks that considering the present political situation, it is essential to associate Muhammadans with the jail administration on a larger scale, for it is very probable that the sedition mongers who on coming out of the jails are called Srijuts, Misters, &c., are being treated with undue leniency by their fellow castemen while they are undergoing their term of imprisonment.

SAHIFA, 5th September 1908.

Assault by Europeans.

34. The Sahifa (Bijnor), of the 5th September, while referring to an assault by two European railway employés at Dhanbaid, East Indian Railway, on an Indian clerk who caught them in the act of molesting some cooly women, remarks that it is such actions which lead to discontent and unrest. If Indians oppose them, they are called seditionists, but there is no one to prevent the ruling race from violating the chastity of innocent women and from assaulting poor helpless Indians.

Famine relief officers.

35. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 8th September, referring to the valuable services rendered to the country by the famine relief officers, urges Government to reward them substantially by appointing them to permanent posts, and not to dismiss them with flimsy certificates of merit.

(a)—Foreign.

The Turkish constitution.

1. A Hindu writer in the Zamana (Cawnpore), for August, makes the following observations on the Turkish constitution :— ZAMANA, August 1908.

"Let us see how long our Moslem brethren continue to sing their song of loyalty [to the British Government (?)]; and how long they lie prostrate to secure Government favour and patronage. It will not be strange if the strong wind from the head quarters of the Caliphate affects them too. It will certainly be a wonderful thing if they continue to retain their manly feelings. The Sultan has not granted the constitution on account of loyalty meetings; the reason is quite different. What a mess we have made of loyalty. Open your eyes and see that people who were regarded as disloyal, mischievous and rebellious and deserving of punishment, are now honoured as patriots, leaders of the people and as the builders of the edifice of liberty."

The Pan Islamic Conference.

2. Nawab Mushtaq Husain writing to the Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 9th September, objects to the Pan Islamic Conference proposed to be held at Mecca every year during the days of the Haj, on the following grounds :— ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 9th September 1908.

(1) Men speaking different languages will find it impossible to decide in what particular language the proceedings of the Conference are to take place.

(2) Men coming with a religious purpose in view will not care to devote their time to conferences of a secular nature.

(3) It will be impossible to give practical effect to the deliberations of the Conference.

(4) Though avowedly a non-political body, the Conference cannot escape the baneful effects of politics.

(b)—Home.

The present situation.

3. The Ánand Kádambini (Mirzapur), for March and April (received on the 10th September), notes with regret the political disturbances in the country ever since the partition of Bengal was effected. The editor thinks that a sympathetic and conciliatory policy, rather than a policy of repression, will go a long way towards reassuring the public mind. He says that repression will ever be futile in the administration of India and that the satisfaction of the demands of the people will secure quiet and peace in the country for ever. ANAND KADAMBINI, March and April 1908.

The future of India.

4. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 12th September, while referring to the past greatness of India, exhorts the people to bestir themselves in the following words :— SWARAJYA, 12th September 1908.

"You have been created out of Divine light. Divine light exists in you. You are the living vice-regents of God on God's earth. Your life has one object or another. Make yourself competent and well-qualified. Be brave and make yourself strong and powerful; wipe off the brand of cowardice that is on you forehead. Don't be cowardly or timid any longer. It is sheer folly to be afraid of death. You may have to traverse long distances. You may have to endure troubles that are beyond description, but don't lose courage, remain firm and steadfast and gain everything by degrees. It is your duty to press on. Put this into practice and then you will see how you secure Divine assistance. Your greatest right is liberty. Make yourself worthy of it. Obtain liberty of action, speech and writing. Make progress in industries and arts, sciences and crafts, self-respect and greatness, and thus accomplish your mission. O! ye fools, do not fear death, die the death of brave and valiant men, sacrifice your lives for your country and your people like brave men, and your death will lead to eternal life. Dying the death of cowards is tantamount to going to hell. You are believers in transmigration, then why are you afraid of death? Your soul never dies. You leave one body and enter another, just as you take off soiled clothes and put on clean ones. See, this is the time for making progress. America and Japan have outstripped you in the race (of advancement); you are lagging a good deal behind. Open your eyes, and do not let this valuable opportunity pass away. There is no use in wasting time. Be men. Make a name for yourselves, and live like men. Prefer honour to death. To gain your object, to obtain glory, greatness, pomp and power, and to revive your arts and industries, dive deep into the sea, jump into the flames, climb the steepest mountain, don't care for swords and the showering of shells from connons on your heads, and bear all the blows on your breasts, which are your natural shields ; but do not take to your heels.

This is the secret of your glory and success. This will confer liberty on you, will place Swaraj at your feet. But remember one thing, do not go against the law of nature and the law of the times [of the existing Government (?)], do not be overcome by ignorance, bigotry, animal passion and selfishness nor ever entertain such things."

SWARAJYA, 12th September 1908.

Nationalism in India.

5. The editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), in the issue of the 12th September, remarks :—

"Nationalism is a religion. Every one who comes into its fold is an instrument in the hands of Providence for the liberation of his country. The existence of any particular individual is not essential to the progress of its work. Neither Tilak nor Ghosh count anything where the hand of the Almighty is itself directly visible. 'Oppression, oppression' such is the cry we hear coming from every direction. And we at times in our dispair seriously question the beneficience of the Almighty Father : we cry out 'Why this oppression ? Why this pain ? not knowing that oppression and pain serve some purpose in the economy of the Universe. Pain deters men from committing sins. Pain is the call to duty.'

Oppression cannot be successful—remember this Oh ! ye countrymen. If the Government is oppressing you, it is treading upon the sloping path of its own fall. You should have confidence in the Divine Nature of your mission. Let your country be your religion and let your voice echo 'victory to the motherland.'"

AL BASHIR, 8th September 1908.

Causes of the unrest in India during the year 1907-8.

6. In continuation of his article entitled "Causes of the Unrest in India During the Year 1907-8 (vide paragraph 20, Selections No. 37), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 8th September, remarks that owing to the suspicion attaching to Bahadur Shah, all Muhammadans are branded as rebels and it is consequently necessary to prove their loyalty. The editor then proceeds to examine once more the various allegations regarding Bahadur Shah's complicity in the Mutiny and comes to the conclusion that in view of the dissensions that were rife among the members of the royal family, it was quite impossible for him to have contemplated any measure against the Government.

In conclusion, he again refutes the theory that holds the annexation of Oudh responsible for the Mutiny.

ABHYUDAYA, 11th September 1908.

Sedition and the proposed reforms.

7. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 11th September, says that the introduction of the proposed reforms will not remove the existing discontent in India unless the Government gives up its present policy of repression and tries to conciliate the people by sympathetic treatment so as to prepare them to appreciate the advantages of the coming reform. In this connection the editor points out that the withdrawing of the charges against Mr. S. Subramania Iyer has done more to enhance the prestige of the Government and alleviate discontent in the country than the severe sentences passed on Mr. Tilak and Chidambaram Pillay which have only tended to excite popular sympathy for the sufferers and to intensify the existing discontent.

SAHIFA, 12th September 1908.

The effect of seditious movements on the masses.

8. The Sahifa (Bijnor), of the 12th September, remarks that it is only men of the middle class who suffer from the evil consequences of seditious movements in India. They alone, therefore, ought to enjoy the benefits also of the success of any political agitation. On the contrary, we find, says the editor, that reforms which are granted in deference to public opinion, benefit members of the higher class exclusively. This points to the selfishness of those who lead political agitation in India. Would that the masses were to realize this and to abstain from blindly following their lead. The public would think it worth their while to sacrifice their lives in political agitation only if, as a result of it, the export of grain to foreign countries were stopped.

Suppression of anarchism in Bengal.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th September 1908.

9. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 17th September, has the following under the heading "Isn't it Demoralizing":—

"Between terrorism on the one hand and loyalty demonstrations on the other the Government of India seems to be losing its head. Money is being spent like water, and the Criminal Investigation Department and the criminal lawyers are having a merry time. Houses are being searched on the slightest pretext and men are being arrested and chalaned on the flimsiest evidence. Houses of influential men are searched, nothing incriminating is found; influential and educated and cultured men are arrested and then let off for want of evidence. From the Raja and rich zamindar down to the Tol Pandit and mukhtar, everybody is at the mercy of the informer. The police is exhibiting an incompetency and negligence which is unique even in the annals of the Indian police. If anything is calculated to destroy the prestige of, and faith in the administration, surely it is this. The moral and physical force at the back of the administration is strong enough for twenty thousand gangs of such anarchists as are taking their trial before the courts in Bengal. The arm of the law is long enough and strongh enough to reach and crush every anarchist conspiracy, even though for every single individual caught, there were a thousand others who have not yet been caught. Conciliation and not repression is the remedy; then anarchism will be impossible and sedition will disappear."

Murder of the approver.

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 8th September 1908.

10. The Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 8th September, while referring to the murder of Norendro Nath Gossain, the approver in the Alipore bomb case, remarks:—

(1) that the revolvers must have come into the possession of the accused by the connivance of some of the employés of the jail, who should be found out and severely dealt with;

(2) that anarchism still shows signs of life and has not been entirely suppressed; and

(3) that the unrest in the country has not as yet subsided, but is becoming more chronic.

The editor advises the Government to call a conference of the leaders of the people and to redress their standing grievances. But he thinks that the difficult problem that confronts the rulers of India at present cannot be solved by the "men on the spot" and appeals to the Home Government to restore order in India.

Murder of the approver.

SWARAJYA, 12th September 1908.

11. The editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), writing in the issue of the 12th September, under the heading "The Wages of Sin is Death", remarks that Gossain, the approver, was guilty of implicating the lives of several innocent men, and although every precaution was taken to protect him and he intended to leave for England as soon as the case was finished, yet the will of God prevailed, and hehas suffered for his misdeeds. "In our opinion", says he, "it is the Government which can derive the greatest advantage from his murder. It was possible that an act of injustice might have been committed on his false evidence. By the death of Gossain, God has rendered justice possible. If Government does not take advantage of this, it should be prepared to bear the blame of thwarting the will of God (?)."

Mr. Subramania Iyer.

ADVOCATE, 13th September 1908.

12. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 13th September, while referring to the action of the Government in withdrawing the charges of sedition against Mr. S. Subramania Iyer, remarks:—

"The sequel is, however, not only a case of all's well that ends well, but that of something more. The attitude of the Government has been appreciated in the press and on the platform; its prestige has been enhanced and better feeling between it and the people established. The good work that has thus begun, may be expected to be rounded off by a similar conclusion of the sedition cases pending decision and by a sensible, if not total, remission of sentences passed on political offenders. Other provinces, too, have a lesson to learn from this generous attitude exhibited by both Sir George Clarke and Sir Arthur Lawley. The sedition campaign must be tempered with generous considerations so as to rob it of the air of vindictiveness that seems to be its chief characteristic. Lord Minto has also to consider the fact, admitting that Mr. Iyer was really guilty of the charges brought against him, that the recent measures of the Government were such as to turn even such a tried and life-long friend of British rule in India into a fomentor of sedition and class hatred in his old age burdened with enfeebled health. For both the Government, Imperial as well as Provincial, and the people, this case has some lessons which if learnt properly cannot but lead to very satisfactory results for the rulers and the ruled.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th September 1908.

Mr. Tilak.

13. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 17th September, referring to Mr. Tilak's transportation, remarks :—

"Whatever his offence in the eyes of the Government, it is cruel to confound him with the hardened and dangerous criminals and murderers who form the convict colony of the Andamans. To a cultured man suffering from diabetes and over fifty years of age, six years in an unhealthy climate surrounded by the worst criminals may mean almost certain death. That is a heavy responsibility for the Government to undertake, and we can only hope that Mr. Tilak will return to his country after his term. But who knows what will happen in six years? How many of us will have crossed the bar under the eye of the Pilot who never brings back any barge, and how many friends and colleagues of Mr. Tilak will be left to welcome him home!"

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th September 1908.

Wanted a Convict Settlement.

14. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 17th September, has the following under the marginally noted heading :—

"Seeing the growing tendency of the courts to sentence political offenders to transportation, the length of the sentences being utterly disproportionate to the offence, is it not time for the Government to think seriously of providing a convict colony for the offenders? Mr. Tilak's is one case but many others have been sentenced to transportation for the offence of sedition and fresh cases are occurring almost daily. A preacher has been sentenced at Coimbatore to five years' transportation. These sentences themselves will produce new preachers and writers of sedition. For the sake of common humanity, we ask, is it right that these men should be herded together with the criminal convicts of the Andamans? They might be spared at least that degradation. There is no moral delinquency in their offence; Englishmen need not be told of that, though we must regretfully admit that Anglo-Indians do not always retain the instincts of Englishmen. If no other place can be found why not have a political convict settlement in Upper Burma? Mandalay served very well for a political detenue. Why not have a colony somewhat higher up and have it fenced off? We offer this suggestion in all seriousness and we hope its propriety will be recognized."

MUSAFIR, 8th September 1908.

Government and the Arya Samaj.

15. The editor of the Musáfir (Agra), in the issue of the 8th September, while expressing his desire to make a tour in the Madras presidency and the Punjab in connection with his Suddhi mission (conversion to Hinduism, accompanied by certain purificatory rites), remarks that his recent tours in these provinces have brought to light certain facts which deter him from his mission. He has come to know that members of the Arya Samaj do not attend to their religious ceremonies for fear of being associated with politics and anarchism. When he heard of this for the first time, he thought it was simply weakness on the part of the Arya Samajists, for he was strongly convinced of the policy of neutrality observed by the Government in religious matters. But his recent experiences show that matters are misrepresented to the Government by over-zealous and bigotted Muhammadan Police officers. Wherever he went, whatever meeting he addressed, he found only Muhammadan Sub-Inspectors to take notes of his lectures. Besides, he found that certain Muhammadan papers, the Rohilkhand Gazette of Bareilly for example, have constantly tried to give a political aspect to his purely religious mission. He was advised by some of his friends to sue the editor of the above-named paper for libel, which by the way, would not have been the first case of its kind against him, but since he has a great faith in the good sense of the present Lieutenant Governor, he did not listen to their advice. But in view of the fact that such constant misrepresentations by those who have found an opponent in the Arya Samajist cannot go long without producing their effect, he appeals to the Arya Pratanidhi Sabha, Lahore, and to the Government to devise means to remove the suspicion that Government is hostile to the samaj. Considering the fact that the public is fast loosing faith in the Government's policy of neutrality in religious matters, owing to such misrepresentations, this step, says the editor, is all the more essential.

Government as the protector of every religion.

16. A correspondent writing to the Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 9th September, remarks that it is no mean flattery to say that the present system of Government is the best for the Musalmans of India. Under the ægis of this benign Government, every one is free to promulgate his religious ideas within reasonable bounds, and the fact that the Government has of its own accord granted land to the Nadwat-ul-Ulama is eloquent of the interest which our rulers take in religious matters. The Musalmans should not agitate, but should have confidence in the ungrudging support of the Government in matters concerning their national welfare.

In conclusion, the writer exhorts his co-religionists to lend their unflinching devotion to the British Crown and to establish a better and closer relationship with the Christian world. They should give up thinking of the Musalmans of other countries and fix their thoughts towards bettering their own lot.

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 9th September 1908.

The Government and the people.

17. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 17th September, has the following:—

"We can fully understand and sympathise with the anxiety of the Government to get declarations from the people stating their attitude towards the Government. If the people are well disposed, the advancement along the line of least resistance will continue; if the people are restless and disaffected, another course of action must be taken. But the mistake of distrusting the people has already been made. It is a serious mistake and will not help the Government in any way. Whatever any one may say—and Maharajas and loyal people are no exception—the whole country now believes that every one is directly or indirectly suspected of disloyalty. True, the Government never thought that such a terrible thing as a terrorist plot would ever appear in India, and it has to some extent unhinged the minds of the authorities. But the very nature of the movement is such that only a few persons can be involved in it. There is no country in the world in which the majority of the people are anarchists or bomb-throwers. In India the number can never be large on account of the hereditary antipathy of the people to crime of this description. If the whole country is suspected or called upon to publicly disavow sympathy with the terrorist movement, the Government will cease to move along the line of least resistance. The Government derives its strength not so much from the army which is seldom called upon to maintain order in the country, but from the support of the people themselves. The machinery that brings information to the Government is Indian. From whom was the first information of the anarchist conspiracy received? Not from any English police officer or detective, but from an Indian. So long as there is loyal co-operation and willing service on the part of the people themselves, apprehensions of extensive disaffection are baseless."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th September 1908.

Indian coolies in Mauritius.

18. With reference to a letter recently published in the native press regarding the ill-treatment of Indian coolies in Mauritius, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 11th September, suggests the desirability of Government appointing a commission consisting of one official and two non-official Indian members to inquire into and report on the ill-treatment of Indians in Mauritius and other colonies and of taking suitable steps to secure good treatment for its Indian subjects in foreign lands. Government should further ascertain how far the regulations of the Indian Emigration Act in practice are observed. The editor, moreover, urges both upon the Government and the leading Indians to take steps to encourage the industrial development of India so that Indian labourers may be enabled to find employment in their own country and not be obliged to migrate to colonies where they are subjected to unheard of miseries and troubles.

ABHYUDAYA, 11th September 1908.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 13th September 1908.

Indians in South Africa.

19. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 13th September, referring to the recent persecution of Indians in South Africa, remarks :—

"How long, oh! how long shall this state of affairs go on? Is it really a fiction, this love of justice and fair play of the Britisher? Or is it that the old sturdy race of God-fearing Englishmen is passing away? So long as Indians are treated in South Africa in the way they are treated now, so long will Extremism thrive in the soil of the peninsula of Hindustan, the Incitements to Violence Act, the Sedition section of the Indian Penal Code and the 'Good Behaviour' section of the Criminal Procedure Code notwithstanding."

RAHBAR, 14th September 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

20. Referring to the incarceration of Indian leaders in the Transvaal, and to their appeal for holding meetings of protest in India, the Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 14th September, remarks that people here have become so demoralized that they cannot do anything for their fellow-countrymen in the Transvaal for fear of official displeasure, although the Government has never disallowed honest expression of opinion on political questions of the day.

ADVOCATE, 17th September 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

21. The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), writing in the issue of the 17th September, while referring to the sufferings of the Indian settlers in Transvaal, advises the Government to adopt a policy of retaliation. He says :—

"If the Transvaaler is jealous of the Indian and does not want him to be in his country, he is no less anxious to get Indian money by competing in Indian markets. In this he and his brother from Australia sail in the same boat. The one is anxious to sell his timber and waler and the other his coal. Not so much the success of the Indian coal industry as the competition of Newcastle coal with the Indian in the western coast of India seems to have opened the eyes of the Transvaal dealer in indigenous coal. Since the beginning of the new century the coal mines in that colony are yielding an increasing output and the disposal of it must be causing anxiety to the dealer. In 1900 the Transvaal mines produced some five lakhs tons of coal of the value of one lakh ninety-seven thousand sterling. In 1905 the output was nearly five times as large as in 1900, both in quantity and value. Under these circumstances it is but natural that the mine owners require a new market for their goods, and they have sent their agents to Aden and India with the object of extending their trade to the western coast of India and Ceylon by way of Delagoa Bay. The Indu Prakash sees in this endeavour on the part of the Transvaal coal miner a splendid opportunity afforded to the Government here to secure better treatment for Indians in that colony, presumably by adopting a policy of retaliation. We remember well how in January many public meetings held in several parts of the country prayed the Government to retaliate by shutting the doors of the Indian public services to Transvaalers and by adopting such other methods."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 13th September 1908.

A protest against public expresetons of loyalty.

22. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 13th September, has the following :—

"Eager as the authorities everywhere seem to be for loyal demonstrations, the value of loyal meetings and speeches is only negative and certainly not enduring. Loyal is what loyal does, not what loyal says. The expectation that men who are busy with their own work and public duties should go about finding revolutionists and seditious literature and bring them to the notice of the authorities will scarcely be entertained now. It has been frankly deprecated in almost every quarter. It is not a dignified occupation and it is highly dangerous. Whatever may be thought of the criticism of newspapers we think some weight will be attached to the words of a man like Sir S. Subramania Iyer. This is what he writes to the Madras papers :—

'The supposition that silence on our part which has hitherto prevailed with reference to the misdeeds of bomb-throwers in Bengal argues sympathy with such evil-doers, is an error due to the overlooking of the general habits of the people of this country. Speeches and formal resolutions at meetings are methods quite new to them and when resorted to will be found confined to the fringe of population who have come under the influence of English practices in principal cities. To my mind to hold that we here are sympathisers with the miscreants in Bengal because we have not met at once and denounced their deeds, is like holding the inhabitants of a town in which a murder is committed as sympathising with the murderers on the ground that those inhabitants do not simultaneously with the Coroner's inquest, pass a resolution of their own that murder is a crime against the law of nature and man.' This is the view we have always taken as being the only one consistent with self-respect, and we elect to be silent with Sir S. Subramania Iyer rather than demonstrative with His Highness of Benares, with his knowledge of the first principle of law derived from a German tourist."

Moslems as subject races.

23. Shams-ul-Ulama Maulvi Shibli Nomani in an article in Al Nadwa (Lucknow), for August, controverts the generally-received opinion that in Moslem Civil Law there are no provisions for the behaviour of Moslems as subjects to rulers of other creeds. He says that in works on Moslem Civil Law there is a chapter entitled "Subjugation to Non-Moslems", in which it is ordained that Moslems should be strictly loyal to any Government which does not interfere in their religious observances, allows them the choice of their own Kazis, and does not interfere in their religious and theological education. All God-fearing Moslems should respect such rulers, and help them with all their main and might when occasion arises. He quotes instances from Islamic history to show that Moslems did not object to being ruled by the Tartars in Central Asia and by King Roger of Sicily who treated them considerately.

AL NADWA, August 1908.

Pandit Bhoj Dutt in Budaun.

24. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 14th September, referring to the sentiments said to have been expressed by Pandit Bhoj Dutt in Bareilly, remarks that the Pandit is reported to have said in a public speech at Budaun also that 'some day our flag will be seen floating on mosques and temples.' The editor asks if the District Magistrate has come to know of this, and if so, what opinion he has formed about it. Does not the passage referred to point to the Bengali spirit (of the defiance of law) ?

ZUL QARNAIN, 14th September 1908.

Lord Dufferin and the Congress.

25. Mr. V. Sundram Aiyar, while reviewing the new edition of Mr. Bradlaugh's Life, discusses in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for September, the question of the connection of the late Lord Dufferin with the Congress movement and tries to establish that the theory that he had a hand in shaping the lines on which the Congress might work, is well founded as it receives confirmation from the correspondence between Mr. Bradlaugh and Lord Dufferin, now published for the first time.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, September 1908.

Council elections.

26. The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for September, has the following under the heading "Topics of the Day" :—

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, September 1908.

"We cannot affect to be pleased at the result of the meeting of the non-official members of the United Provinces Legislative Council held at Allahabad the other day, for electing a member to represent them on the Supreme Legislative Council. If there was the smallest chance of genuine public opinion influencing the votes of these worthy men, the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya—who is by common consent the most public-spirited man in our provinces—would have been elected without a moment's hesitation. And it is a standing condemnation of the system of election in vogue that Babu Surendra Nath Banerjee in the Lower Provinces and the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya in the United Provinces, have no chance of being so elected. However, the election of the Hon'ble the Raja of Mahmudabad, who is the second Musalman gentleman in the United Provinces to receive this signal honour—the first having been the late Nawab Sir Faiyaz Ali Khan of Pahasu—should set at rest the idle clamour that without separate representation based on race and creed, Muhammadans and the other minorities have no chance of being represented in the Councils."

The East India Company.

27. The following are the introductory remarks to an article on the early history of the East India Company in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for September :—

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, September 1908.

"The lion painted by himself is always a glorious animal ; and the British lion is no exception to the rule. The British statesman and hero, historian and poet, all agree in painting the national virtues in the most glowing colours. The practice of logrolling, on the most extensive scale, goes on, and the public conscience is gratified rather than perturbed, as the nation, and not any particular individual, is the objective. But when another nation has to be dealt with, this attitude is altogether changed. Then the Britisher assumes a sacrosanct character, and speaks from an altitude of perfection. Yet in the case of white foreigners, he is constrained to exercise some control upon his tongue and pen, partly through fear and partly from a sense of kinship. But when a 'coloured' people, and specially a subject race, is concerned, the Britisher is subject to no such restraint, and the violence of his attacks knows no bounds. He knows that the voiceless millions are incapable of retaliating, and the articulate few cannot make their voices heard, across the oceans, before the bar of the 'civilized' world, by which is meant the western half of Europe and the United States of America. From Macaulay to Kipling, every Anglo-Indian writer has delighted in throwing dirt on the Indians. Their vices have been classified and catalogued, and labelled as 'oriental.' Of all these alleged vices, none have acquired greater currency than 'oriental' cunning and 'oriental' deceit, though it is the great Napoleon who found reason to complain bitterly of the perfidy of Albion, and to ridicule the nation of shopkeepers. The object of this paper is to give a concise account of the manner in which the East India Company first gained a foothold in India. It is entirely based on the writings of British historians and will, we trust, modify the vanity of the present-day imperialists who forget Burke's dictum that a great Empire and little minds go ill together. It will further prove that deceit and cunning are not the monopoly of the East, and that the Empire-builders of the West possessed those attributes in the fullest measure. We shall also see that the Moguls possessed the true imperial instinct of magnanimity; indeed, but for the generous indulgence of the Moguls, who received the insidious foreign traders with open arms, the East India Company, with its repeated acts of treachery, would never have succeeded in acquiring the brightest jewel in the British crown."

MUFID-I-AM, 10th September 1908.

Indian and British capital.

28. A correspondent of the Mufid-i-Ám (Agra), of the 10th September, referring to the disinclination of British capitalists to invest their money in Indian industries on account of the unrest prevailing in India, remarks that this calamity is due to mischief done by the Congress propaganda and is afraid that it will have a very depressing effect on the industries of India. He appeals to his countrymen to revert to their orderly, peaceful and law-abiding habits, and thus restore the confidence of the British people in their loyalty.

SADDHARAM PRACHARAK, 9th September 1908.

The Gita.

29. One Nardeva Shastri contributes an article to the Saddharam Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 9th September, in which he tries to make out that the Gita is not merely a religious book but also teaches politics and that it should therefore not be taken as one's guide. The writer deduces the following lessons among others from the book :—

"(1) that a revolution cannot take place as long as this principle is borne in mind that, viz.: This (soul) is neither killed nor kills others.
(2) that religion does not exclude politics.
(3) that rights are obtained by fighting and not by begging."

SWARAJYA, 12th September 1908.

"Oppression."

30. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 12th September, has the following under the heading "Oppression" :—

"As we nowadays hear cries of oppression from every corner (of the country), we intend to enter into a philosophical discussion as to what the word implies so that our readers may know what oppression is, why and on whom it is wrought, what are the remedies for it; and, lastly, what effect it has on the oppressed party. It invariably follows that when people are treated with undue severity, they cry out 'oppression, oppression.' But we ask, is severity identical with oppression? Certainly not, for when a thief, a dacoit, a scoundrel, a pickpocket or an adulterer is punished, or a murderer hanged, every one is pleased, howsoever harshly they may be punished for the crimes they have committed. And no one calls this oppression; but on the contrary every one assists in bringing them to justice and is pleased at their being punished. So we know that every human being naturally possesses the instinct of self-preservation, and wants to have everyone punished who interferes with the enjoyment of his liberty and rights.

Then what is oppression? When treating any one with severity is not oppression, is undue severity the same as oppression? It is not. If offenders were not treated with undue severity, sins would multiply in the world a thousand fold, and men would commit with impunity the sins that he now avoids. When undue severity is not oppression, then what can be called oppression? We will tell you what it is that can be so called. To prevent any one from the enjoyment of what he deserves, to deprive any one of his rights and to try to suppress the natural feelings of an individual is oppression. God has created all human beings free, and has given them equal rights. If some one comes to you and tells you that you are a slave, and takes you away with him as a slave, then this is oppression. A man is an oppressor if he interferes with your freedom of speech or writing, or with your business when you are not interfering with the liberty of any one else or doing him any unlawful harm. If a policeman comes to you and takes your cart away by force as begar, he is an oppressor, for he does not care for your rights and is putting you to trouble in the pride of his red turban. If an innocent person is thrown into prison, the authorities are guilty of oppression, for they deprive a man of his liberty unjustly, &c., &c.

The next question is why and on whom oppression is wrought. The answer is plain enough. The strong put the weak to trouble for their subsistence and deprive them of their victuals. The powerful man encroaches upon (the rights of) the weaker so that he may (himself) live in ease and luxury.

When the strong man sees that the weaker is escaping from his clutches, and when he is threatened with the danger of losing him altogether, he interferes with his work, tries to crush him without any qualms of conscience, puts him to trouble for his own comfort, calls his speeches seditious, his writings inflammatory and his actions mischievous, and although he knows that what the weaker man says is true, yet he sends him to jail, deports him and hangs him, in order to gag his tongue and to prevent him from writing and carrying on his work; and in fact does every thing to insure his own safety from danger.

It is only the weak who can be subjected to espionage, whose liberty can be tampered with and whose life can be made unbearable for them. If some one interfered with the liberty of a strong man, he would be shot, his head would be trampled on, and everything will be done to do away with him. So it is proved that oppression can be wrought only on the weak and only when they demand their rights, e.g. equality of treatment, freedom of speech and of writing; for the strong will lose their ascendency if such things prevail (?), will not be able to lead a life of luxury and comfort and will not be able to subsist at the expense of the weak.

Now what are the remedies (preventives) for oppression? When the weak person sees that his rights are being trampled upon, when he thinks that he is being deprived of his liberty, a strange and powerful feeling surges up in his heart and keeps incessantly prompting (lit. telling him) 'See this tyrant is taking away from you the gifts which God gave you. He is troubling you without any reason. Be up and doing, you are a man just as he is, you are endowed with life, you have hands and feet. What is the use of dying in disgrace and contumely? If you have to die, why do you not die for your liberty.' So this enthusiasm, this passion, suggests various remedies to him and then the oppressed party, acting upon the principle 'Even a worm will turn' begins to think how he can oppose the stronger party, overcome him, destroy his power and effect his own release.

Gradually this thought becomes deep-rooted in his mind and he sets to work to put it into practice without the least regard for his life or belongings. Meantime, as his opponent is stronger than himself, he keeps his eye on his most vulnerable point. If he sees that he can oppose him with arms, somehow or other he collects them and uses them whenever he has the opportunity. If he sees that he cannot overcome him in war, he hits upon other means, strikes in secret [has recourse to assassination (?)] and feels no qualms of conscience in having recourse to poison. In fact he leaves no stone unturned in ruining the oppressor. However vicious and condemnable this course may be, the oppressed party will have recourse to it, when he cannot put up with oppression any longer. But if the oppressor is wise and is a sensible enemy he tries to eliminate the thoughts of retaliation from the hearts of the weak (oppressed). He thinks that if the root is destroyed, the plant will not be able to grow. He tries to please them by smooth and enticing words. He makes false promises, spreads a snare of deceit and cunning, expostulates with them lovingly and wipes away their tears at times (makes petty concessions); but the oppressed, if prudent, can see through his deceit, do not care for his contemptible and absurd speeches and remain engaged in work.

Under such circumstances as those enumerated above the oppressed should live where the tyrant has brought devastation in place of fertility, where thickly-populated villages are being changed into wildernesses, where the sons of Rajas can get only barley bread, where his fellow-countrymen are dying of starvation, where people are tired of plague and famine, where beloved children are being wrested by force from the lap of the mother (India), where parents, brothers and sisters or other relatives are groaning under the weight of misfortunes; so that he may take to heart their said lot, may make efforts for their liberation, save them from their oppression and may become the means of benefiting others.

The last question is 'What is the effect of oppression on the oppressed party?' The reply is clear enough. Either he will be totally destroyed, which is a thousand times better than to continually put up with misfortunes and troubles; or with his full vigour he rises up and confounds the tyrant, who generally has a cowardly nature and destroys him by striking him a single blow with his paw.

Ever remember that God is on the side of the oppressed; and

DESTROYS THE TYRANT

AND

GIVES VICTORY TO THE OPPRESSED."

SWARAJYA, 12th September 1908.

The Raja of Narajole.

31. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 12th September, referring to the arrest of the Raja of Narajole, remarks:—

"Can any tyrannous deed exceed this (in tyranny)? Even Rajas of position are being treated as thieves and dacoits. They are not proved guilty but still they are given barley bread to eat. O! India, was it written in thy 'Book of Fate' to suffer such indignities?"

KANAUJ PUNCH, 15th September 1908.

The Mohmands.

32. The Kanauj Punch, of the 15th September, referring to the fresh raids by the Mohmands on British territory, remarks that their promises to keep the peace are quite insincere and hollow. They should be treated with the utmost rigour instead of being allowed to escape scot free.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, September 1908.

The Mysore Press Act.

33. The editor of the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), writing in the issue for September, under the heading "Topics of the Day", has the following remarks on the Mysore Press Act:—

"We have gone through the proceedings of the sitting of the Legislative Council of Mysore when this Bill was read for a first, second and third time and passed into law and we must candidly own that no tittle of evidence was produced by any of the several speakers, official or non-official, who vied with one another in extending their hearty, though not intelligent, support to the Bill. In fact, a strange lack of a sense of the gravity of their action was shown by these amiable gentlemen. We had almost said that one had only to peruse their speeches on the subject of a free press to realize that it was quite possible for the highest English education to be wasted on men noted for their intelligence. We regret deeply that this Bill should have been passed at a time when the people of British India are threatened with a further instalment of restrictive press legislation, which is as unnecessary as it may be harmful. We need not doubt that the pernicious example of Mysore will be used as an argument in support of their action by reactionary administration in British India."

IV.—Administration.

(a)—Judicial and Revenue.

34. The editor of the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), writing in the issue for September, under the heading "Topics of the Day", makes the following observations on Mr. Tilak and his conviction :— HINDUSTAN REVIEW, September 1908.

Mr. Tilak.

(1) He is regarded by a considerable section of the people as their political and religious leader and even those who differ from him in politics, respect him on account of his sincerity and earnestness. Hence his conviction has offended people of all shades of opinion.

(2) He did write the article in the issue of the Kesari for the 9th June, but with his characteristic manliness he took the responsibility upon himself.

(3) He ought to have been tried at Poona, where his paper is printed and published, and where a Mahratti-knowing jury would have been available. Besides this, Mr. Kincaid, the Sessions Judge of Poona, is reported to be an accomplished Mahratti scholar.

(4) The two articles for which he was prosecuted were written within an interval of less than a month, and yet two independent charges were laid against him, instead of his being proceeded against for one offence. This was done evidently because the Government were advised that they could not be certain of getting a conviction on the first charge. Having chosen to institute two independent prosecutions, however, the Government were anxious that the two cases should be tried together. The effect of this was that Mr. Tilak failed to get the benefit of the comparative mildness,—it might almost be said, the innocence—of the first article. And the learned Judge not only granted the application of the Government, but charged the jury together in the matter of both articles, and even in the matter of the offences under both sections. It has been held by several competent lawyers that this defect of procedure may be considered to have vitiated the whole trial.

(5) The composition of the jury was very unfair and it leads one to think that the trial was a farce.

(6) He should not have been proceeded against at all under section 153A., for his criticisms were directed against the bureaucracy and not against the Government.

(7) The editor thinks that Mr. Tilak is guilty only of carelessness in language which cannot be avoided in view of the conditions under which newspaper articles have to be produced. He hopes that his friends will succeed in their efforts to obtain leave to appeal to the Privy Council, to modify the decision of Mr. Justice Davar.

35. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 8th September, referring to the judgement in the Tinnevelly riot cases, remarks that such heavy sentences remind one of the fact that when a regular Jehad was proclaimed by Muhammadans against the Hindus in Eastern Bengal during the Fullerian régime, the offenders were practically allowed to escape scot free. Why then such a heavy punishment for a similar offence in Madras? Does the Government think that this will make people loyal? Whatever be its opinion we hold that repressive policy cannot produce any good. MUSAFIR, 8th September 1908.

The Tinnevelly riot cases.

36. Referring to the heavy sentences passed on the accused in the Tinnevelly riot cases, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 11th September, remarks that the practice followed in Madras of awarding heavy sentences in political cases will cause deep regret to all the well-wishers of peaceful progress, inasmuch as such a policy will give rise to feelings of bitterness in the minds of the people which are calculated to seriously injure harmonious relations between the rulers and the ruled. The editor further remarks that heavy sentences only goad people to indignation and despair and ultimately lead to still more serious riots and disturbances. ABHYUDAYA, 11th September 1908.

The Tinnevelly riot cases.

ABHYUDAYA, 11th September 1908.

The Dehli coolie murder case.

37. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 11th September, notes with gratification the application on behalf of Government to the Punjab Chief Court for the enhancement of the sentence on the accused in the Dehli coolie murder case, and remarks that severe sentences in such cases will put a stop to murderous assaults on Indians by Europeans and that light sentences only tend to widen the gulf between the rulers and the ruled.

ABHYUDAYA, 11th September 1908.

The Midnapur conspiracy.

38. Referring to the Midnapur conspiracy, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 11th September, remarks that no one can take objection to the most vigorous steps being taken to unearth this conspiracy, but that judicious discretion should be used in making arrests and house searches, for if any innocent person is put to unnecessary trouble he cannot remain a friend of the Government. The editor says that reports of detectives and self-interested informers should be accepted with the greatest reserve and that informers should be punished if they furnish false information.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 13th September 1908.

The Midnapur arrests.

39. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 13th September, referring to the Midnapur arrests, remarks :—

" Even the Raja of Narajole is not allowed to have his own food and is living entirely upon milk. Old men, zamindars and pleaders, are brought barefooted into court and have to tramp on foot all the way from the jail and back. They are handcuffed even in court, and the Magistrate suffers it, without feeling that it is an affront to His Majesty's tribunal to bring a man in irons before a court of justice. The Midnapur affair is not like the Calcutta case. In Calcutta most of the men were arrested with infernal machines and arms in their possession. In Midnapur two bombs were found but they were merely large crackers made of the common bazar material. The only evidence was the confession of two men extorted by the police and vehemently repudiated in court. These two men were kept in police custody for weeks, without being produced before the Magistrate. In court the police officers interfered with the counsel who sought instructions from these men. There are definite and detailed allegations of police oppression, the hunting for evidence and general terrorism. We all know what the police did in the Bhatpara case. The same thing may be done at Midnapur and a number of innocent men kept in custody without any evidence against them. The effect of these things is not only demoralizing but positively dangerous. On one hand there are blubberings of loyalty in every direction, on the other there is this systematic lawlessness in the name of the law. It is the latter and not the former that will produce the greater effect upon the country."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 12th September 1908.

The military burden of India.

40. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 12th September, referring to the demand made by some Anglo-Indian journals for strengthening the British garrison in India, remarks that India will not object to this increase if the expenses it involves are borne by the Imperial Exchequer, for a large portion of the Government of India's income is spent on the army at the expense of other departments. The Russian menace is no longer of any consideration, and as Japan and Afghanistan are allies, there is little danger of invasion from beyond. For the maintenance of peace within the country, the police are more than sufficient. The editor advises the Government to spend its resources on irrigation works and thus make droughts impossible.

SAMRAT, 8th July 1908.

Water-posts.

41. The Samrát (Kalakankar), of the 8th July (received on the 16th September), suggests the desirability of separate water-posts being reserved for males and females in the interests of public morality.

Sanitation.

42. The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for September, has the following under the heading "Topics of the Day":— HINDUSTAN REVIEW, September 1908.

"Not the least of the several claims to the gratitude of the people of these provinces that Sir John Hewett has established within the comparatively brief period of his office, is the earnest and practical interest he has been evincing in the subject of sanitation than which in these days, as he has rightly said, 'there is no more important matter claiming the attention of Government.' The policy of indifference to the ravages of the plague, which we were obliged to criticise during the régime of Sir James LaTouche, gave way to one of active endeavour to arrest its spread and mitigate the sufferings of the people consequent on its ravages, since Sir John Hewett assumed the Lieutenant Governorship. His Honour has successfully enlisted the people's sympathies in the measures adopted. What gives us particular pleasure is that Sir John Hewett has directed his attention to permanent measures of sanitary improvement, foremost among these being the opening up of congested areas and the better housing of the people, without the introduction of which on a large scale the conditions which favour the spread of epidemic diseases cannot disappear."

Water-supply in Benares.

43. The Bhárat Jiwan (Benares), of the 14th September, complains of the insufficiency of water-supply in Benares for the last fifteen days and asks the municipality to make arrangements to increase it. BHARAT JIWAN, 14th September 1908.

Famine relief in the United Provinces.

45. The Ánand Kádambini (Mirzapur), for March and April (received on the 10th September), expresses gratitude on behalf of the famine-stricken population to His Honour Sir John Hewett for his strenuous efforts in alleviating their distress. The editor also notes with gratification the private relief work accomplished by the Arya Samaj and the Brahmo Samaj and at the same time finds fault with the Bharatdharm Mandal for its indifference towards charitable works. He says that the occurrence of famines in this country can be removed permanently, only when Indians are given some sort of self-government. This form of Government, he thinks, can only be obtained by the help of the Swadeshi movement and by rousing the British public to its sense of justice so that it may fulfil the promises made by the late Queen Victoria in her proclamation of 1858. ANAND KADAMBINI, March and April 1908.

Europeans and Indians.

46. The editor of the Nasir-ul-Akhbár (Meerut), writing in the issue of the 5th September, condemns assaults by Europeans on Indians, and quotes instances from Islamic history to show that the Moslems dealt justly with their subject races. He says that the white races have no claims to be called civilized in consideration of their cruelty. NASIR-UL-AKHBAR, 5th September 1908.

The sugar industry.

47. The editor of the Tohfa-i-Hind (Bijnor), writing in the issue of the 11th September, makes the following proposals for arresting the decline of the Indian sugar industry :— TOHFA-I-HIND, 11th September 1908.

(1) The system of sugar cultivation in the country is very defective. So it is obligatory on the part of the Government to place competent agricultureal advice at the disposal of cultivators.

(2) Land revenue and irrigation charges on lands intended for sugar cultivation should be reduced.

(3) The method of extracting sugar from ráb is very defective. Reforms should be introduced by popularizing Mr. Hadi's machine.

(4) Octroi duties on country-made sugar should be abolished.

RAHBAR, 14th September 1908.

Boycott of foreign sugar.

48. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 14th September, remarks that in view of the fact that Government takes no step to preserve the Indian sugar industry from foreign competition, it is desirable to boycott all foreign sugar which invariably contains objectionable ingredients. Side by side with the boycott, says the editor, efforts should also be made to produce indigenous substitutes after the most up-to-date scientific methods.

MASHRIQ, 15th September 1908.

The sugar industry.

49. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 15th September, referring to the abolition of import duties on foreign sugar, remarks that as the Government can neither offer bounties to sugar manufacturers in India, nor reduce its revenues on areas under sugar cultivation, it should at least reduce water rates on sugar-producing areas, abolish octroi duties on country-made sugar and enhance octroi duties on the foreign beetroot sugar.

KANAUJ PUNCH, 15th September 1908.

Russian sugar.

50. The Kanauj Punch, of the 15th September, referring to the exemption of Russian sugar from import duties, remarks that now the Indian sugar industry can hardly survive, for Indians cannot withstand the temptation of buying the same commodity at a cheaper price merely for the love of Swadeshi.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 12th September 1908.

The Provincial Civil Service.

51. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 12th September, complains that able and competent men in the Provincial Civil Service of these provinces, such as Mr. Muhammad Rafik, Babu Jwala Prasad and Rai Baijnath Bahadur, are not encouraged and appointed to judgeships. The editor says that the time has come when Deputy Collectors should be given permanent charge of districts, as they are thoroughly qualified for such appointments.

RAHBAR, 14th September 1908.

An appeal for Lala Dinanath of the Hindustan (Lahore).

52. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 14th September, referring to the appeals made by the different newspapers of the Punjab for the release of Lala Dinanath, late proprietor of the Hindustan (Lahore), remarks that as the Lala has served the greater part of his term of imprisonment, it would be earning the gratitude of the public for nothing if the Government released him.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th September 1908.

Malaria.

53. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 17th September, has the following :—

"The chief reason assigned for this increase of malaria is said to be the laying out of water works in the principal towns. It is not directly but indirectly that the water works is said to be responsible for this state of affairs. Wherever there is water works people will waste a lot of water and this waste water either goes to open cesspools or finds its way to open drains. And these open drains and cesspools are the breeding grounds of infection. The number of towns where they have underground drainage in these provinces is so small that they can be counted on the fingers of one hand. It is thus that the introduction of water works is a blessing in some respects but a curse in others. The introduction of the underground drainage system remedies this defect. The railway authorities will not be free from blame if malaria becomes an evil permanent in these parts as it is in Bengal. They are nearly always guilty of taking absolutely no measures for draining the pits and hollows by the side of the embankments of lines and this leads to decrease of healthiness. We have in these columns repeatedly drawn the attention of the authorities to the hollows and pits by the sides of the Allahabad-Fyzabad Railway embankments at Allahabad, but to no purpose. And these hollows and pits by the sides of railway embankments is not confined to Allahabad alone. Every one of us must have noticed them when travelling by railway trains. And since in the construction of new lines the authorities try to be as economical as possible these pits and hollows are more numerous by the sides of the embankments of new lines than by the side of the older ones."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th September 1908.

Limited Liability Companies.

54. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 17th September, referring to the increase in the number of joint stock companies in recent times, remarks :—

"The efforts of the Government should be directed to seeing that there may be fewer attempts at irresponsible exploitation with other people's money. The time has perhaps also come for the amendment of the Indian Companies Act of 1882. In the interests of the general public, the Government should require the promoters of every company to furnish guarantees of bonâ fides and good faith. The duties and responsibilities of Directors and Auditors should now be better defined. Government saw the desirability of moving in the matter of Insolvency law, it ought now to see whether there are possibilities of improvement in Company laws. We expect help from the Government also in another direction. Arrangements must be made for the publication in a general popular and easily available form of all sorts of information on matters which may form the likely subjects of our industrial activity."

Sir J. Hewett in Kumaun.

55. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 17th September, referring to Sir J. Hewett's proposed visit to Kumaun, advises him to take into consideration the following grievances of the people of Kumaun and redress them :— ADVOCATE, 17th September 1908.

(1) Men of the higher castes, such as Brahmans and Rajputs, are taken away from their homes when agricultural operations are in progress and made to work as coolies against their will in begar.

(2) The Government has reserved forests in Kumaun and many village areas have been included in these reserved forests. Thus the zamindars very often come into conflict with Forest officers. It is meet that justice should be done to this long-suffering class.

(3) There is no Arts College in Kumaun and students have to travel long distances to obtain a college education. If the High School at Almora were raised to the status of a college it would be a boon not only to Kumaunis, but to people all over the province who have delicate children, provided there were sufficient residential accommodation.

Religious Endowment Bill.

56. Referring to Dr. Rash Behari Ghosh's Religious Endowment Bill, the Anand Kadambini (Mirzapur), for March and April (received on the 10th September), remarks that it has the support of the entire educated community and that it should be passed in spite of the opposition of selfish pandas and pujaris, as it is bound to produce very good results in the administration of religious endowments. ANAND KADAMBINI, March and April 1908.

Arya Samaj* in danger.

57. The Saddharam Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 9th September, says that nowadays the Arya Samaj is being attacked both from inside and outside. Its external enemies are preventing its members from taking part in its meetings under the cover that it is sedition to do so. Covertly and overtly they are making the meanest attacks upon it. Under these circumstances, the editor urges the Aryas not to be disheartened, nor perplexed but to show to the world at large that they are enemies of falsehood and friends of truth. They should bear in mind that no earthly power can gain the victory over truth, religion and the justice of God. SADDHARAM PRACHARAK, 9th September 1908.

Religion and service of one's motherland.

58. The Saddharam Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 9th September, writes :— SADDHARAM PRACHARAK, 9th September 1908.

"Service of one's motherland is as much a duty of man as the service of one's parent. In the present condition of human progress it is all but impossible that the affairs of this world can go on smoothly unless every member of a nation serves his motherland. From a religious point of view, it is therefore the foremost duty of all Aryas to render service to their motherland, at the same time bearing in mind that this service of the motherland is not what Dr. Johnson termed 'robbery under cover of patriotism."

MUFID-I-AIM, 10th September 1908.

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 16th September 1908.

60. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 16th September, remarks that the imputation of sloth, idleness and a life of luxury to the Muhammadan Emperors of India is a gross misrepresentation of facts. They were as mindful of the welfare of their subjects as one could desire. It might be asked, when their rule was so free from defect, why did their kingdoms pass away? But to those who admit that change is the law of nature, such objections would appear more specious than real. No one should get puffed up with his temporary power and take to oppressing his fellow human beings.

GARHWALI, August 1908.

His Honour's speech at Agra.

1. The editor of the Garhwáli (Dehra Dun), referring to His Honour's speech at Agra, in the issue for August (received on the 19th September), expresses his conviction that His Honour will receive the support of all the inhabitants of these provinces in his campaign against sedition and anarchy. The editor says that the imprudence and high-handedness of certain officials are as much responsible for the existing unrest as the violent writings in the vernacular press, but assures the Government that as long as it governs the country with justice, it need not be afraid of any injury to itself. He says that the reason why the United Provinces has been so quiet and peaceful is that His Honour has always been following a sympathetic and benevolent policy in his treatment of the people, and concludes with the remark that His Honour will never have any occasion to deal with sedition or anarchy in these provinces, if he continues his present policy and takes practical steps to secure the industrial development of the provinces he governs.

ANAND, 17th September 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

2. Referring to the prosecution of Indians in the Transvaal, the Ánand (Lucknow), of the 17th September, remarks that it is such acts on the part of white men that are responsible for the unrest among Indians and not the writings of the native vernacular press.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 20th September 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

3. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 20th September, observes that the pernicious and politically dangerous effect of the stories from the Transvaal about the ill-treatment of Indian and Asiatic coolies in that colony for the sake of literally a handful of Boers and British settlers, is causing deep indignation not only in India also in Asia. He says that the inhuman and outrageous persecution of Asiatics in South Africa for absolutely no other offence than that of colour, will do more to undermine British influence and supremacy than anything else that we can think of, the present repressive measures included. In fact it is not a question of British influence only, but one of Europe versus Asia. In a neutral continent, which is neither Asia nor Europe, are gathered the representatives of various Asiatic and European races. Neither the Boers nor the British colonists are the original inhabitants and owners of the Transvaal or Natal, or of any other portion of South Africa.

Although the Boers have got the franchise and a Boer is the prime minister, yet, says the editor, they are a conquered people, even more so than Indians, for while Indians were chiefly conquered by their own countrymen the Boers were conquered entirely by the British. Consequently, the Transvaal is as much a dependency of England as India, and Indians have a right to be treated in the Transvaal in the same manner as they are treated in India. But how does the actual state of things stand? Not Indians only, but all Asiatics, including the subjects of a powerful and independent Empire like China, are treated like pariahs and moral lepers and fresh legislation is being constantly devised to degrade and humiliate them still further.

What are the laws in the Transvaal, he asks, that self-respecting Asiatics refuse to obey? The law treats them as ticket-of-leave men, or prisoners on parole. Even the municipal regulations emphasise their inferiority. All the inventive wickedness of the legislature is employed to degrade them and to drive them out of the country. They must give digital marks like criminals, they must have licenses for everything, they must not live in the white settlement, they are ordered to leave the colony on the slightest pretext.

If the Indians or the other Asiatics in the Transvaal were lawless or violent, one could understand the need for such laws. But they are everything that the Boers and the British settlers are not. They are clean, temperate, thrifty and industrious. Their good qualities have been their undoing. The colonial finds that in business the Indian is more than a match for him. Not being able to defeat him by fair means, he resorts to foul. That is the whole secret of the anti-Asiatic legislation in the Transvaal.

The story of the Transvaal, he says, is known throughout India—not merely to the newspaper reader, but to the labourer and the agriculturist. What must be their feelings when they find their countrymen treated in this fashion in another part of His Majesty's Empire ?

The editor concludes by saying that people cannot believe that Lord Elgin cannot put an end to the race legislation of the Transvaal, or to humiliating regulations. That would amount to a confession that the Transvaal is as independent as it was under President Kruger. But it is perfectly well known that Boer independence is a thing of the past. The alternative conclusion is that the British Government prefers the discontent of India and the indignation of Asia to putting a little pressure on the Transvaal Government as being the lessor of two evils.

India under the Imperial Government.

4. A writer in the Yad-i-Baiza (Sikandarabad, district Bulandshahr), for August, remarks that from the time India came under the Imperial Government, her people have made considerable progress in all walks of life. They have become wealthier, although the distribution of wealth has not been equal. Steam and electricity have replaced the old methods of locomotion.

YAD-I-BAIZA, August 1908.

Canals have been excavated, industries and arts given an impetus and beautiful and imposing buildings constructed. Above all, he says, a new life has been infused into the people which has roused them from their ancient torpor, and has led them to demand self-government. But, he says, the awakening has been merely intellectual, for the other powers are still dormant. He holds their demands for self-government to be premature and ludicurous, for in their present condition independence will do them more harm than good.

The Government and the people.

5. The Almora Akhbár, of the 31st August (received on the 19th September), expresses the opinion that the present unrest in India has been caused chiefly by Indian students receiving no religious education and that it cannot be removed unless religious and moral instruction is made part and parcel of their usual studies. The editor also calls upon the educated classes to exercise their influence to check the publication of inflammatory writings as they are the chief source of exciting the hatred of the masses against the Government.

ALMORA AKHBAR, 31st August 1908.

The Government and the people.

6. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 19th September, while complaining that the Government does not redress the crying grievances of the people, points out that among other things justice has become so expensive that the poor cannot hope to have their wrongs redressed as they cannot afford to engage barristers on heavy remunerations, while the rich can evade the ends of justice by being able to appoint counsel. The editor further complains that the comforts of third class passengers are not considered, although they contribute the most to the railway funds.

SWARAJYA, 19th September 1908.

The situation in India.

7. The Asr-i-Jadid (Meerut), for August, while referring to the conviction of various political leaders and journalists, advises the people of India to be moderate and just to each other and to learn self-control. They should try to sink their mutual differences and to safeguard the interests of the minority.

ASR-I-JADID, August 1908.

Causes of the unrest in India during the year 1907-8.

8. In continuation of his article entitled the "Causes of the Unrest in India During the Year 1907-8" (vide paragraph 20, Selections No. 37), the editor of Al Bashir, in the combined issue for 15th and 22nd September, tries to prove that the broadsheet discovered by the English army at Mahmarah in Persia supposed to be from the Shah of Persia inciting the Musalmans of India to rebel against the English, was addressed to the Afghans and Persians and not to the Musalmans of India. The Persians, he says, had no sympathy with the people of India, but spitefully wanted to see the downfall of the English. He further goes on to prove that Wajid Ali Shah, the last King of Oudh, had no hand in bringing about the Mutiny, as he was fully convinced of his innocence, and hoped that the annexation of Oudh would be annulled by Parliament. The Mutiny broke out while negotiations were in progress. He further says that if Wajid Ali Shah wanted to stir up a rebellion, he would not have written to the old and decrepit Bahadur Shah, but to the stronger princes. In conclusion he says that it is a grievous mistake to think that the Musalmans were the originators of the Mutiny.

AL BASHIR, 15th and 22nd September 1908.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 16th September 1908.

Political offenders.

9. The Riyáz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 16th September, notes with satisfaction the pardon granted to Mr. G. Subramania Iyer, and remarks that this is due to the suppliant attitude adopted by him towards the Government. The editor thinks that if Mr. Tilak behaved in the same way the Government would willingly extend to him a free pardon.

ABHYUDAYA, 18th September 1908.

The Midnapur bomb conspiracy.

10. Even the most moderate paper, the Indian Nation, says the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 18th September, has found grounds to find fault with the arrests in connection with the alleged Midnapur bomb conspiracy. The majority of the persons arrested have a stake in the country and there is no reason why they should endeavour to subvert the Government. Such action on their part is harmful and full of danger to themselves. Even if these persons are found guilty of conspiring against the Government, this problem will remain to be solved, what is it in Bengal that has goaded them to such a dangerous course ?

ABHYUDAYA, 18th September 1908.

Loyalty meetings.

11. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 18th September, says that those who are in favour of constitutional agitation are surely opposed to the practices of anarchists and that those among them who are contributors to newspapers have already condemned the anarchists in no uncertain terms, but that none of them have so far thought it advisable and necessary to denounce them in an assembled meeting, for such action can have no effect on those who at the risk of their own lives have embarked upon such a horrible course. It would, however, have been a different matter if the public would have looked upon the ideas and methods of anarchists as in any way conducive to the progress of the country. In that case, it would have been incumbent upon all the well-wishers and leading men of India to condemn the deeds of the anarchists so as to change the ideas of the general public for the better. But considering that public opinion as embodied in the native press and the most violent papers have declared that violence cannot make the country free, it is quite unnecessary to condemn the ideas and methods of the anarchists. The editor next refers to the views of Sir Subramania Iyer on the subject and remarks that silence on the part of Indian leaders does not mean that they have any sympathy with the aims and objects of the anarchists. In conclusion he observes that they alone are not the friends of the Government who trumpet their loyalty in loud notes and that those who advise the Government to adopt the severest measures to relieve the present situation in India are like quacks prescribing quite the wrong medicines.

ADVOCATE, 24th September 1908.

The Proclamation Jubilee.

12. "The idea is gaining ground that there should be a celebration of the jubilee of the Proclamation issued by the late Queen on the 1st November 1858" says the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 24th September. He then asks "how are we situated now? Certainly we are not in a state of mutiny in spite of the anarchist plot, much less weltering in gore. Nor is there any possibility of a repetition of the blood-curdling scenes of those dark days. The fifty years that have elapsed since the message of hope was given to the people on behalf of a woman sovereign have been years of steady progress—progress in education and equipment of the people as to the art of government. There has been better realization, on the part of the educated, of the responsibilities that attach to public life and to a desire for participation in the administration of the affairs of the country and, what is more, of the need of steady, peaceful progress of the country in matters social and political, educational and industrial. But while the leaders of all shades of opinion were practically consolidating the paths of progress chalked out after years of hard thinking and practical experience, a very unhappy change came over certain responsible officials that meant a serious set-back to the hands of the clock of advance. The work of two score of years was going to be undone, and it has been undone, with the most deplorable result—want of confidence in the Queen's Proclamation and in the pledges and promises of subsequent Viceroys, Governors and other high officials.

About a decade of not only stationary but actually backward rule has now landed us in a very awkward situation, very unedifying to the people and surely disquieting to those among the rulers who sincerely wish the good of the people."

The editor after this quotes a passage from the Indian World which shows the results of this deviation from the path of progress.

He then remarks: "Lord Morley, if he is to retain his claim to the high priesthood of honest liberalism and be to Indians the rivivification of the late Queen's message, will have to change all this. Nay more. He must do something more. The programme will be one of both doing and undoing, building up a new system and consigning to the past an old and obsolete one. And if we are not mistaken, the Secretary of State has got in India able lieutenants to honestly carry out his wishes. The change, however, in order to rehabilitate the Proclamation in the heart of the Indian people and what is more, to restore the people's waning faith in the British sense of justice, must be in the spirit of the administration—a heart-change and not patch-work here and there. To put it briefly, the government must be nationalized. Let not the reader start at the very expression. We do not mean the turning out of the Englishman, bag and baggage, from the Indian shores and peopling the offices, high and low, with Indians pure and simple. What is wanted is the recognition and the actual carrying out into practice of the principle that the chief functions of the State should be made to serve the best interests of the country. Nothing less than this will answer the purpose; nothing more is needed. It includes all that is worth doing not only to gain lost ground but sensibly to accelerate the rate of progress towards making the proudest day for England in India a fait accompli. All other reforms are but a natural consequence of the admission of this fundamental principle. And the jubilee of the Proclamation can only be celebrated effectively in the way indicated above."

Musalmans and politics.

13. A correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 23rd September, remarks that the theory that the Musalmans are not concerned with politics can no longer be safely maintained, as they have proved themselves to be as keenly alive to their vital interests as any other community. In support of his argument he points to the Muhammadan deputation of 1906 and its protests against the disabilities of the Indians in South Africa. He complains that Musalmans want everything to themselves, but hopes that the time will come when they will accept the doctrine of unrestricted competition.

HINDUSTANI, 23rd September 1908.

Swaraj.

14. The Saddharam Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 16th September, remarks:—

SADDHARAM PRACHARAK, 16th September 1908.

"Nowadays the educated classes are trying to make out that the system of Swaraj has been existing in oriental countries from very ancient times. But we are afraid that such theories of theirs will not secure them Swaraj. For its attainment such qualities as perseverence, valour and a strong and intense desire for an all-round liberty are required. At the time when the wave of an all-round liberty comes into resurgence, even almost demonical sovereigns like Nero cannot check it with all their oppressive restrictions. The present political condition of Asia is a proof of this. All the violence of the Shah of Persia has not succeeded in checking the spirit of liberty among his subjects."

The Swarajya.

15. The editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), writing in the issue of the 19th September, says that he saw Shanti Narain, the late editor of the paper, in a dream and that he exhorted him to be brave and courageous, and to continue the publication of the paper at Allahabad, which is but a desert compared with Bengal and the Punjab. He says that Narain said to him "Don't be afraid, you have resolved to instil life into this lifeless province, so continue your work as long as you live and the oppressive tyrants do not gag your mouth by force and imprison you like me and render you unable to work."

SWARAJYA, 19th September 1908.

The editor appeals to the subscribers of the paper to make efforts to increase its circulation.

Mr. Tilak.

16. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 20th September, while referring to the remission of the fine of Rs. 1,000 imposed on Mr. Tilak, remarks:—

ADVOCATE, 20th September 1908.

"This may be the precursor of a change in the mind of the authorities as to enforcing the ordinary jail regulations in respect of prisoners sentenced to hard labour. It may be that instead of putting him to grinding grain, or squeezing oil, or driving the quill in clerical work—which would one and all be simply unprofitable and so much labour wasted away—Mr. Tilak may be afforded facilities to go on with research work such as resulted in The Orien and The Arctic Home of the Vedas. By putting him to work of this type the Government may materially help the cause of research in the ancient history of India, make the best use of Mr. Tilak's talents, earn the gratitude of the people and lessen the bitterness caused by the conviction of Mr. Tilak."

MASHRIQ, 22nd September 1908.

Mr. Tilak.

17. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 22nd September, referring to the rumour that Mr. Tilak is about to be transported to the Andamans, advises the Government to change his destination to some more congenial place, in view of the exceptional position he holds among the educated classes in India.

ADVOCATE, 24th September 1908.

Mr. Tilak's sentence.

18. With reference to the commutation of the sentence of transportation for six years passed on Mr. Tilak to one of simple imprisonment for a like term by the Government of Bombay, the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 24th September, observes that "the entire Indian community cannot but be grateful to the Governor of Bombay for his response to public sentiment; he has brought to the solution of the most burning questions of the day a type of statesmanship which unfortunately is nowadays rare in our rulers. So long as the case was before the High Court in its different stages, the Governor very prudently kept quiet; he allowed the law to have its own full and free course. The resources of the law having been exhausted His Excellency brought into play the prerogatives that he possessed as the representative of the Sovereign and lost no time to temper justice with mercy."

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 16th September 1908.

The murder of the approver.

19. Haji Ismail Khan, writing in the Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 16th September, notes with regret the death of Gossain, the approver in the Alipore bomb case, whom he calls a martyr to the cause of his country, as he gave valuable information to the Government, although he went astray in the beginning of his career. Passing on to the present situation in India, the writer notes with regret that while one generation of Indians welcomed the advent of the English to India, their descendants are now plotting their destruction.

SWARAJYA, 19th September 1908.

"The Tyrant."

20. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 19th September, has the following under the heading "The Tyrant" :—

"In our last issue we entered into a discussion on (the nature of) oppression and in our present we shall express our views on tyrants. Tyranny and the tyrant are correlative terms. Tyranny cannot exist without (the existence of) a tyrant and no one can be called a tyrant unless he works oppression. The first question is: what is a tyrant? how does he become one? what does he do? what is his position in the world? and, lastly, how does he end his career?

Just as the five fingers of a man's hand are not all of the same size, so all men are not of the same nature. Some are pious, some sinful, some patriotic, some traitors to their country, some niggardly, some liberal. Some are selfless, others, too, are selfish; some are intolerant, whilst others are tolerant of all. Some people are black, others are white, some are ugly whilst others are beautiful, &c., &c. As there are all sorts and conditions of men in the world, their individual actions must differ from one another. In one place you will find good deeds, in another evil, in one place mercy (kindness) in another oppression, in one leniency and in another severity, in one justice and in another its travesty. God has created every human being free, so he does whatever he likes. A selfish man always tries to do everything for his own advantage, and if his methods succeed, his desires are fulfilled. But his covetousness increases in the same proportion, and with its increase he becomes conceited in himself, till at last it becomes his sole object (in life) to have his animal passions and desires gratified. They (selfish persons) think that they have been created only for this purpose. When their brain is deranged in this way, they cannot any longer distinguish between right and wrong. However base and repulsive an object may be, they will strive to attain it provided it contributes to their self-aggrandizement. It is persons of this base nature that become tyrants when they are in possession of wealth, rank or power. When a nation that is characterised by baseness and whose moral sense is dulled, has another nation under its sway and makes no effort to get rid of its national feelings, then that nation is termed tyrannical. Why? Because it lives in comfort and luxury, while its subject races perish of starvation. It dresses itself in silks and velvets, while its subjects are too poor to cover themselves even with rags. If one of its own number is killed as the result of the legitimate grievances of the people, it consigns hundreds of innocent men to death. If its subjects raise their voices (in complaint) when they cannot endure its oppression and tyranny (any longer), it considers them barbarians and criminals. Readers, such a government is tyrannical. To illustrate our meaning we will tell you of a dream that we had:—

'Many years ago there lived a very powerful King, (the reputation of) whose justice surpassed that of Naushirwan and who excelled Hatim Tai in generosity (an Arabian noted for generosity) and his enemies were greatly afraid of his power and strength. But the spiteful 'Wheel of Time' could not tolerate this (his good fortune). Some selfish, intrepid and clever swindlers came to him, and giving themselves out to be traders, 'spread the net of their cunning.' The King took pity on them and entertained the idea of improving the trade (of his country), but he could not gauge the treachery and cunning of these swindlers. Taking pity on their miserable and forlorn condition, he allowed them to trade. Thus gaining a footing in the country they gradually succeeded in ingratiating themselves and by degrees began to interfere in administrative matters. The simple-hearted King thinking them to be clever appointed them to responsible posts and allowed them to settle temporarily in the country.

Alas! the King knew not that he was sowing thistles (planning for the ruin) for his progeny. He died leaving little children behind him and the swindlers now found their opportunity to deceive them. They undertook their education, but their hearts were black (they were insincere), so they led them into temptations, brought them into contact with beautiful women of dissolate character, taught them to drink and tried their best to ruin them (body and soul) till at last they, too, passed away, leaving innocent children behind them. The swindlers brought the people under their sway and proclaimed themselves the rulers of the country. They told the innocent young ones that they would get suitable employment when they grew up, as if they (swindlers) had inherited the kingdom!! When the real heirs grew up and came to years of discretion, they found themselves in prison. When they demanded their patrimony, they got a flat refusal. Some died in prison, some in exile, while others were condemned to death. In this way their oppressors tried to make away with them, but, thank God, some of them escaped to protest against their tyranny. When tyranny, oppression, injustice and cruelty reached their climax, the ancient blood (valour) of the captives began to boil, but unfortunately we do not know with what result, nor do we care to know either, for they cried and bewailed their lot so loudly that even the sky was shaken, and so we could not continue dreaming. But as far as we can guess, we can say that the tyrants came to grief and the rightful heirs recovered their patrimony (lit. the deserving got what they deserved). For these tyrannous rulers, the rapacious traders were few in number, while the oppressed numbered millions, so they made short work of them (lit. ate them up with salt and pepper like radishes), removed the intoxication of their success, and by asserting their own unlimited powers, shattered their might.'

Let us now return to our original subject, i.e. the question as to when a man becomes a tyrant and how he then acts. When a man becomes possessed with the sole idea of gratifying his desires, his conscience becomes dead and his moral senses are gradually blunted so that he finally loses confidence in mankind and thinks every one his enemy. When his intellect becomes warped in this way, he becomes a tyrant and then he brings into action all his latent energies. But there are two sorts of tyrants, the wise (clever) and the foolish. The foolish tyrant betrays his tyrannous (proclivities) at once; but the clever one tries to keep them secret as long as possible.

Outwardly he does every thing in an unselfish and sympathetic way, tries to win over others by his honeyed words, and always trumpets his good intentions.

Many foolish and ignorant persons are taken in by such devices and surrender themselves to him; for the cleverer the tyrant is the more successful he is in deceiving others.

Outwardly he respects his subjects, but is always plotting to oppress and degrade them in order to make his hold on them the stronger, until he finally succeeds in destroying their sense of self-respect, and they think it an honour to kiss his boots.

Every nation is either virtuous or wicked, but a tyrant always tries to develop the weakness of the people whom he grinds down so that they may think themselves degraded and contemptible. He calls their ancestors barbarians and apes, so that they may view their actions with contempt. When the subject people are in such a sad plight, the tyrant seems to win and thinks that he succeeded in his object. But, unfortunately for him, he does not know the real state of things, and falls prostrate (loses his balance) and frails in his calculations.

Now what is the position of the tyrant in the world? As we have already pointed out, there are all sorts and conditions of men in the world. Some are prone to flattery, while others will say what they think to your face. The flatterers are those who have fallen under his hypnotic spell and who have lost their sense of self-respect. They exalt the tyrant to the skies. But, on the other hand, those who are true men, always look upon him with loathing and pray to God to hasten his destruction. So the tyrant, too, is ever engaged in destroying (root and branch) these honest, fearless, and dauntless critics, for he is afraid of them. The fool does not know that they are his true friends, because he is blinded by the intoxication of power and cannot distinguish between friends and foes.

It only remains (now to decide) what the (probable) end of the tyrant is. The tyrant is a flame of fire and his actions and doings are like sparks that inflame the hearts of the people and instil into them a strange spirit. On the other hand, he is tormented by his own conscience and he is never at ease owing to his restlessness. He is ever tortured about his personal safety, for many men become his sworn enemies and acting upon the principle 'even a worm will turn' are even ready to kill him and to die.

When Cæsar oppressed the people of Rome, when Frederick tortured the people of Prussia, when Napoleon paralysed Europe, cruelty, oppression, fierceness and passion created a panic in every part of the world, and its intensity was such that even the day of judgement would have asked for quarter if it had witnessed those horrible doings.

At one place a King is seen on the gallows, at another Chiefs are being flayed alive. The cry of innocent children, the wailing of women, and civil wars between Kings and their subjects were seen everywhere, and in fact the destruction of the world seemed imminent and there was a general massacre. India, too, fell a prey to these atrocities (lit. oppressions). But the scene shifted and the sceptre of power rapidly changed hands. The Sikhs rose up in one quarter and the Mahrattas rebelled in another. Nizam-ul-Mulk asserted his independence in [the Deccan (?)]. Another became the Nawab [of Oudh (?)]. Nadir Shah came like a thunderbolt. The minister became the Emperor, and the King became destitute and contemptible.

'What shall we say of Delhi when the whole world was ruined. Alas! that our India has been ruined.'

But all this was temporary; where the flame of tyranny and oppression broke out, learning and arts, justice and statesmanship became extinct. The tyrant is a fire which consumes the world and destroys the empire; wherever it breaks out it destroys (everything).

The law of Nature is a strange one. Shade is a concomitant of light. Summer follows winter. Autumn comes, but (is followed by) spring which gladdens all hearts. When God sees such a state of things, he shows his power and illumines the eyes [gladdens the heart (?)] of the oppressed. By reading the romances of history and taking into consideration the occurrences of the past, we arrive at the conclusion that the tyrant is a compound of base (animal) and indecent (lit. uncivilized) passions and selfishness. He acts contrary to the law of Nature, and is punished by God. This world is mortal, for every fall there is a rise, and for every rise there is a fall. The subjects demand their rights, and the king oppresses them.

Here there is one desire and there another.
Here there is action of one kind, there of another.

What splendid empires flourished and became extinct, leaving hardly a trace behind them. But wherever we looked we saw that

THE TYRANT WAS DESTROYED

THE OPPRESSED WERE VICTORIOUS."

Europeans and Indians.

21. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 21st September, referring to judgements in cases in which Europeans and Indians are parties, remarks that British law is a piece of rubber which expands to punish an Indian, and contracts when it is the turn of a European.

RAHBAR, 21st September 1908.

Benches and Magistrates.

22. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 23rd September, suggests the advisability of appointing two Magistrates to preside in every court to prevent a miscarriage of justice. The editor thinks that at present it would be advisable to direct one Honorary Magistrate to sit with a paid Magistrate. He is of opinion that this question is more important than the separation of the judicial and executive functions.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 23rd September 1908.

The panchayet system.

23. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 25th September, referring to the recent experiment of the panchayet system in the Patiala State, advises the Government to introduce it in its territories also, as the people are not so keenly alive to their interest as to introduce it of their own accord.

OUDH AKHBAR, 25th September 1908.

Under-trial prisoners in solitary confinement.

24. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 20th September, referring to the ill-treatment of the under-trial prisoners in the Alipore Jail, remarks:—"So long as the principles of justice are not openly repudiated, every man, no matter what his offence, must be presumed to be innocent until proved to be guilty. He may be a conspirator, he may be a regicide, but he is under trial and not a convict. Solitary confinement is one of the most terrible forms of punishment. It can be only imposed by a court of justice and cannot exceed three months in a year. For jail offences, solitary confinement cannot exceed a day. But all that is for convicts; those who have not been convicted cannot be placed in solitary confinement at all."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 20th September 1908.

The editor says that the smuggling in of the revolvers for the murder of the approver was not due to the prisoners living together but to the neglect of the jail staff. But a tragedy like that is hardly likely to be repeated. Whatever may happen, the administration of justice must not be brought into contempt. The discretion of jail authorities does not extend to the infliction of solitary confinement for weeks and months, and the Government must put an end to this scandal at once.

The Midnapur cases.

25. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 19th September, has the following under the heading "Magistrate Weston ki badmashi":—

SWARAJYA, 19th September 1908.

"The Maulvi (Mazhar-ul-Haq, the Deputy Superintendent of Police), took me to Magistrate Weston, and he (?) told me that my statement was not accurate and that I had forgotten many things, and that I should not declare before the Joint Magistrate that he had offered me some inducement or promised to release my father and brother."

The Midnapur affairs.

26. Under the heading "The Midnapur Bungle", the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 24th September, has the following:—

ADVOCATE, 24th September 1908.

"Nothing emphasises the necessity for a speedy separation of judicial powers from an officer who exercises executive functions as the bungling over the Midnapur affairs arising out of the conspiracy theory that is on the brain of the officials in that unlucky district. Persons, high and low, were put in hajat on the confessions of men of straw who again have retracted them. In spite of the boast of the District Magistrate as to the police having secured independent evidence of complicity of the accused in the alleged conspiracy, remand after remand had been taken in order, it was said, to complete police inquiry which the defence interpreted as concocting evidence. Bail had been repeatedly refused by the Magistracy and then by the Judge. When the High Court granted the petition for bail on behalf of six of the accused, unnecessary delay occurred in carrying out the orders of the supreme tribunal. These facts all the more justify the selection of Midnapur as a district where Sir Harvey Adamson's scheme of separation will be given a trial—a fair trial we hope it will be. It would have been better if the sensational conspiracy case were the starting point of this promised trial, for then it would have at once rivetted the attention of the public on the experiment and made it watch its progress more carefully."

ADVOCATE, 24th September 1908.

The Jhang Sial case.

27. Commenting on the sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment passed by the District Judge on Lala Prabhu Dayal, the editor of the Jhang Sial, the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 24th September, remarks :—

"This sentence is very heavy, considering the fact that it has been brought in evidence that the road metalled by the contractor was bad, that the Executive Engineer declared it so; that the members of the sub-committee in charge of public works declared it so; that the chairman had almost a passage-at-arms with the members for their boldness in pointing out the defects of the road. Eighteen months' hard labour for defamation like this is quite out of proportion to the offence committed. The District Judge ought not to have forgotten that the complainant was not the Deputy Commissioner of Jhang, but the contractor whose work had created dissatisfaction in the city."

(b)—Police.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 20th September 1908.

The police.

28. Under the heading "Police Raj", the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 20th September, has the following :—

"The vakil raj was an ironical fiction, but the police raj is a stern reality. Wherever there is any suspicion of sedition or revolutionary propaganda, the police become the masters of the situation. They apply for warrants and warrants are granted without any evidence being recorded. Magistrates and Judges never cross the police. If there is an application for bail, and it is opposed by the police, the rejection of the application follows as a matter of course. We do not say that a certain amount of reliance should not be placed on the police, but it is wrong to place implicit reliance upon them unless sufficient evidence is forthcoming. In the Manicktola garden conspiracy the police acquitted themselves very creditably, but they must have been helped by some one very intimately connected with the conspirators. Even then they arrested some innocent men who were acquitted in the Sessions Court. In the Bhatpara case the police failed miserably : they arrested a number of innocent men, opposed their applications for bail, took two remands without a tittle of evidence and then threw up their hands. It is utterly wrong that the police should practically dictate to judicial officers on the bench their course of action, thus depriving them of the discretion which they possess and ought to exercise. The whole atmosphere is surcharged with political suspicion. The police and the Criminal Investigation Department are supposed to hold the threads of the political unrest in their hands and therefore they must be given a wide latitude. But it is intolerable that part of the functions of the public courts should practically be usurped by the police and men should be admitted to bail or not at their will."

HINDOSTHAN, 22nd September 1908.

The Indian police.

29. The following is an extract from the comments made by the editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), in the issue of the 22nd September, with reference to the observations on the financial statement for 1908-9 discussed in the Imperial Legislative Council :—

"We quite agree with the Prince [Tika Sahib of Nabha (?)] that our police with all the efforts of the Government is not what it ought to be. And how could it be otherwise when we have kept the same corrupt police? The police have been from before corrupt and are corrupt. So according to the Persian verse :—khuyi bad dar tabiate ki mishasht na rawad juz ba waqti marg az dast (if any body gets hold of a bad habit, it does not leave him as long as he lives or he cannot leave it as long as he lives). There are only two things to make the police good. They are these : First that the public will be allowed to make complaints against the police by sending their information to the head officer of the district, and if they fail to prove it they will not be punished. This information with impunity will frighten the police in future because they should be punished if the offence is proved; but if not sufficiently proved they should be treated always with suspicion. The second is this that the old recruits should be got rid of as soon as possible and new recruits should be selected from respectable people, such as Brahmans, Kshatriyas, Sikhs, Musalmans and other respectable fighting races. It is true that police instead of being a source of comfort to those who stand in need of their assistance are a sort of terror to respectable people, who are more afraid of the police than they are of bad characters."

Sanskrit and Arabic Scholarships.

30. The editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), writing in the combined issue for the 15th and 22nd September, complains that the Government has awarded three scholarships for the study of Sanskrit and only one for Arabic. In justice, he says, the number of scholarships should have been at least equal, for Sanskrit is a dead language, while Arabic is still a spoken language, and politically, too, those who know it thoroughly may be of greater use to the Government than those who have studied Sanskrit.

AL BASHIR, 15th and 22nd September 1908.

Study of oriental languages.

31. A correspondent of Al Bashir (Etawah), writing in the combined issue for the 15th and 22nd September, remarks that the unrest in India is due to the unhampered dissemination of English literature in India, and thinks that it would be well to revive the study of oriental languages, so that young men may be more devout in religion and loyal to the Government. To encourage the study of oriental languages, the Government, he says, should make certain lucrative posts depending on a good knowledge of Indian languages.

His Honour in Kumaun.

32. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 18th September, says that during his forthcoming tour in Kumaun His Honour will see for himself what troubles people are put to on account of cooli utar and bardaish (forced labour). Just at the harvest time thousands of cultivators will have to leave their fields and come and do forced labour. Although His Honour may only require the services of a few coolies, and that too for a few days only, still a very large number will be summoned and detained for weeks. The editor further invites His Honour's attention to the confiscation of innumerable licenses in that wild part of the country which has subjected the people to the depredations of wild animals and requests him to enforce liberal rules in the grant of licenses to villagers as before. He also requests His Honour to relax the rigour of the forest regulations which press very heavily upon the population of the hill districts.

ABHYUDAYA, 18th September 1908.

Sir J. Hewett in Kumaun.

33. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 23rd September, reproduces from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 17th September, an article headed "Sir J. Hewett in Kumaun." (Vide paragraph 55, Selections No. 38.)

HINDUSTANI, 23rd September 1908.

Plague and famine.

34. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 22nd September, referring to the valuable services rendered to the public during the ravages of plague and famine by honorary workers, advises the Government to confer titles on them or to grant them medals.

MASHRIQ, 22nd September 1908.

ABHYUDAYA, 18th September 1908.

The United Provinces Sanitary Conference.

35. Referring to His Honour's address at the recent United Provinces Sanitary Conference, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 18th September, says that it fully shows the interest of the Government in the sanitary condition of the people and its earnest desire to improve it. The editor says that in order to make the people appreciate the value of sanitation it is very necessary that general education should be given on a very liberal scale and that openings should be provided by the dissemination of technical education and the development of arts and industries. He admits that His Honour has done much in this direction, but there remains much more that should be accomplished in as short a time as possible.

ADVOCATE, 20th September 1908.

The Madras Industrial Conference.

36. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 20th September, while reviewing Sir A. Lawley's speech at the Madras Industrial Conference, remarks :—

"Yet, improvement in agriculture is but half the solution of the problem. The pressure on land has actually to be lessened by turning the attention of the people to industrial pursuits. Here three difficulties face the people as well as the Government. Whether we believe or not in Sir Ernest Cable's dream of India's hoarded wealth, it is a fact that can never be gainsaid that Indian capital is very shy in coming to the market. It has to be induced to finance Indian industries. This is possible only if concerns manufacturing or dealing in Indian-made articles are encouraged. And the best way to do so is not to make fine speeches, issue sympathetically-worded resolutions, but to purchase for the use of the several departments under the State things that are made in India. So long as this is not actually done people cannot be blamed for showing little inclination to take to industrial pursuits. The other, perhaps most troublesome, impediment lies in the serious competition of foreign capital in India, what to say of articles made elsewhere. Wedded as the Government is to free trade principles, one does not know what to say as to some sort of preferential treatment that should be accorded to both Indian capital and industries in order to hold their own against the competition of persons better supplied with money and having the advantages of superior skill and improved business methods. The last, but not the least important, factor is the absence of the requisite knowledge to confidently take to industries."

HINDUSTANI, 23rd September 1908.

The Madras Industrial Conference.

37. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 23rd September, reproduces the comments of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 20th September, on Sir A. Lawley's speech at the Madras Industrial Conference.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 23rd September 1908.

A "Commercial Congress."

38. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 23rd September, referring to the commercial decline of India, suggests the advisability of holding a Commercial Congress every year to determine what articles can be produced in the country for home consumption and for export, and to find out the mineral resources of the country. The editor says that at present there is little need for a political Congress and that the people should devote all their energies to developing their industries.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 16th September 1908.

Musalmans in the Jail Department.

39. The Naiyár-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 19th September, reproduces an article from Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 1st September, regarding a more liberal introduction of the Muhammadan element into the Jail Department. (Vide paragraph 33, Selections No. 37.)

I.—Politics.

(a)—Foreign.

OUDH AKHBAR, 30th September 1908.

Unrest in French territory.

1. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 30th September, referring to the unrest prevailing in French Indo-China, remarks that it has caused some anxiety in France and proposals are being made with a view to associating the people on a larger scale in the administration of their country. This, says the editor, is a move in the right direction and if followed by the British Government in respect to India, will cure the evils that render the condition of India somewhat similar to that of Indo-China at present.

(b)—Home.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 23rd September 1908.

The political condition of the Panjab.

2. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 23rd September, says that there appeared some indications in the Panjab of that province being aroused from the state of stupor into which it relapsed after the disturbances of last year; but fortunately the Panjab leaders have put off, at least for some time to come, the revival of the unrest by their departure from India. The editor concludes his remarks with the following words:—"We would again point out to our countrymen that this is not the time that useless unrest should be disseminated in India. To embark Indians on hard political trials just now is to expect work from them which it is quite beyond their power to accomplish. Education must be spread throughout the country and vigorous measures must be taken to put down social evils before you can put your countrymen to the severest of all tests—the test of a political struggle."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 24th September 1908.

Lala Lajpat Rai's departure to Europe.

3. Under the heading "Traits of Character", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 24th September, points out, with reference to Lala Lajpat Rai's letter that appeared in the Panjabee, that the constant espionage to which Lala Lajpat Rai has been subjected so closely since his return from Mandalay cannot but be annoying enough to unhinge the mind of any man. He observes "there is the invitation of the highest authorities that men should give information of any danger to the State or society. To some extent this duty is consistent with self-respect and social propriety. If any one happens to know of a secret society which aims at overthrowing the Government established by law, or of an individual who is engaged in the manufacture of infernal machines, or in teaching others how to prepare them, or of another person who is disseminating dangerous revolutionary ideas, then it is his clear duty to give information to the proper authorities, for a Government cannot be overthrown without social anarchy and disorder, nor can an infernal machine be used without striking the innocent as well as the guilty (in the eyes of the bomb thrower), and sometimes the innocent only. But there the duty of a citizen and a subject ends. If he carries tales or invents charges, if he seeks to gratify personal spite by arousing suspicion against an innocent man, above all, if he gives information for personal aggrandizement then he richly merits the contempt and indignation of all honest men. And when a number of such men infest society, passing as respectable members of it, prosperous well-favoured and basking in the sunshine of official favour, then the uttermost depth of degradation has been reached. Woe to the country and the people that hold such men and give them ingress into society!

The Government wants informants, not informers. The police have informers in their pay, but their position must be contemptible. A stipendary magistrate of Calcutta remarked that some informers divided their time between the jail and the service of the police as informers. Jail-birds and criminals find their proper level as informers, for it is always wise to set a thief to catch a thief. An approver who turns against his companions in crime to save himself may render a service to the cause of justice, but he is odious alike to honest and dishonest men. It is terrible to think that men of the stamp of informers and approvers are to be found driving their own carriages and rolling in wealth, waiting in the anti-rooms of high officials, masquerading as public men and patriots to serve their own ends and bringing eternal shame to their country and their people."

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 26th September 1908.

4. A correspondent of the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 26th September, while referring to the departure of several prominent agitators to England, to plead the cause of India before the British public, remarks that it will simply end in a few preposterous questions being asked in the Parliament which will lead to nothing. He thinks that it would be better to convince Lord Morley and Lord Minto that India needs reforms, which can only be brought about in a quiet unostentatious manner.

Agitators in England.

ZUL QARNAIN, 21st September 1908.

5. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 21st September, referring to the rumour that pardon was granted to Mr. Tilak on condition of his tendering an apology for his conduct, and that he refused to do so, advises Lord Minto's Government to be firm and not to show indulgence to agitators at such a critical time.

Mr. Tilak.

ABHYUDAYA, 25th September 1908.

6. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 25th September, says that the commutation of the sentence of six years' transportation passed on Mr. Tilak into a like term of simple imprisonment will be received with gratification by the people and will lessen to some extent the bitterness of feeling caused by the severity of the original sentence. The editor suggests that Government will do well to give Mr. Tilak opportunities of reading and writing and carrying on research work, so that his abilities and talents may be put to the best use in the service of humanity.

Mr. Tilak.

JADD-O-JEHAD, 28th September 1908.

7. Referring to the commutation of the sentence passed upon Mr. Tilak, the Jadd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 28th September, remarks that this act of mercy on the part of the Bombay Government has done much towards allaying public feeling in India. The editor hopes that the Government will release him altogether and thus secure the good will of the whole nation.

Mr. Tilak.

8. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 30th September, reproduces the comments of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 24th September, on the commutation of Mr. Tilak's sentence. (Vide Selections No. 39, paragraph 18.)

Mr. Tilak's sentence.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 24th September 1908.

9. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 24th September :—

House searches in Calcutta.

"On Sunday last no less than thirteen houses were searched in Calcutta but nothing of any consequence was found. The ampler powers recently given to the Bengal Police had prepared the public for some such display of police activity, and the searches were conducted quietly though the police officers were inclined to threaten some of the inmates. The entire anarchist plot has not yet come within the clutches of the police; the hands that sent the revolvers to Kanai Lal Dutt to put the approver out of the way are still free. But house searches in Bengal are carried out on a better principle than the recent house searches in these provinces. Calcutta is the centre of the anarchist plot and all measures to expose the entire conspiracy must be supported. But the searches here were based on mere communication with a certain individual who has not been charged with conspiracy or waging war against the King. If houses were searched in Bengal or elsewhere on the ground that the owner of the house or an inmate knew Barindra or any other member of the society or had some communication with him, then thousands of houses would not exhaust the list. A house search is coming to be looked upon as one of the ordinary conditions of life in this country and no longer a humiliation."

JADD-O-JEHAD, 28th September 1908.

10. The Jadd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 28th September, referring to the present unrest in India, remarks that it is chiefly due to the fact that people do not get sufficient to eat. The unrest, says the editor, is closely associated with the bread problem in India. No one desires a change of Government. On the contrary, every one prays for the permanence of British rule. Solve the bread problem and there will then be no unrest.

The real cause of the unrest.

AL BASHIR, 29th September 1908.

11. In continuation of his article entitled "The Causes of the Unrest in India During the Year 1907-8", the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 29th September, tries to prove that the firman supposed to be issued by Bahadur Shah urging the Hindus and Musalmans to make a common cause against the English on the plea of their desiring to do away with caste in India, was spurious and that it was circulated by some spiteful Hindus. He says that Bahadur Shah was openly hostile to the Hindus and consequently he could not appeal to them to join hands with the Musalmans against the English. He also remarks that Sir Theophilus Metcalfe and Sir John Lawrence deposed during the inquiries that followed the Mutiny that the broad-sheet found pasted on the gate of the Jumma Masjid, Delhi, was not issued by Bahadur Shah, but by some conspirator. He further affirms that no member of the Moghal family took any active part in the Mutiny, with the single exception of Firoz Shah. The other members of the family were effiminate and seldom came out of the zenana.

SWARAJYA, 26th September 1908.

A call to duty.

12. The editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), in the issue of the 26th September, remarks that some Indians are always emphasising the weak points of their national character and declare that in view of the dissensions and the disorganized state of society, it is advisable to postpone all work of political reform to the distant future. "We do not know how long Indians of this description intend to put up with such insults as being kicked, shot and thrashed. They are dying of hunger and through poverty they fall victims to plague every year and yet they do not seem to realize the possibility of their extinction as a race in the near future.

O ye despondent countrymen, arise! Give up your evil habits. Away with your false notions and sink your mutual differences. Think that you are great and you will be great; consider yourselves strong and you will be strong . . . and then no devilish power can hinder your progress.

Believe that Providence is with you. The Great Ruler protects every one, be he Brahman or Chamar. Open your eyes and see that He can accomplish anything in the twinkling of an eye. He hath put down the mighty from their seats and hath exalted the humble and meek. Hope and Faith are the keys to the door of success. So you, too, should have faith in Providence and hope in your own future. Change is the law of Nature. Why should you then grow pessimistic? Cannot your nation which is poor to-day be rich to-morrow? Your country can still produce men like Dayanand Rishi, Swami Ram Tirath, Srijuts Tilak, Naoroji, Pal, Ghosh and Lajpat. Why should you then be hopeless? Have confidence in the Almighty and He will save you, too, from extinction. Your mother country has no equal in her physical, intellectual and spiritual powers. Don't be despondent now but push on in spite of all the obstacles in the path of your progress."

SWARAJYA, 26th September 1908.

"Sacrifice."

13. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 26th September, has the following under the heading "Sacrifice":—

"Nowadays Indians maintain that our progress depends entirely and solely upon sacrifice. India does not want flattering and notoriety-hunting leaders; only men who are ready to sacrifice themselves for their country, laying aside the robe of selfishness and putting on the garment of truth, honesty and perseverence are needed. Subject nations can be liberated only when such men offer their lives in large numbers to (the service of) their mother. The truth of this has been proved for it is to this that the English owe their greatness (lit. this is the one thing which has shown to Englishmen the present day). It brought freedom to the Americans, and inspired by it, the little Japs gave a crushing defeat to a mighty power like Russia and through it we, too, can raise our nation to a prominent position. But some base and cowardly persons think it impossible to infuse the spirit of liberty into the hearts of men who on account of the subjection of ages are now no better than dead men, and who, far from possessing the spirit of self-sacrifice, are ready to embrace the degrading profession of informer and spy at the sacrifice of their honour (and self-respect) simply because of a slight temptation held out to them by Government. The regeneration of the country, they think, is impossible as many of those who inhabit it are men who do not hesitate to entangle the innocent in order to attain their own selfish ends—men who have become completely demoralized, in whom the virtue of self-reliance (lit. self-conceit) has become quite extinct, and who cannot forego their comfort and luxury (even for a moment).

They have grown quite hopeless and say that a spirit of self-sacrifice can never be created in India and that this sacred sentiment (lit. soul) can never inspire (cannot be infused into) the hearts of these people. India (they say) should therefore be left to her own fate; because a struggle for freedom would prove futile. But we know that men are to be found in India in large numbers who are ready to endure misfortunes in the performance of some good work, who when once they are assured that their well-being lies in a particular course of action, will never hesitate to sacrifice themselves. Some enthusiastic young men of India sacrificed their holy lives over (for the service of) their motherland, thinking, though wrongly, that her welfare consisted in resorting to bombs only.

This proves, therefore, that the spirit of self-sacrifice exists in India. Of course, what is wanting is to utilize it in the right way (lit. to bring it on the right path). Our duty is to show the people the way in which it would really be a meritorious deed to put up with difficulties or to imperil their lives.

A mother is ready to undergo every kind of sacrifice for the welfare of her child, only because she loves it, values its life more than her own, and prefers the well-being of the child even where her own is at stake. But through ignorance she gives the child a little opium to make it sleep, without thinking of the effect it may have on the health of the child. She cannot enjoy any rest until she sees her dear children in peace (and comfort); but like an ignorant friend she fails to realize the (injurious) effect of the opium. This proves that only what we love deeply and value most can make us ready to undergo self-sacrifice, and that sacrifices, through our mistakes, can sometimes prove injurious too instead of useful. Therefore our first duty is to teach patriotism (lit. worship of the land) to our brethren, and to ask them to sacrifice themselves for their motherland. Next we should show them the right method of self-sacrifice. We have to let them know that in our sacred land there are buried those rishis and munis who have once been the fame of the world, whose descendants it is our proud privilege to claim to be, and to follow in whose footsteps is our bounden duty. We should not traduce the fair (sacred) name of these great men by betraying cowardice and lack of ambition on our part. We should not commit any such base act as would warrant their calling us unworthy sons. We should prove that just as our country was under the control of our forefathers, so we too have a right to retain a hold over it. (We should try to see) our national flag—the emblem of our glory, pomp, splendour and power floating over the land of Hindusthan. We should resolve in our hearts that we will attain to our past glory—if nothing more; and we should see that the consciousness of our past greatness gets rooted in our minds and that we acknowledge the fact (with gratification) that the teacher of civilization to every other nation of the world was our own country. We should consign to flames such histories as describe us as being descended from barbarians and in which (these) hypocrites mention our ancestors as monkeys. That we shall awaken—we should believe as surely as we believe the fact that the whole world has derived incalculable benefit from our old laws and regulations, arts and industries, literature and science, customs and habits. We shall show our old signs (characteristics) once again to the world. We require sacrifices to spread this movement and to inform the public of this (message). We should tell our uneducated brethren that we, too, are human beings, that we were born like others to perform our particular duties, that we should not put up with treatment accorded to beasts, that we, too, have to keep pace with the rapid progress of other countries in civilization, that our heartfelt ambition is to secure freedom of speech and writing, and that we aim at liberating our nation from the clutches of foreigners. Our individual ideals (lit. ideas) and (methods of) work may differ, but the object of all should be to attain progress even though we may be working separately. No one should be alarmed if our works of political, social and religious reforms differ widely, for we are all striving for the same end. We are called after the nation we belong to, and can be called natives of that country only in which we were born. Therefore the benefits accruing from these reforms will affect every one in the same way.

Therefore the first thing to be done is to root out false notions from the minds of the public and make them staunch followers of the one true God. We should remove from their hearts and instil (lit. fill) the elements of mutual brotherly love in its place, so that Hindus, Muhammadans and Christians may become one and consider one another their brethren, because they belong to one and the same country (lit. India), and they should not allow religious dissensions to come near them (to create discord between them). The public should be made to realize its condition and recognize the injurious effects of foreign rule. The spirit of self-reliance should be thoroughly infused into them, and they should be made to understand the policy of self-help. (Do all this) and then see what these sacrifices will achieve and how their results compel foreign rulers to vacate the country."

Odes.

14. The following political odes are published in the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 26th September :— SWARAJYA, 26th September 1908.

By Gauhar of Lucknow :

"The lamentations of the oppressed are crying
'Let the tyrant have all his desires gratified.
He may hang us, or cast us into prison,
(But) we shall not give up our love for our country.'
The complaining lips will not be silent even on the gallows.
My lamentations will make themselves heard even on the day of judgement.
And our sighs shall never be ineffective.
We are oppressed and powerless ; you can trouble us as you will.
How long shall we endure these blows ?
How long can a man hold his heart with his hands ?
We complain of the oppressor's hand, O relentless ' Wheel of Time.'
We are bound with chains--we the delicately brought-up ones.
Narayan (the God) will grant us shanti (peace)
Only when all Indians cry ' Victory to Swadeshi.' "

By Bekhauf of Bareilly :

"It would not do any longer now to remain silent.
How long can one hold his heart with his hands (hold his peace) ?
How long can one bear with tyranny and remain silent ?
If misfortunes befall, how can one ward them off ?
It would not be amiss if we raised our heads (in protest).
How long can delicately brought-up persons put up with tyranny ?
Our arms were confiscated, our property looted and misfortunes came thick upon our heads
From the day, O King, we came under your sway.
Every day new rules and Acts are being put into force,
And new laws are being enacted.
One is sentenced to death, and another is thrown into prison,
If he raises his voice in complaint.
The people are labouring under tyranny, oppression and cruelty.
Every one has sores on his heart.
If you (the King) were to look mercifully on India
Its people would lift your throne on their shoulders.
Look kindly on India (be kind to India) for God's sake and take off the glasses of intolerance from your eyes.
I swear that there will then be peace in the country.
You may have a definite promise from us.
It Kings lose the confidence of their subjects through oppression,
They can regain it by ruling mercifully.
We pray in the morning and the evening
'May God bring thee to thy senses O King !'
Although all that I have said is true and nothing of it is false,
Yet I fear I shall be deported for speaking the truth.
Bekhauf (the writer) is not afraid of thy tyranny.
The truthful never stand in fear of death."

By Karam Chand, Banbási :

"They who bewail their lot are oppressed.
How long can one hold his heart with his hands ?
What shall I tell thee of thy tyrannous deeds, O tyrant.
The sores of my wounded heart have developed into cancers.
O ! Wheel of Time, how long, is it thy intention to keep us in disgrace ?
Thou shouldst efface us completely.

The ship of our nation is on a tempestuous sea,
O, Lord! save it from being wrecked.
Take in your hands the Sword of Faith, O Indian brethren,
For your lamentations and wailing will not be useless.
(My) heart is being shattered by the oppression of the tyrant,
But this oppression causes our blood to boil in our veins,
And it will continue to boil, but it wants a little fire,
(But) how can Banbási gratify the desires its heat (lit.) steam creates?"

By Sher Singh, Shamim, of Gaura:

"Protect swadeshi from the attacks of foreigners (O! God).
Rescue us from the sea of poverty, O! Lord.
Thy [children (?)] are lamenting being unable to bear with tyranny any longer.
O! Mother Earth, hide them in thy (bosom).
They do not refrain from oppression, and then, to crown all,
They insist that no one shall complain.
O! Shamim, when one is of a mercurial temperament and is troubled,
How can he hold his heart with his hand."

By Syed Sajjad Hassan, Sajjad, of Allahabad:

"Why do you enquire about my condition, O! onlooker?
There is a cancer in my eye, and sores on my heart.
A man can put up with one or two oppressive acts,
(But) how long can he hold his heart with his hands.
If there is a just ruler, there is some use in seeking justice (at his hands),
But if there is not who will listen to the lamentations of the woeful heart?
They [the English (?)] are trying to make us [Indians (?)] extinct (to destroy all Indians).
We [Indians (?] too cannot rest till we have turned them [the English (?)] out.
We cannot even afford tattered rags
While they are covering themselves with shawls.
The nation [Bengalis (?)] that was thought to be cowardly and timid
Is responsible for the fear that they [the English (?)] now have of death.
How great is the munificence of God; whatever you ask for, a supernatural voice says, 'come here and take it.'"

By Chakhta:

"They dote upon the new-fangled ways and fashions of Europe,
But still, by the irony of fate they are called 'black.'
As yet they had simply the honour of being called dogs.
God only knows what misfortunes are in store for them.
We, too, are men, but by the grace of God,
Our bread is being taken from our mouths.
We have neither arts nor industries; neither honour nor wealth.
Ominous clouds have spread over the sky of India.
In addition to these troubles (?) there is the kindness of famine and plague.
How long can one hold his heart with his hands?
The sigh of the poor is piercing through the seven crusts of the sky.
Then, O! sorrow, why have these sighs produced no effect?"

By Rahmatullah Khan, Rahmat, of Allahabad:

"They who give themselves up to lamentation are made of a different stuff.
We shall never be down by this oppression.
How long can one bear with your tyranny and oppression?
How long can one hold his heart with his hands?
We shall never refrain from complaining, O! tyrant.
Though thou mayest hang us and imprison us."

SWARAJYA, 26th September 1908.

Kanai Lal Dutt's calm attitude.

15. Referring to the interview that his brother had with Kanai Lal Dutt in jail, the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 26th September, remarks that Dutt's attitude betrayed no mental agitation. Some people are afraid of death, but this brave man seems to proclaim to his brethren that death is easy to meet. When one has to die ultimately, why should death be feared?

The true son of the mother, says the editor, does not appear agitated in the least; on the contrary he is more cheerful than before.

The murder of the approver.

16. The editor of the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 26th September, referring to the murder of Gossain, the approver in the Alipore bomb case, remarks that it was extraordinary that revolvers could come into the possession of prisoners of such a dangerous character, and thinks that this was due to the perfidy of some of the jail officials who were all Bengalis. He is of opinion that the preponderance of one nationality in a department is very injurious to its proper working, and so the staff should be recruited from various nationalities.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 26th September 1908.

The Musalmans and the Government.

17. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 21st September, referring to the comments of the Times (London), on the Aga Khan's letter to the Deccan Moslem League, remarks that by their policy of active loyalty to the Government during the recent troubles the Musalmans have proved beyond doubt that they are a force to be reckoned with at such critical periods.

ZUL QARNAIN, 21st September 1908.

The Moslem League.

18. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 28th September, notes with satisfaction the founding of a branch of the Moslem League in Madras, and remarks that it is time that the Moslems should realize their political condition. The editor advises them to refrain from following the mischievous lead of the Hindus and to form branches of the Moslem League all over the country.

ZUL QARNAIN, 28th September 1908.

The future Viceroy.

19. Referring to the rumour that Sir G. Clarke, the Governor of Bombay, is to succeed Lord Minto as the Viceroy of India, the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 26th September, remarks that this will be hailed with delight in some quarters, as Sir George has done many a good deed in Bombay. But, adds the editor, we require a more prudent and just man as Viceroy as Sir George Clarke did not exercise his discretion in the case of Srijut Tilak.

SWARAJYA, 26th September 1908.

Sir George Clarke.

20. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 28th September, referring to the rumour that Sir George Clarke is to succeed Lord Minto as Viceroy, remarks that he has displeased the people by ordering the prosecution of Mr. Tilak, and hence his appointment will not be welcomed by the people.

RAHBAR, 28th September 1908.

Self-government in India.

21. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 25th September, discussing the prospect of self-government in India, remarks that although Europeans had to shed their blood for the attainment of their liberty and rights Indians can reasonably aspire to achieve the same coveted objects through constitutional agitation alone, inasmuch as they are subjects of a nation which has ever been known to be foremost in fostering and preserving liberty and which will not hesitate to grant self-government to them as soon as it sees that they have proved themselves fit for it by education, ability and unity.

The editor, therefore, exhorts his countrymen to have faith in the innate sense of justice of the British public and to cultivate the above-mentioned qualities as the surest means of gradually obtaining all their legitimate rights.

ABHYUDAYA, 25th September 1908.

The new spirit.

22. Under the heading "The Trend of Thought", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 27th September, contrasts the reception accorded to the Hon'ble Mr. Gokhale on his arrival in London with that of Mr. Khaparde, when the whole Indian colony of London turned out and gave him an enthusiastic welcome. He asks if it is necessary to point out the moral. A new spirit and a new ambition have filled the land, and the loyal meetings which are being held by order are of no significance. "In a few years the generation of what are called Moderates will disappear and the Extremists of to-day will be the Moderates of to-morrow. They are not discouraged by repression, they are not alarmed by the punishment of their leaders. Their number is growing more rapidly than any one can calculate and the future belongs to them. For our part we do not believe that it necessarily means danger, but the spirit of the administration will have to change. There must be no playing with reform, or the employment of mere force to suppress natural aspirations. If India is to become a nation it will become a nation in spite of all resistance, and perhaps because of such resistance. The Government can help that great achievement by making a beginning in the initiation of real self-government. Co-operation can endure, coercion cannot, and it is well to recognize the new conditions that are so rapidly appearing in India."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 27th September 1908.

ADVOCATE, 27th September 1908.

Indians in British Colonies.

23. Under the heading "Wanted a Board of Emigration", the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 27th September, says "the Indian abroad is a hated being in British colonies and an undesirable in other countries. Something like a drive, as Lord Kitchener did in South Africa during the Boer war, has been organized to force Indians out of the colonies, across the seas, to the land of their birth, and practically to confine them there; even the Indian student gone out to complete his education with the determination to come back after gaining his object, is thwarted in attaining his purpose. Canada has, with a diplomacy equal to the occasion, effected the practical exclusion of Indians from its soil."

He further observes that "the attitude of suspense in which we are in the motherland has given place in the case of our countrymen in the Transvaal to one of determined opposition, by way of passive resistance, to the policy of the Government which is now one of uncompromising hostility."

"Very rapidly," he remarks, "events are moving in India as much as in other parts of the Empire, and in spite of all the most strenuous and persistent activity of the colonists, it is a fact that a large number of Indians will continue to live outside India and preferably in British colonies" . . . . "It is therefore high time," says the editor, "that some active steps were taken to safeguard the interests of our countrymen abroad, give reliable information to Indians at home about the status of Indians in the several foreign countries and British colonies and move the authorities in the interests of law and justice. We are sure Mr. Reitch, of the South African Indian Committee of London, may help in organizing such a society. Mr. Abbas Ali Mirza would like to have one such association which should have a central office at Bombay, with branches at Calcutta, Madras, and Karachi. But for the apathy of Muhammadans, he thinks, there was hardly any need for a separate central association as there is the National Congress. The standing committee of the Congress would have answered the purpose very well. As it is, however, the former may be kept independent of the latter, at least for some time. Perchance, it might pave the way for a united Congress. A monthly or fortnightly report, illustrated with the history of different places, will be both amusing and interesting. And if printed in all the well-known vernaculars it should command a sufficient circulation at home and abroad to make it self-supporting. The association has become a necessity, and has long been a neglected duty. He ends with an appeal to the leaders for taking early measures in order to make such a defence association a fait acompli."

Afghanistan.

25. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 28th September, on the authority of the Frontier Advocate (Panjab), says that a Sikh, who was a prosperous banker of Kabul, has recently come to Rawalpindi and complains that the Amir has confiscated the whole of his property and imprisoned him, threatening to put him to death if he did not accept Islam. He succeeded in making good his escape, but his family is still at Kabul.

The case of Mr. Tilak.

26. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 24th September, has the following :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 24th September 1908.

"Assuming it to be true that Mr. Tilak's sentence has been reduced from transportation to simple imprisonment outside the Bombay Presidency by the Governor of Bombay, the first point that comes up for consideration is the conduct of the Judge who tried the case. We are aware that two Poona newspapers, one pro-Tilak and the other anti-Tilak, have been prosecuted for contempt and the Bombay High Court is very jealous of its dignity, but the action of the executive Government is the strongest condemnation of Mr. Justice Davar's judicial discretion. There is a strong body of feeling that the articles for which Mr. Tilak was indicted were not seditious at all; the opinion is unanimous that the articles if seditious were mildness itself compared with other writings like that of Yugantar and some other papers. At the worst Mr. Tilak would have been amply punished by imprisonment for a short period considering his age. He was not associated with any anarchists or revolutionary propaganda despite the vague accusation of the late approver. His personal popularity did not constitute a real danger to the Government. But Mr. Justice Davar in his anxiety to do impartial justice began thinking aloud of what the world outside would think of the sentence he was about to pass upon the accused. His estimate of the public verdict was exactly the reverse of the fact, and the Government in whose interest the 'lenient' sentence was passed has shown that it could have been a great deal milder without any detriment to justice. The fine was not necessary; the transportation was utterly uncalled for. So far the Bombay Government has actually set aside Mr. Justice Davar's order. There are statesmen who can see farther than Judges who make wrong guesses at newspaper comments. Mr. Tilak dead in the Andamans or in a common jail might have proved a far more serious menace than Mr. Tilak restored to liberty in the evening of his life. It is easy to eliminate the individual; it is impossible to drive out a cause. Is the offence of which Mr. Tilak has been convicted such as to justify his dying in the Andamans or as a convict? This is the question that people will ask and other people will make use of the fact itself for their own purpose. All that the Bombay Government wants is the sequestration of Mr. Tilak for a time. This may be done by simple imprisonment as well as by transportation. And the time itself may be reduced. Lenity more than severity is wanted at the present crisis. The power of the Government to deprive any man of his liberty with or without trial is not questioned; the exercise of that power calls for wisdom. Rigour and repression and savage sentences do not win hearts and it is by winning their hearts after all that the Government can hope to hold three hundred millions of people in willing submission."

The Alipore Jail.

27. Referring to the precautions recently taken at the Alipore Central Jail, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 27th September, remarks that "nothing however can be said against the most stringent precautionary measures. But under no circumstances can the confinement of the prisoners in solitary cells be held justifiable. It is clearly illegal. It may drive some of the prisoners to madness. The matter was brought to the notice of the Magistrate, but he said he could not interfere. Have then the jail authorities the power of condemning a man to solitary confinement before he is convicted of any offence? The prisoners are accused of a grave offence against the law, but that does not justify officers of the law to override the law themselves. Under-trial prisoners must be treated as such, and not as convicts condemned to solitary confinement." INDIAN PEOPLE, 27th September 1908.

The Benares Municipality.

30. Under the heading "Self-Government in Jeopardy", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 24th September, makes the following observations on the affairs of the Benares Municipality:—

"It may be remembered that some time ago in a series of articles in these pages, while discussing the advisability and possibility of a new poll tax at Benares, we drew public attention to the affairs of the Municipality of the Holy City. Something is apparently rotten in the state of Denmark and the crash has not been very long in coming. Our Benares correspondent, referring to the financial straits in which the Municipality finds itself, writes:—'The affairs of the local Municipality have gone from bad to worse. The Municipality has broken down financially. There is not a single man to ask a question or suggest anything, and this in one of our premier Municipalities!' Where else can we expect than this? The Municipal Commissioners are supposed to be responsible. They are all men of light and leading and they fight for the coveted Commissionership. Who will explain how this state of affairs has come about? At the meeting of the Board on the 29th August last the accounts for July were passed. The receipts were Rs. 52,894-12-3½ and the expenditure amounted to Rs. 64,646-3-8, leaving a deficit of Rs. 11,751-7-4½. The Board appointed a committee to inquire into the circumstances and the Secretary was instructed not to pay any bills. So the Municipality has been working since then on credit. What a commentary on the efficiency of the men in charge! Benares has got perhaps the richest Municipality in these parts and its income from the obnoxious octroi is perhaps the biggest, and we understand—we hope we do so rightly—that all the taxes have been regularly and duly realized to a pie. What can then be the excuse for the Municipality in suspending payment of bills and perhaps of salaries, an action which under the law would have required a man to show the red light in any private business? As we have said before what is everybody's business is nobody's special business. It has been very pleasant no doubt to sanction grand schemes and pay big salaries and now let us see who will pay the piper. Taxation has reached the maximum both in direct and indirect ways. We are certainly therefore entitled to ask whether the City Fathers can appreciate how they have jeopardized the cause of local self-government in these provinces."

ABHYUDAYA, 25th September 1908.

New road in Allahabad.

31. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 25th September, says that the proposal of the construction of a new road in Allahabad to pass through Badshahi Mandi and adjacent mohallas, has caused quite a stir among those who will be affected thereby by the Government acquiring their houses under the Land Acquisition Act. The editor suggests that although it is impossible that the interests of all the persons affected by the scheme should be consulted, still it is advisable that ancient costly buildings and temples should be spared as far as possible. He further says that people complain that the proposed road will have too long a curve towards the south and urges that it should run at right angles to the road coming from the Railway Station, as laying out the road in this direction will prove more economical in the end.

Arabic and Sanskrit Scholarships.

32. A correspondent writing to the Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 23rd September, notes with satisfaction the granting of scholarships for the study of Sanskrit and Arabic, and remarks that it would have been more advisable if a scholarship had been reserved for Persian which is spoken over a large area in Asia and ranks as a classical language.

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 23rd September 1908.

Bengalis in the Educational Department.

33. A correspondent writing to the Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 23rd September, complains that most of the teachers in the schools in these provinces are Bengalis, who as a class are disaffected, and their teaching is calculated to poison the minds of the students against Government. He advises the Government to reduce the number of the Bengalis employed in the Educational Department.

Industrial education.

34. A correspondent of the Riyâz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 24th September, condemns the educational policy of the Government as it merely prepares men whose sole ambition is to secure a billet under it, and advises the people to open schools for the teaching of modern sciences and arts, which will pave the way for industrial progress.

The United Provinces Educational Policy.

35. Referring to the Model School scheme now on its trial and to the hardships experienced by the students of Gorakhpur and other places, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 24th September, says that it would be hopeless to expect that people in every city and town will gird up their loins to meet this new demand of the Department of Public Education, for in everything regarding public education Government has heretofore taken the lead. But, he asks, has not the time come for us to do some portion of the work ourselves? 'Let us have so many schools like the model ones, if these are the best of the kind, or let us try other schemes. Schools we must have; boys cannot afford to lose time while we accuse the Government or cavil at our luck. Or is this really a sign that we may now take the initiative in our own affairs and work out our destiny in our own way? In this connection we may advert to another question. Is the rumour true that Government is trying to distribute copies of the speech recently delivered by His Honour the Lieutenant Governor at Agra, Allahabad, and Lucknow to the village schools? We will leave aside the boys who attend these schools. It will be a sight to see the village schoolmasters trying to inculcate political principles to these boys. But take the case of these masters themselves. Are they educated or wise enough to understand anything or any view of this question? In the cities even uneducated people have an opportunity of forming opinions on such questions. But these village teachers, will they learn the speech as they do their religious books or will they in some cases try to open their eyes and look about for the other side of the question as well? Newspapers do not reach them, public speakers do not find an audience among them. For the most part their burdens are heavy enough and they are innocent of any political thought or action. Be it remembered that our village schoolmasters are men of a different class and stamp than in Bengal. It would have been wiser to let them alone.'

36. Referring to the expulsion by Mr. Jennings of a student from the Hindu Boarding House, Allahabad, for the offence of keeping a photo of Khudiram Bose in his room, the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 26th September, remarks :—

Indian students in England.

37. Referring to the draft scheme (as contained in the latest number of the Times) for meeting the educational and other needs of Indian students in England, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 24th September, says that "there is nothing in the scheme to which serious objection can be taken; but everything will depend upon the tact and ability of the officer chosen to run the show. It seems to us that Sir William Lee-Warner is not a very happy selection. Men like Sir Lawrence Jenkins, Sir Frederick Lely or Sir John Edge would have been very much better suited for the needs and exigencies of such institutions."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 24th September 1908.

Indian students in England.

38. Referring to the draft scheme published in the Times regarding the official control of Indian students in England, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 27th September, says "we are glad to note that the suggestion made in some English papers that Indian students while in England should be kept under a sort of surveillance has not been accepted. Indian students would have keenly resented any such interference, and so would have done their parents."

ADVOCATE, 27th September 1908.

As regards the observations made by the Times in speaking of the growing number of Indian students in England, the editor says 'it goes without saying that it is largely due to the tendency of the Indian Universities to stiffen their examinations, and that if it is desired that the stream of Indian students to England should not grow, then the only solution lies in our Universities not making their examinations very stiff under cover of raising the standard of education.'

He concludes by saying 'Lord Morley and his councillors may rest assured that Indian parents are not over anxious to send their boys to England in very large numbers. They would keep them under their own eyes, provided he alters the unnatural situation in which they are placed by the grandmotherly solicitude of our Universities to treat them like mere children as also by the demand to pass examinations held in London if our young men aspire to enter the higher branches of the public service. It is indeed a thousand pities that they have to go six thousand miles off in order to qualify themselves for the superior grades of the public service and in doing so have to compete with people who are very much more favourably situated than they.'

44. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 24th September, in a leading article condemns aimless political agitation and anarchist conspiracies as the sole means of regenerating India, and advises the people to join hands in commercial enterprise, and to foster growing industries and thus pave the way for the future greatness of their country. 45. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 28th September, referring to Sir A. Lawley's remarks on the swadeshi and political agitation at the Madras Industrial Conference, remarks:—

RAHBAR, 28th September 1908.

Industrial regeneration of India.

46. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 28th September, urges the people to invest their money in reviving their industries and thus enrich their country. The editor says that this is the most important duty of a patriot and that every effort should be made to perform it.

47. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 27th September, publishes the Government order addressed to all Commissioners of divisions and district officers of the United Provinces on the subject of the disposal of famine orphans with the following remarks :— ADVOCATE, 27th September 1908.

Famine orphans.

"We are afraid in the list of orphanages mentioned in the above letter, the name of the Allahabad Orphanage has been inadvertently omitted—an omission which we hope will soon be rectified. These orders about the disposal of orphans will be received with general satisfaction throughout the province. That a single orphan will not be handed over to the guardianship of any individual or body professing any faith other than that of the parents of the orphan must be a matter of great satisfaction to all persons of right feeling to whatever creed they may belong. The disposal of orphans in the manner laid down above is a special feature of the successful administration of the recent famine and excels in this respect the administration of past famines. The order will heighten the gratitute which has been excited among the people at large by the liberal and sympathetic administration of the relief operations."

48. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 30th September, reproduces the remarks of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 27th September, on the treatment of famine orphans. HINDUSTANI, 30th September 1908.

Famine orphans.

49. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 29th September, referring to the ensuing plague season, advises the Government to appoint Lady Doctors to inoculate pardanashin women, otherwise inoculation will never be popular in the country. MASHRIQ, 29th September 1908.

Plague.

50. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 29th September, complains that no representative of the Gorakhpur division was present at the Sanitary Conference recently held at Naini Tal. The editor thinks that the sanitary condition of the Gorakhpur division is highly unsatisfactory and that something should be done to improve it. MASHRIQ, 29th September 1908.

Sanitation in Gorakhpur division.

V.—Legislation.

51. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 24th September, refers to some correspondence that recently appeared in papers in Calcutta and elsewhere regarding the defects of the Indian Companies Act of 1882 and points out that the contention of the Bengal Chamber that as there is a proposal in England for consolidating all the English Companies Acts and that until this proposal is adopted or rejected the Government of India would not be likely to favourably consider any proposals for amending the Indian Act, is quite inadvisable. The editor says that it is "neither advisable nor practicable that all the provisions of any English Act that might be passed should be incorporated in the proposed new Act, and since the legislative machinery in every country has to move slowly, there is likely to be some saving of time if in the ensuing cold weather a committee is formed to draw up the provisions of such an Act, and as soon as the draft English Act is prepared, such provisions of the English Act as might be found to suit the peculiar conditions of India, might be incorporated in the Indian Bill. Such a procedure will save time and, we believe, the various Chambers of Commerce will have nothing to say against it. Joint stock companies are cropping up like mushrooms all over the country and if the law does not protect the investors the industrial development of the country will suffer." SHAHNA-I-HIND, 1st October 1908.

England and Turkey.

1. The Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 1st October, referring to the adverse criticism of some English newspapers on the Turkish constitution, remarks that this is unfair in view of the friendly relations between England and Turkey.

The editor says that Turkey is now progressing rapidly and any power that lends her a helping hand will find it paying in the end.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, October 1908.

"The Anglo-Russian Convention and Indian Relations with the Buddhist World."

2. The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for October, publishes an article by Mr. H. Crossfield headed "The Anglo-Russian Convention and Indian Relations with the Buddhist World." The writer thus sums up his views :—

"We find that the attitude of isolation on the part of the countries in question has at length been modified, and communion freely opened up with kindred British subjects, at a time when new and vivifying influences are at work in the British—Buddhist world. And this, too, coincides with a momentous stirring of the currents of oriental life, in general, by the stimulus of the rise of Japan into a world—power and the late struggles in the Far East. In the course of recent parliamentary debates over the Anglo-Russian Convention, it was urged by critics that an undue concession had been made to Russia by recognizing equality of status therewith in Tibet, where previously Lord Lansdowne, at the time of the Tibetan mission, had asserted the claim of this country to superiority of influence therein from her contiguous position. The Government defended their conduct on the ground that their predecessors had virtually receded from that attitude, and that the less we had to do with this country the better, so long as Russia acted in a similar spirit. This position is sound enough so far as direct interference with Tibetan affairs is concerned, and the extension of any political responsibility beyond our natural Eastern frontiers. Yet it is to the highest interest of Britain that civilization and enlightenment shall spread throughout the inner regions of Asia when incalculable forces are emerging within her seclusive life; just as the spread of education, the minimizing of ignorance among the superstitious masses of the Indian peoples themselves, must assist the task of promoting progress in her own sphere. It is such a civilizing process that must follow, under all these circumstances, the renewal of free intercourse between the more enlightened and the less enlightened centres of that great factor in oriental culture embraced under the term of Buddhism. This process, too, will be opportunely furthered by that improvement in the system of communication between Burma, India, and the north-eastern Frontier, which is expected to follow from the reorganization of Eastern India involved in the so-called 'partition' of Bengal. The hostile policy adopted towards foreign intercourse and trade on the part of the Tibetan Lamas, accentuated during last century, was largely instigated by their selfish desire to maintain their peculiar ascendancy over their ignorant subjects by preventing any disturbing alien influences from reaching the country. The Tibetans themselves are a genial race on the whole and keen traders; and there is every likelihood of the removal of such oppressive restrictions being taken full advantage of in this respect, to their general benefit. So, in various ways, there may be set up, from all the associations and factors we have indicated, a flow of culture-forces that, extending through the Chinese Empire to Japan, may even potently affect the more intimate side of the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

But in what way can such developments be influenced by direct Governmental action, seeing its neutral position in all similar concerns, and its voluntary guarantee not to accredit in the case of Tibet, a British representative at the capital? Now this question raises a further related one, which has reference to the resources open to the Indian administration of indirectly furthering its higher interests by the more intelligent employment of Indian talent in its foreign consular and diplomatic services and relations with neighbouring lands. For just as the ultimate internal problem of India is to effect a closer association of Government and the people by means of such forms of representative institutions as consist with Indian conditions; so in its external relations with the Oriental world it is desirable that they shall be largely conducted through agents at once loyal and trustworthy and persona grata with the peoples and the governments concerned. And as this policy of association goes steadily forward, the ranks of Indian society qualified for such missions will be correspondingly enlarged. The present situation on the north-eastern frontier affords a signal opportunity for boldly experimenting in this direction. It is obvious how much more effectually all those higher interests we have emphasised can be inter alia promoted by, say, cultivated British Buddhist subjects, acting as trade agents and the like in Tibet and Western China recognized under the present conventions—than by Europeans.

British international policy has the reputation of being content in its official conduct with taking short views and meeting contingencies as they arise. Be this opinion correct or not, it is certainly vital to our Eastern dominion that it be directed with regard to the most far-sighted views attainable; and that all the social forces of British enlightenment shall co-operate to this great end, and the extension of the finer factors of modern civilization among those eastern provinces naturally susceptible to the play of their operation. No combination of circumstances, in this respect, provides a more favourable field than those we have passed under review."

3. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 2nd October, referring to the political demands of the Congress party, remarks that the reforms that are asked for, even if granted in toto—of which there is not the slightest hope—will not cure the many evils from which India is suffering. The editor thinks that it would be more advisable for those who call themselves patriots to introduce industrial and technical education to start swadeshi concerns, and, above all, to revive the old panchayat system, than to "cry for the moon" in the words of Lord Morley.

OUDH AKHBAR, 2nd October 1908.

Indian Reforms.

4. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 5th October, in an article on the future of India, expresses a doubt as to the possibility of there bring a united India, as the disintegrating forces that are at work neutralize all the efforts made to bring about union between the different races in the country. The editor holds the Government with its policy of "divide and rule" responsible for this. He blames the Musalmans, too, for their aloofness from political agitation, and advises them to follow the lead of the Turks who have fraternized with Christians and Jews and thus restored peace in their country.

OUDH AKHBAR, 5th October 1908.

The future of India.

5. The Swadesh Bandhava (Agra), for September, says that for the progress, prosperty and welfare of India it is absolutely necessary that harmony should characterise the relations between the rulers and the ruled. It is incumbent upon the people to respect the authority of the Government and obey its laws. They should bring their grievances to the notice of the Government and carry on agitation for the grant of their legitimate rights, but on no account should they go beyond the limits of the law. The Government should have full confidence in the people and should treat them considerately, even when they go astray, as leniency always leads to beneficial results, while repression begets bitterness and distrust. Further, it being a very critical time, Government should accept the stories of informers with the greatest caution.

In conclusion, the editor remarks that the people should guard themselves against the treacherous persuasions of professional agitators, and that Government should rule the country, keeping in view the interests and welfare of the people.

SWADESH BANDHAVA, September 1908.

Government and the people.

6. The editor of the Áwáza-i-Khalq (Benares), writing in the issue of the 24th September, remarks that the sole cause of the discontent in the country is the policy of "divide and rule" adopted by the British Government and not the partition of Bengal, higher education or the victory of Japan over Russia. In the end he points out that if the Government is anxious for its own welfare it should act on the Christian maxim "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you."

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 24th September 1908.

The discontent in India.

7. Mr. Kesri Narain Chand, B.A., LL.B., in an article headed "Order or Anarchy" in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for October, severely condemns the anarchist propaganda

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, October 1908.

"Order or Anarchy."

of Bengal which, he thinks, has greatly retarded the political, commercial and industrial progress of the country. He holds that the times were peculiarly auspicious for the rapid progress of India, as a liberal Government was at the helm at home and a liberal-minded Secretary of State was entrusted with the administration of India. The Government was opening schools for technical education, and was offering scholarships in foreign countries for higher education in arts and industries.

Reforms were promised which would probably accelerate the progress of the country, but the anarchists, through sheer folly, have upset all this.

"What is the duty of every good citizen," he asks, "at the present juncture—to let the country and its people suffer or to try his level best to stamp out this latest form of political malady in Indian public life? Every good citizen must wish that the State in which he lives, should be peaceful, and happy, and not the constant victim of disorder and anarchy. It is in the interest of the people that peace should be secured, for then alone any steady progress or real advancement is possible. It is really strange that anarchism should spring up in Indian soil where the climate was always fatal to its growth. It comes unnaturally to the Indian soil, and must be struck at its root, in the interest of the country—for, the country where anarchism and nihilism prevail, is a cursed country and can never be happy. What country and what people can be happy, where the life and property of the people become insecure? The very spirit of anarchism must be nipped in the bud.

I appeal to all well-wishers of the country in the name of the country and its people, whose welfare they allege to hold so dear to their heart—in the name of national progress and advancement that cannot co-exist with disturbance and disorder—in the name of Indian civilization which hates anarchism and violence and of which people are justly so proud—in the name of humanity itself that abhors innocent bloodshed and brutal conduct, to extirpate the spirit of anarchism from our midst, to sink our political differences for the time being, to meet this common enemy—the enemy alike of the Moderates and of the Radicals—to overthrow it by a united effort, so that the path of Indian progress may be smooth, and the goal of advancement, easy of approach."

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, October 1908.

"The Oriental Agitation for Self-Government."

8. Mr. Sydney Brooks, in an article on the "Oriental Agitation for Self-Government" in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for October, remarks that the simultaneous agitation in all Asiatic countries for self-government cannot be lightly treated. The impetus, he says, comes from the west and the same results will surely follow.

In conclusion, he says:—

"What is the meaning of so strange a phenomenon? Is it, as some maintain, all moonshine and insincerity, the blind response of ignorance to speciousness, the mere aimless and fortuitous aspiration of people who do not know what it is they really want? I confess I find it difficult to accept that view. It is always a mistake, when people declare they want a certain thing, to assure them that they are mistaken and that what they really want is something quite different. When you find Orientals of widely different races and under wholly dissimilar conditions agitating for self-government, it seems to me almost a waste of time to argue with them that an enlightened despotism is their instinctive ideal, and that what they really wish for is not self-government but good government.

The plain fact is that wherever East and West are in contact, wherever the Oriental is suffering from the aggression of Occidental civilization, wherever he is bethinking himself of how to get rid of this uncomfortable and disquieting supremacy, he is turning with one accord to the device of representative government—probably with some vague idea that representative government is the contrivance which hitherto has buttressed the supremacy of the West, the root-cause, in short, of Occidental victories in peace and war. We have always held it up before him as the ideal of progress. He is now taking us at our word and trying to realize that ideal, hoping thereby to strengthen himself against the pressure of the West."

OUDH AKHBAR, 2nd October 1908.

Scares.

9. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 2nd October, condemns the evil practice of creating scares such as the recent bomb scare in Calcutta and the rumour that the city would be destroyed during the pujah holidays, as they lead to unnecessary unpleasantness.

10. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 3rd October, commenting on the anti-vaccination circular issued by Mr. Charles Gibbon, M.P., in which it is stated that the unrest in India is mostly due to the compulsory introduction of vaccination, contradicts this statement and remarks that the unrest is solely due to poverty. The editor thinks that delicate questions should not be flippantly discussed at such a critical moment.

Vaccination and the unrest in India.

OUDH AKHBAR, 3rd October 1908.

11. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 7th October, notes with satisfaction the expressions of sympathy with the aspirations of educated Indians made by eminent politicians in England and by a section of the English press, and remarks that it is a mistake to believe that India is verging on rebellion. The editor says that the disturbances in various parts of the country are simply due to the awakening of the people to a fuller knowledge of their rights.

The present situation in India.

OUDH AKHBAR, 7th October 1908.

12. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 1st October, referring to the recent issues of the Yugantar, remarks that these mischievous pranks of unprincipled agitators have become a positive menace to sober journalists in the country. The editor fears that if the persons responsible for the recent issues of the paper are not punished for their misdeeds; the very existence of the Indian press will be in jeopardy.

The Yugantar.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 1st October 1908.

13. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 1st October, referring to the large number of suicides among the indentured Indians in Natal, advises the Government to establish a Board of Immigration to give correct information about the conditions of labour in foreign countries and to look after labourers in the colonies.

Indentured Indians in Natal.

ADVOCATE, 1st October 1908.

In conclusion, the editor says:—

"Here is indeed a plain duty incumbent upon the Government of India at a time when Natal has chosen to make things so hot there for the free Indian. A sharp reminder at this juncture may act like a tonic."

14. The Áwáza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 24th September, referring to Lala Lajpat Rai's recent letter to the Panjabee (Lahore), on the subject of his departure to England, remarks that it clearly shows that he was innocent and was cruelly maligned by his unscrupulous detractors.

15. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 30th September, referring to the commutation of Mr. Tilak's sentence, requests Sir J. Hewett to accord the same treatment to Shanti Narayan, late editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), who is now undergoing a term of rigorous imprisonment.

Shanti Narayan.

MUSAFIR, 30th September 1908.

16. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 3rd October, referring to the satisfaction expressed at the commutation of Mr. Tilak's sentence, remarks that there is no reason for such satisfaction, as Mr. Tilak being an invalid could not be made to work, so that a sentence of rigorous imprisonment was useless in his case. Recognizing this, the Home Government thought that the commutation of his sentence into one of simple imprisonment would make little difference and would be a sop to the public. Hence the apparent leniency on the part of the Bombay Government. The editor further points out that in sending Mr. Tilak to the Mandalay Jail, Government hoped to be soon rid of him as in his present condition he could not long endure the trying climate of Burma.

Mr. Tilak's sentence.

SWARAJYA, 3rd October 1908.

17. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 4th October, has the following on the commutation of Mr. Tilak's sentence:—

Mr. Tilak's sentence.

ADVOCATE, 4th October 1908.

"A sort of agitation has been sought to be raised by a certain section of the press against the commutation by Sir George Clarke of the sentence passed on Mr. Tilak by the Bombay High Court. We are glad the 'call to arms' has fallen flat as there is very little inclination in the parties addressed to fall in with the cry of the scare-mongers. The Times of India and the Bombay Gazette raised their eyes with pious horror at what they deemed to be nothing less than sacrilege in that the Bombay Governor strayed into the domain sacred to, and interfered with, the judgement of the highest court in the land; and the Pioneer here not only joined, but cleverly sought to minimize the good impression that has been created by Sir George Clarke by suggesting that the concession was due to pressure from Lord Morley.

It is indeed very gratifying to learn on the highest authority that both the remission of the fine and the commutation of the sentence are the result of Sir George Clarke's own deliberate judgement and were neither the one or the other in any way due to any influence from above. When in the notorious Bloomfield murder case the accused, who were all Indians, were acquitted by the Calcutta High Court in deference to the demands of law and justice, a hue and cry was raised by Anglo-Indians not against the administration of justice by the High Court but against the High Court failing to take note of the consequence of such acquittal in endangering the lives of Europeans in the mofussil. When in connection with a number of cases about rioting and looting in East Bengal, the decisions of the courts of justice and of the High Court did not corroborate the official version, the highest tribunal was accused of a dereliction of duty in that it did not take into consideration the political aspect of the cases. Many Anglo-Indian papers did not forget to suggest that what the High Court failed to take note of, the Government in its executive capacity should not be slow to realize and act up to.

If the executive Government is called upon to exercise its discretion in cases where Anglo-Indian sentiment has not been respected by the Judges, why should not the same authority be allowed to exercise its prerogative, on occasions that call for such merciful interference in response to Indian feeling? As to Mr. Tilak's sentence, it should not be forgotten that the remission of the fine was suggested by the High Court itself when the rule for the grant of leave to file an appeal to the Privy Council came up for consideration.

In doing this the Governor of Bombay showed that the judiciary and the executive were at one as to one aspect of the sentence passed on Mr. Tilak. As to the other His Excellency naturally thought he could exercise his prerogative which does not in any way mean interference with the administration of justice,—'juggling with justice' as one critic characterized, 'reversing the judgement of the Court' as another took it to be. If alleviation of the tension of feeling between the rulers and the ruled and improvement in the political situation demand—as both do demand—a more conciliatory policy on the part of the Government, that any decision of any court should stand in the way of doing so is a proposition that cannot be admitted. If on special festive occasions prisoners are liberated without anybody finding fault with the authorities, why should there be such a furore when for the sake of peace in the land and good feeling between the State and the people a course of clemency is dictated?

Well, if deportation without a trial could be supported by the Anglo-Indian press when it suited their whims and fancies, why not a mere change in a sentence? Is not the demand for reasons due to the ugly fact that the action has gone counter to the fond wishes of the fire-eaters among the Anglo-Indian press? This is how the path of the sympathetic ruler is strewn not with roses but deliberately with thorns by parties and persons from whom better things are expected. The situation demanded a conciliatory policy. The far-sighted Governor of Bombay realized the need and applied the proper remedy. Now he must be run down because he did not agree to the fire and sword policy of some short-sighted people whose predecessors gave similar treatment to Lord Canning at a more critical time. Surely Sir George Clarke has not only talked firmness, but exercised it with candid justice, though not in consonance with Anglo-Indian views."

SWARAJYA, 3rd October 1908.

The future of the National Congress.

18. A correspondent who signs himself "Organization", contributes an article on the future of the National Congress to the Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 3rd October. He notes with regret that the most active members of the Congress are now either in exile or in prison. If the next session of the Congress is held at Madras it will be a mere show, as it will be attended merely by a handful of easy-chair politicians who will quietly depart to their homes after having delivered their speeches on educational, industrial and other reforms. The Congress has been in existence for more than twenty years, but during this long period it has done no substantial work. This, says the writer, is due to want of organization, moral courage and funds. It would be better, he thinks, if these dabblers in politics were to leave the Congress to earnest workers and attend to their own business or pleasures.

The Congress has been hitherto pressing the Government to introduce reforms, but now it should take upon itself the task of reform. The police can be reformed by establishing vigilance committees at various centres to watch their proceedings and to prevent them from accepting bribes or oppressing the poor. The separation of the judicial and executive functions can be effected by reviving the system of panchayats. In the same way if the people were to take up the dissemination of primary and technical education, they would not have to ask Government for help. It is time, he concludes, that Congress should cease talking and begin work in right earnest.

Odes.

19. The following political odes appear in the Swárajya (Allahabad), of the 3rd October :— SWARAJYA, 3rd October 1908.

By Gobind of Meerut :

"Gobind (god), come to my help, for I am dying ;
Release us from the clutches of the heartless.
My sores have begun to greatly trouble me these days,
Let some one gratify my desire (have them cured).
You have never gratified my desires,
How long can one hold his heart with his hands ?
Thou mayest torment us, O ! tyrant, as much as thou likest,
Thou art a cheat thyself, and mayest have us cheated by others also,
I am tired of life, O ! kind mother,
Let me rest in thy loving bosom.
Here they get a few mouthfuls in two or three days,
How can one quench his thirst with tears ?
Thy children cannot afford a drop of water (while) the foreigners are drinking goblets of wine.
They do not leave us a thread for our shrouds,
They take away all our cotton by deceit,
We cannot afford a thread for our shrouds,
The foreigners cover themselves with shawls.
What a (sad) time is it for them, O ! cycle of time,
Thy delicately brought-up (children) are going to jail.
Thou shalt get thy deserts one day,
Thou can'st still run thy course of tyranny and oppression for a time.
You should be always on the alert and cautious, Sahib (for)
The blacks won't forgive when they strike.
Is it not oppression, say conscientiously ?
You are imposing new taxes every day.
History narrates the tyrannous deeds of many (tyrants),
But deeds such as these, O ! tyrant, have never been seen or heard of.
Don't think it ridiculous that
The sighs of the oppressed reach the Throne of God,
Thou art murdering justice, day and night,
(So) the wounds of Bharat have developed into running sores.
What kindness can our country expect from thee,
Thou hast, my darling, ruined many houses.
Thou art the incarnation of the Kali-yuga, the giver of nectar,
Thy patient is confined to bed [counting the remaining days of his life (?)].
Hold dear the coarse-woven stuffs of India,
Send away the finely-woven stuffs of foreign countries.
Gobind (the writer) it is the prayer of all the people of this country,
May we never come into contact with the tyrant."

By Nanakchand, Auj :

"The lamentations and wailings of the oppressed are troubling us,
O ! tyrant, we hand thee over to God (for punishment),
Thou did'st but assist the swadeshi movement,
Thou would'st see thine enemies becoming bankrupt.
We had never even heard of what we (now) experience,
Cursed be thou, O ! tyrant, may thy God help thee.
When the blisters on our burning hearts burst
The water from them will overwhelm the march of events.
Indians, awake and open your eyes,

(For) you are being subjected to new acts of tyranny and oppression every day.
They are ignorant (fools) who are enamoured of foreign things,
They are wise who support home manufactures.
Let him that desires undying fame come and bathe in the nectar of swadeshi.
The night is passing, morning is at hand and this is the last course (of wine), so let him sing gleefully, what his feelings prompt.
If India would but renounce foreign merchandise
And hold swadeshi articles dear,
If it would but be constant to the swadeshi vow
Then England would have to sigh for bread.
Hold your heart tightly (have presence of mind) and let not your blow miss its aim,
Strike the tyrant a blow from which he may not recover.
O! heart, we shall regain our honour only when
The onlookers cry out 'well done,'
O! Auj, say to the tyrant while holding your heart,
'Thou mayest trouble us as much as thou likest.'"

By Babu Ram, Hari, editor of the Swarájya:

"Tyrant, thou mayest trouble us as much as thou likest,
But thou shalt not suppress my enthusiasm.
Not one life, but a thousand lives shall I sacrifice for India,
And thou mayest gladly cut my throat with the sword.
I am an Indian, even after death, I shall be bound to India,
What have I to do with England, villain!
What is imprisonment that I should fear it?
Even if thou imprisonest me in a dark well, tyrant,
God is my protector, and it is my hope
That even after a hundred years He will take me out safe and sound.
Is the grinding (of corn in jail) such a great misfortune that I should fear it?
Thou mayest have me flayed alive, if thou darest.
I swear by India that I will endure it in silence
For I trust in God to help me in my resolve.
Ah! how many innocent persons are rotting in jails.
They are not guilty, they are suffering for no fault of theirs.
By working oppression, thou shalt reap the reward of Aurangzeb and Zohhak (a Persian tyrant).
Those who are free are worse than prisoners.
It is not possible for any one to express his feelings.
Our mouths, our pens, our tongues and our lips are all gagged,
Every limb has been rendered inactive, how is it to be made free?
Notwithstanding this, they claim to be just.
How reasonable! Take care of your face (yourself) you fool,
How can we be silent, with all this tyranny and oppression?
How long can we hold our hearts with our hands?
Now we cannot control our passion any longer.
Lamentations and signs are rising (to my lips).
We are oppressed, we have lost the power of endurance.
O! God, take away these tyrants now, as soon as possible.
Endow mother India with a little strength,
O! God, I die for Thee, save this dying (person),
Make every Indian drink the cup of love for India
So that he may bear every misfortune lightly.

20. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 30th September, referring to the arrest of one Pandit Daulat Ram for reading a portion of the Sattyarth Prakash at a meeting of the Jhansi Arya Samaj, advises the Government to take the case in its own hands, otherwise there will be a gross miscarriage of justice.

The Arya Samaj.

21. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 30th September, referring to the acquittal by the High Court of two persons sentenced to death by the Sessions Judges of Jhansi and Garhwal on entirely frivolous charges, remarks that carelessness of this nature on the part of judicial officials is doing more to undermine British prestige in the country than anything else. The editor thinks that an inquiry into the deterioration of British justice in India is more necessary than the introduction of the proposed reforms.

22. The editor of the Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), writing in the issue of the 1st October, suggests the advisability of the revival of the ancient system of panchayats which would put a stop to the ruinous litigation which has become so common in the rural areas of India. The sums thus saved could be utilized for agricultural improvements and a happier day would then be in store for the poor ryot.

23. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 1st October, referring to the prosecution of several Poona journalists for making unfair and defamatory remarks regarding Mr. Justice Davar, remarks that the Government should be cautious in instituting such prosecutions, as they cause much bitterness which could be easily avoided.

The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 7th October, complains of the order issued to all Civil and Revenue Courts to the effect that a court-fee stamp should be used only on the day of issue otherwise it will become useless. ADVOCATE, 1st October 1908.

Religious education.

"There seems to be almost a wonderful unanimity among the critics of the present-day system of education in one respect; they regret the absence of any provision for imparting religious education in our schools and colleges. From all quarters the demand has grown loud that some sort of religious education should be given to our boys. There is no question that this cry is against the tendency towards secularizing education in all progressive countries. This tendency does not, as some people imagine, mean aiming at making for a godless education, but seeks to remove the great hindrance to educational advance due to almost irreconcilable differences among the followers of different faiths. We know for certain some sort of religious education is imparted in some educational institutions, the products of which may have a firm faith in their respective religions, but are not less, if not more, bitter in their feeling towards the followers of other faiths. This risk is a stupendous difficulty in the way to giving religious education and any instruction on the universal principles would be more philosophical than practical, less inspiring and more discursive. Evidently the problem is beset with too many impediments."

HINDI HINDOSTHAN, 1st October 1908.

Primary education.

27. The Hindi Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 1st October, suggests the desirability of primary education being imparted to the Indian masses on a more liberal scale than heretofore, as this will make the work of administration easier and will make the people comparatively happy and prosperous.

ADVOCATE, 4th October 1908.

The educational needs of Kumaun.

28. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 4th October, complains that there is only one Government school in Kumaun, although according to the instructions issued by the Government of India on the subject, there should be one Government model school in each district. The editor points out that there is not a single school in Naini Tal in which Government teachers are employed. There is a private school which is threatened with disaffiliation, while the Mission School cannot be popular as it is sectarian. He further suggests the advisability of establishing an Arts and Science College at Almora.

The same issue contains two letters on the same subject. One correspondent suggests the establishment of a Government school at Naini Tal and the other proposes that the Government School at Almora should be raised to the status of a second grade college.

MASHRIQ, 6th October 1908.

Arabic and Sanskrit scholarships.

29. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 6th October, referring to the discontent caused among the Musalmans by the Government awarding three scholarships for the study of Sanskrit and only one for the study of Arabic, remarks that this is due to the fact that the India Government does not ascertain public opinion on questions of the day before referring them to the Secretary of State. The editor thinks that if more scholarships were granted for the study of Arabic or Persian, the Musalmans would become lax in their study of Western science and literature, and hence the Government's proposal is to be commended.

(f)—Agriculture and questions affecting the land.

CAWNPORE GAZETTE, 1st October 1908.

Agricultural College, Cawnpore.

30. The Cawnpore Gazette, of the 1st October, suggests the advisability of conferring degrees on the graduates of the Agricultural College, Cawnpore, just as is done at the College in Poona, so that the better class of zamindars may be encouraged to send their sons to it.

RAJPUT, 30th September 1908.

Alienation of land.

31. The Rajput (Agra), of the 30th September, complains that owing to the facilities for the alienation of land under the existing law, a good deal of landed property has passed from the hands of ancient families of Rajputs into those of people of other castes who, maddened by their sense of possession even dare to aspire for Swaraj. The editor urges the amendment of the law that has given rise to this evil and further suggests the enforcement of the system of the right of primogeniture in India so that big estates upon which Government can count fully for support may not be dismembered.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, October 1908.

Indian Musalmans and Swadeshism.

32. Mr. Mushir H. Kidwai, Barrister-at-Law, in an article in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for October, ascribes the poverty of the Musalmans throughout the world to their lack of industrial enterprise. For the Indian Musalmans, he says, the only possible solution of the problem is to join the ranks of the swadeshists. Moneylending is forbidden by Islam, so the Musalmans should engage in manufactures. But, he says, "Musalmans cannot possibly join in militant swadeshism. They have an international importance and a greater responsibility. They are bound by duty and by religion to be loyal to the ruling authority. They have to win the sympathies and affections of the British people not only for themselves in India but also for the sake of their co-religionists abroad. So if their Hindu countrymen want them to join hands with them in swadeshism, that swadeshism must be run on peaceful and economic and not on political and militant lines."

Swadeshi is the only weapon with which, Mr. Kidwai thinks, not only India but the whole of Asia must seek to break the prowess of Europe. Europe dominates Asia through its materialism, commercial activities, industrial development, scientific inventions and organizing power.

Swadeshism would bring all these things to Asia also.

Commenting on this article, the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 1st October, remarks :— ADVOCATE, 1st October 1908.

"We hope and trust Mr. Kidwai's words will carry conviction to our Muhammadan friends who have a lurking suspicion in their hearts as to the advisability of helping forward this one movement meant to further the material advancement of the country."

33. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 1st October, notes with satisfaction that the Taluqdars of Oudh are again considering the idea of starting a bank, which is to be named after Sir J. LaTouche, for the purpose of assisting financially those of their number who are in the clutches of money lenders. The editor hopes that this scheme will render this useful class once more prosperous. ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 1st October 1908.

The "LaTouche Bank."

34. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 1st October, has the following under the heading "The Unemployed" :— ADVOCATE, 1st October 1908.

"The Unemployed."

"Famine or no famine, the man in search of work is always with us in India; he is an inevitable evil to be put up with. The Government does not bother itself with this undesirable person, but society extends to him unorganized individual charity, the good offices of which are generally monopolized by the able-bodied professional beggar. This charity has taken the place of the poor law of England in this country, but it has not helped the self-respecting seeker of work to any extent. And, as we have said in our last, faith in kismat has been of immense use to keep the workless labourer quiet in the midst of keen hunger-thrusts. Not so is the case in the United Kingdom. Every year, particularly during the cold weather, the Government, as also a good many philanthropic bodies and individuals, take care to provide either employment or food for the unemployed. This year the situation promises to be worse than before. Surely the case of the unemployed is one of praying for bread and getting, if not the proverbial stone in return, something very like it—a baton thrust with emphasis."

35. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 3rd October, has the following :— SWARAJYA, 3rd October 1908.

"The Unemployed."

"Come and we will tell you what these Whites, who are so proud of their civilization, do when unemployed. They are not like you; they do not go to bed, having fed on the bark of trees; when they cannot afford bread, they have to be content with grass and dried leaves, but they do not compel the Government to give them bread. They think—and they are right in doing so—that it is the duty of the Government to feed its subjects. If they are dying of starvation, and the officials are callous (to their sufferings) or make lame excuses, then they consider it right to overthrow such a Government (lit. uproot it from its very root). When starving, they (European labourers) threaten the municipality, break into firms, &c."

36. The Swarájya (Allahabad), of the 3rd October, referring to the look-out in the cotton trade in Lancashire, remarks that it is the effect of the swadeshi and boycott movements. The editor hopes that if these movements become more popular, England will feel their effect still more keenly. SWARAJYA, 3rd October 1908.

The Lancashire look-out.

37. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 3rd October, referring to the look-out in the cotton trade in Lancashire, remarks that this is the indirect result of the swadeshi movement. The editor expresses the hope that if the movement becomes as popular in other provinces as it is in Bengal the import of cloth will be reduced to a minimum. OUDH AKHBAR, 3rd October 1908.

The Lancashire look-out.

ADVOCATE, 4th October 1908.

Sanitation.

38. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 4th October, referring to the recommendation of the Sanitary Commission of Bombay that the sewage from Love Grove should be removed to a spot where it could be treated before passing into the sea, remarks :—

"We invite the patient attention of the Government of these provinces to this recommendation. How can people in Lucknow, Allahabad, and Cawnpore be protected from malaria and other fever when the sewage falls into the river above the ghats where they bathe and their clothes are washed? Proper disposal of sewage water and protection of the river from poisoning by the refuse water of large towns are the first problems which need solution at the hands of our municipal boards."

MASHRIQ, 6th October 1908.

Mendicancy.

39. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 6th October, referring to the agitation in the Indian press for the suppression of mendicancy, remarks that it is high time that an association was formed to check begging and some useful work done in this direction.

VYAPARI AND KARIGAR, 1st October 1908.

Railway goods.

40. The Vyápari and Kárigar (Benares), of the 1st October, complains that traders are put to heavy losses through thefts owing to railways refusing to recognize their responsibility for goods deposited in their warehouses until a railway receipt has been given to the consigner. The editor suggests that railway companies should be held responsible for all goods as soon as unloaded in their warehouses, no matter whether the usual receipt has been granted or not.

ADVOCATE, 1st October 1908.

Protection of female passengers.

41. The Advocate (Lucknow) of the 1st October, has the following :—

"Since the cold-blooded murder of Miss Taylor under very painful circumstances, many suggestions have been made as to how to protect female passengers from robbery and murder. The minds of the writers in the Anglo-Indian press had solely been occupied with the pitiable condition of an unprotected European girl, they have not thought of her Indian sister who not unoften when alone falls a prey to the lust of some railway employés. It has been suggested that foot-boards should entirely be done away with, which will mean that in a running train it will be impossible for passengers in a neighbouring car or for the guard himself to offer any help to a victim. We know, as a matter of fact, that during the last month two Indian ladies were saved from the hands of badmashes by passengers travelling in the next carriage; a year or two ago the honour of two Indian ladies was saved from intended outrage by two Eurasian employés of the Bengal and North-Western Railway, by an Indian employé, as by easily standing on the foot-board he could prevent mischief-making in the female compartment. Then it has been suggested that ladies should be allowed to travel with dogs in the carriage. Well, five lady passengers sitting with five dogs in the train barking at every new passenger trying to enter the carriage will be an edifying spectable indeed. It has been suggested that ladies should be allowed to fasten the doors of the carriage from inside and they should not be openable without the ladies' help. Surely pitiable will also be the condition of the lady travelling alone who will have to get up at every station to open doors to admit new passengers. We do not think these suggestions are likely to offer any protection; none of these can be of any help to an Indian lady travelling alone. In our opinion the remedy lies in the employment of an extra staff of Guards and in an increase of the force of the Railway Police. A composite first and second class carriage can be placed on one side and a composite third and inter class on the other, and between the two should be a van for an extra Guard and a constable whose duty it must be to get out at every station and see that things are alright at the ladies' compartments. If the railways be unwilling to employ extra Guards, then we would suggest to the Government to increase the number of Sub-Inspectors so that an English-knowing Sub-Inspector with a constable may travel with every train. This extra staff will be able to protect women and also be able to prevent crime. The presence of two men ready to render every help, whom even the screams in a running train can reach, will offer greater protection than all the contrivance that could be devised in the carriages."

Safety of railway passengers.

42. The Awáza-i-Khalq (Benares), in its combined issue of the 1st and 8th October, referring to the various proposals made for the safety of female railway passengers, such as allowing the ladies to take dogs with them in carriages or to bolt the doors from the inside, remarks that none of them are practical and if adopted will only lead to confusion. The editor thinks that it would be more practical if there were some way of communicating with the Guard, and that the Assistant Guard should be in a compartment near the ladies.

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 1st and 8th October 1908.

Shias and Sunnis.

43. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 1st October, referring to the request made by the Shias of Lucknow to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor to appoint a commission to inquire into the Shia-Sunni disputes in Lucknow, remarks that the chronic evils of a society can be removed by its own efforts, and the intervention of the Government will prove futile.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 15th October 1908.

The Crisis in Europe.

1. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 15th October, has the following:—

"All over the world a new beacon has been lighted and a new signal has been put up, and the watchwords on that signal are Liberty and Independence. Even the good old panacea of oriental despotism has failed. All despotism in Asia is coming to an end and only a western despotism is to be found in an eastern country. All the virtue has gone out of phrases that have been the shibboleth of history and of European nations for centuries. Let a new definition be found for the method by which an oriental country is to be governed. Let us also have another idea of the first duty of a Government. It is the maintenance of order—we have been told with that reiteration that makes for emphasis. Does the maintenance of order exclude everything else? Evidently not, for order was being maintained in Turkey all the time that it was passing from despotism to constitutionalism. India is the lowest in the scale of nations, but even here the inspiration of a national existence is working wonders. The sleeping manhood of the country is being awakened and a growing purpose is running through the dawning of a new day."

BHARAT SUDASHA-PRAVARTAK, September 1908.

His Honour's speech.

2. In reviewing the speech of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor the Bharat Sudashá-Pravartak (Farrukhabad), for the month of September, remarks that every reasonable Indian must feel grateful to the British Government for the many benefits that it has conferred upon India and must condemn seditious movements in the country in unequivocal terms. The editor hopes that the Government will receive every support from the people in the suppression of the anarchist propaganda. He regrets he could not publish His Honour's speech in full, but proposes to distribute copies of it broadcast among the people, if he can obtain in sufficient numbers.

BRAHMAN SARVASVA, October 1908.

His Honour's speech.

3. Reviewing His Honour's speech at Agra, the Brahman Sarvasva (Etawah), for October, says that the rumour of sedition in the country is for the most part unfounded and need not disconcert any body: what little sedition there is in the country has been created by Government trying to suppress the swadeshi movement. If government were to openly declare for the swadeshi movement, all sedition in the country would cease in no time.

ADVOCATE, 15th October 1908.

Parsi Loyalty meeting.

4. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 15th October, referring to the resolution of loyalty passed at a meeting of the Parsis at Bombay which was attended with scenes of disorder, remarks:—

"The resolution is an index of the feeling of the Parsi community and surely a death-blow to the pretensions of the people who gave out that the Parsis as a community had nothing to do with the political aspirations of educated Indians or that their interests were not identical with the rest of the community. We regret that there should have been any scenes at the meeting, but perhaps these were unavoidable when people living with their millions do not keep themselves in touch with the feelings of the mass of their people. The Government which is trying to conciliate the richer classes at the cost of the professional middle classes and which has laterly shown greater confidence in the so-called natural leaders of the people as opposed to the lawyers and school masters, ought with benefit to note that it is the latter classes which lead the current of thought of educated Indians as they have done in other civilized parts of the world."

HINDUSTANI, 14th October 1908.

Parsi loyalty meeting.

5. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 14th October, reproduces the article entitled 'A Parsi loyalty meeting' from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 15th October.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 15th October 1908.

Loyalty by order.

6. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 15th October, has the following under the marginally noted heading:—

"We have more than once given offence by the manner in which we have written about loyalty meetings and loyalty manifestoes, but it is better to state the truth than to accept a piece of playacting as the truth. We have no hesitation whatever in saying that these loyalty meetings in spite of the fact that they are carefully registered at Simla, will be of no use or help to the Government. In the majority of instances these meetings are not voluntary and they are organized by men who have no hold on their people. Then the loyalty of the people will be retained or lost according as the Government pursues a policy of coercion or conciliation. The man whose house is searched ceases to be loyal to the Government, in spite of anything that he may say. No man is above suspicion, for if the Raja of Narajole can be accused of conspiracy, there is no Raja or Maharaja who may not be suspected of being the head of the anarchist movement. The latest object-lesson is the Parsi loyalty meeting held in Bombay under the presidency of Sir Jamsetji Jijibhoy. The Parsis are at least as loyal as the Muhammadans; they take very little part in politics and their commercial success depends upon their British connection. Yet when a public meeting was held and a resolution in the terms of Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji's message was placed before the meeting, there was an uproar. This loyalty business is being done to death and is sickening to all self-respecting people. If silence means disloyalty, then ninety-nine hundredths of the population are hopelessly disloyal because they are inarticulate; of the rest, the majority will not speak because they think it is humiliating to make professions which are not demanded except by the nervous uneasiness of an unnerved bureaucracy. Has the Government any notion what it is to deal with a disloyal India? It is well that it has not, and it would be better if the attempt to wring a confession of faith from every one were abandoned. Sir Pherozshah Mehta and Mr. D. E. Wacha did not attend the meeting. How are they to be classified?"

Indian Muhammadans and the Turkish constitution.

7. The Sahifa (Bijnor), of the 5th October, referring to the granting of the constitution to Turkey and to the jubilations of the Indian Musalmans on the occasion, remarks that Muhammadans in India feel glad, not because they think representative government a panacea for every evil in a country, but because in the case of Turkey, it has suppressed many elements of discord which boded danger alike to the State and to the people. Indian Musalmans cannot be accused of inconsistency, therefore, when they discountenance similar agitation in India, for they believe that in view of the peculiar conditions of India, representative government is very detrimental to the interest of the rulers and the ruled.

SAHIFA, 5th October 1908.

Turkish constitution and its lessons.

8. A correspondent of the Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), writing in the issue of the 16th October, remarks that the constitution in Turkey was granted after the patience and energy of the people had been thoroughly tested by repressive measures—the precursor of political independence. He expresses the hope that the Turkish constitution will have its effect upon the Musalmans of India who are constantly voicing their loyalty from the house-tops without pausing to consider that the disloyal agitator of to-day are the nation-builders of to-morrow.

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 16th October 1908.

Indians in South Africa.

9. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 11th October, has the following:—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 11th October 1908.

"There has been no abatement or mitigation of the ill-treatment of Asiatics in the Transvaal and South Africa. All the rumours that the Imperial Government had interceded and that a satisfactory settlement was about to be arrived at have proved unfounded. The Imperial Government does not recognize the Asiatic or the Indian peril; it is keenly alive to the Boer and Uitlander peril. The Boer is an enemy to be respected; he is a subject to be conciliated or coaxed, but on no account to be crossed. The millions of mild, sheep-like natives of India may get annoyed at the treatment of their countrymen in South Africa, but who cares a rap for their annoyance? If the press forgets itself and uses the language of violent protest, there is the law of sedition and the new law of incitement to murder and violence. If there is any serious demonstration, is not the Government here to maintain order? Send in your protest and telegrams, but beyond that there is nothing to be done. Meantime, the merry game of baiting Asiatics in South Africa is going on. The sacred name of the law is being dragged through the mire in order to give a legal appearance to a systematic persecution of Asiatics with the avowed object of hounding them out of the country. And the Asiatics have taken up the challenge with a courage that augurs well for the future of the Asiatic races. It is only passive resistance, for nothing else is possible, but passive resistance leads to other things. Those Indians out there are made of much better stuff than our people here. Living in South Africa is very expensive and the struggle in business is keen. Men who can succeed under those conditions must be superior men. Mr. Gandhi is a courageous and sagacious leader, but his work is made easy by the men behind him. Every one is ready to violate the degrading laws and regulations and to face the consequences. Mr. Gandhi himself has been arrested again, for what offence no one knows, but it may be some such terrible crime as not having a permit or a license, or entering forbidden territory. What license had the Boers and the Uitlanders when they interloped into the land of the Zulus? They had the persuasive permits of the Maxim, the Martini-Henri and the Colt. No law is so perfect as the law of Might, but Time is more powerful and its whirligig brings strange vicissitudes. By the mockery of legislation, the Transvaal Government is treating the Asiatic population worse than beasts, because the Asiatics cannot resort to violence. Will this endure for ever? These boers and Uitlanders forget that there is a God in Heaven and His justice never fails."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 11th October 1908.

Asiatic immigration and the British Empire.

10. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 11th October, referring to the keen struggle between the European and Asiatic settlers in the British Colonies and its probable result, remarks :—

"In any case, however, the result will probably lead to the disruption of the British Empire. For the tie that holds the Empire together is not that of real affection. It is vanity on the one side and self-interest on the other. Whatever some rhetorical English journals may say, there is no great love between England and her colonies. The Englishman dislikes the rough manners of the Colonial and the Colonial dislikes the assumptions of superiority of the Englishman. When Australia ceases to need, or feels that she cannot rely on the protection of the British fleet, she will sever her connection with England."

SAMRAT, 6th August 1908.

Hindi in the Indian National Congress.

11. The Samrat (Kalakankar), of the 6th August (received on the 12th October), notes with satisfaction the suggestion made by the Kal of Poona regarding the proceedings of the Indian National Congress being carried on in Hindi.

The editor hopes that all the leading journals of India will express their approval of the suggestion and co-operate in making Hindi the national language of India. This would do much good to the Congress and to the people as well.

OUDH AKHBAR, 14th October 1908.

The Indian National Congress.

12. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 14th October, referring to the opinion emanating from certain quarters regarding the giving up of the Congress, remarks that in spite of the futility of political agitation, the Indian National Congress must continue to hold its sittings year by year. The editor advises the people to patiently bide their time and not to resort to violence simply because their endeavours have been unfruitful in the past.

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 7th October 1908.

Muhammadans of the Bombay Presidency.

13. A correspondent writing to the Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 7th October, makes the following observations regarding the address presented by the Muhammadans to His Excellency the Governor of Bombay :—

(1) The new scheme for electing the members of Municipal Boards is objectionable as the interests of the Muhammadans who are in a minority suffer from it.

(2) The Muhammadans, as has been pointed out by His Excellency in his reply to the address, should not hesitate in adopting languages other than Urdu as a medium of communication.

(3) Muhammadans should first try to prove themselves worthy of concessions and then set about asking for them. It is no use making constant demands for the Government is alive to the rights and claims of every community.

The writer, in conclusion exhorts his co-religionists to look to the education of their brethren and not to waste their energies in always agitating for privileges.

14. In continuation of his article headed "Causes of the unrest in India during the year 1907-08," (Vide Selections No. 40, paragraph 11) the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), writing in the issue of the 6th October, remarks that in the mutiny of 1857 the Muhammadans were misled by the Hindus and did not join it of their own accord. He further observes that the revolt was due simply to the wicked machinations of Baji Rao, who was subsequently assisted in his mischievous schemes by Appa Sahib and Nana Rao. The fact that Muhammadans were subjected to brutal punishments was due to the panic that got hold of the minds of Europeans, blinded by which they could not distinguish their real friends from their foes. The editor observes in conclusion that the situation in India to-day is similar to that of 1857, with this difference only that in 1857 the Muhammadans could be misled, but to-day they are far wiser than they were half a century ago.

ALBASHIR, 6th October 1908.

Causes of the unrest in India during the year 1907-08.

15. The Tafrih (Lucknow), of the 7th October, referring to the form of self-government prevalent in the colonies, remarks that it is idle to hope that the Government will accede to the demand on the part of Indians for Government on colonial lines. It is better therefore to be contented with any honest beginning in that direction, e.g., with Local Self-Government.

TAFRIH, 7th October 1908.

Self-Government.

16. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 8th October, referring to the proposed granting of a constitution to China, remarks that we find that everywhere a spirit of democracy is abroad and that the East is keeping pace with the march of time. This, the editor holds, is the beneficient effect of the liberal system of British education, and urges that measures should be adopted to make its diffusion in the east wider.

OUDH AKHBAR, 8th October 1908.

The Asiatic awakening.

17. The Kayasth Hitkari (Agra), of the 8th October, in urging the necessity for cherishing national ideas and traditions remarks:—

KAYASTH HITKARI, 8th October 1908.

Utility of national traditions.

When a conquered nation dies of starvation, when its individuals are subjected to ill-treatment and when its women are disgraced, it ought to look about itself and ascertain what it is that has made it so low and despicable in the eyes of its conquerors.

No nation numerically large can be subjected to such treatment unless avarice, idleness, selfishness, cowardice and immorality have crept into its system. To remove these it should look back and try to be what it was in the past. It is no use spending all one's energy, eloquence and versatility in denouncing the conquerors.

18. Referring to the sentence of five years' transportation passed upon a young boy of 18 by the Sessions Judge of Karur, the Musafir (Agra), of the 8th October, remarks that such severe sentences will undoubtedly break the spirit of anarchism in the country; but it would be better if the Government secured respect through love and not through fear.

MUSAFIR, 8th October 1908.

Repressive policy.

19. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 15th October, has the following remarks on the press communique recently issued from Simla:—

ADVOCATE, 15th October 1908.

Council reforms.

"The announcement contained in the last few lines will be read with deep interest throughout the country. It confirms the reports received from England that the reforms which we are going to have will be substantial and really a step in advance and no sham ones. The statement that Mr. R. C. Dutt has expressed his satisfaction with the scheme as far as he has seen it has caused some pain to the Englishman and the manner in which the Anglo-Indian Press has begun to talk of Lord Morley's "philosophical radicalism" shows that some encroachment is about to be made on the close preserve of vested interests which has caused not a little surprise to exponents of such interests.

20. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 15th October, has the following remarks on the recent resolution of the Government of Bombay on the participation of students in politics.:—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 15th October 1908.

Students and politics.

The Government of Bombay has embarked upon a novel experiment, no doubt. Hitherto the saying was that men cannot be made virtuous by Acts of Parliament.

The advisors of the Bombay Government have evidently found out a flaw in the argument by which such a proposition is established, and hence this resolution. We do not mean that students generally ought to take part in politics, neither does this resolution support such a contention. It makes a concession in favour of College students. What we mean is that such resolutions well-conceived and well-meant, more often than not, overshoot the mark and so carry with them the elements of failure. The position is not often clearly understood. Our viewpoints are different. Our rulers will never acknowledge that the whole country is moved by the Time-Spirit. The resolution expresses extreme solicitude for the students. But not only does it purport to contain rules for the boys, but it also lays down rules for the parents and the teachers. It lays down rules and principles and also suggests remedies. We could understand rules for compulsory education, but we cannot understand how good morals or manners can be inculcated by ordinances. We take morals from examples, as we imitate manners from each other, from the persons with whom we come in contact in our daily work. Good teachers only can make good students. Very few of our modern teachers take to this calling for the love of the thing. Money making is generally their object. Very few keep in view a connected and complete ideal of moral character and still fewer of them direct their efforts at moral teaching towards moulding the character of the pupils after any high ideal. The resolution has unconsciously done injustice in comparing our modern teachers with the ancient gurus. To them the hope of happiness or earthly good, or the fear of misery or persecution was not the motive for doing what is right or for abstaining from doing what is wrong. He will be a bold teacher indeed who in these days would try to inculcate principles of self-abnegation or should endeavour to awaken in his pupils the desire of doing his duty regardless of consequences. And what respect can either a parent or a pupil have either for a teacher or for the matter of that, for any other authority who would subserve his self-respect and conscience to petty earthly gain? The students have not become disrespectful. Indian students have as much reverence and regard for elders or gurus, as their forefathers had. They have simply imbibed the idea that nothing should be taken for granted. They seek for a reason for everything, and they also by nature learn to hate the teachers who have nothing but contempt for everything Indian– Indian history, Indian traditions, Indian morals, Indian manners, and Indian boys--except Indian money. Education by such resolutions and ordinances can have only one result, it will put a premium upon insincerity."

CITIZEN, 15th October 1908.

Tilak's sentence.

21. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 15th October, has the following :—

"Bombay Presidency seems to have been singularly fortunate in possessing a generous-spirited and noble Governor. Within a very short time after stepping ashore at Bombay, His Excellency has won the hearts of all the subjects of the different denominations placed under his benign control. So far we know, to keep order and public tranquility, Sir G. Clarke was reluctant in prosecuting Mr. Tilak for his seditious articles. The recent riot in Bombay was the outcome of Mr. Tilak's trial and subsequent sentence. The riot was no doubt the result of irresponsible and cowardly abbetors, who instigated from behind the screen, the innocent working class, especially the mill hands. Broadminded and educated people of Bombay had not the slightest sympathy with the rioters. Mr. Justice Davar, the Parsi Judge, though he was very courteous and sympathetic in his attitude towards the accused during the trial, was quite helpless before the verdict of the jury. The law forced him to sentence the prisoner, though so far as we know Mr. Justice Davar was quite reluctant in pronouncing the sentence. Every one is aware that the British Government's motto is justice blended with mercy. The kind-hearted and noble Governor Sir G. Clarke after the sentence was passed used the powers that are invested in him as Governor. Within a very short time after Mr. Tilak's transportation, we learnt with much gratification that the fine had been cancelled and the rigorous imprisonment was changed into simple. Looking at the old age of Mr. Tilak and the standard of comfort he enjoyed at home, this transmutation of the sentence is a great boon and a great solace to Mr. Tilak's unfortunate family. We are quite sure that we will not have to wait long before we shall have the happiness to hear of the release of Mr. Tilak. The alleged leader of the Mahrattas no doubt has suffered enough by this time owing to his extreme views, and now we have reason to believe that Mr. Tilak will modify his views in case the kind government sets him at large. The change in the imprisonment from rigorous into simple and the cancellation of the fine of Rs. 1,000 is highly admired and appreciated by all men of different political creeds. Even the Extremist papers of Bengal have received the happy news of the unexpected change in the sentence with surprise and they all speak very highly of the generous and liberal spirit of His Excellency Sir George Clarke, the popular Governor of Bombay. We congratulate the noble Governor on the liberal policy adopted by him which is so very necessary in view of the present discontent to win the hearts of the people. We can assure the Government that there may be some discontented folks, but Indians are never disloyal to their sovereign. God save the King-Emperor and his noble representatives in India, under whose care millions of loyal people are placed."

The Partition Day Anniversary.

22. Referring to the 16th of October celebration, the editor of the Citizen (Allahabad), in the issue of the 15th October, makes the following observations :— CITIZEN, 15th October 1908.

"No amount of hot speeches will effect the desired re-amalgamation.

We will appeal to our brethren in Bengal and elsewhere to adopt moderate means and to fight out their political battle with constitutional measures. The moderate tendency is sure to win the sympathy of the Government in the long run. During the present critical juncture in Bengal we hope everything will pass off smoothly—turbulence will not stand in good stead. Let us pray and we are confident our solicitations are sure to be vouchsafed.

District Courts.

23. The Kannya Saha Jak (Meerut) in its September issue complains that cases in District Courts are often dismissed owing to the absence of the parties concerned. The editor suggests that the courts should wait for a reasonable time to enable the parties concerned to put in an appearance; for it often happens that they turn up immediately after the case is dismissed and thus suffer much loss. KANNYA SAHA JAK, September 1908.

The Midnapur bomb case.

24. The Musafir (Agra), of the 8th October, referring to the granting of bail to the accused in the Midnapur bomb conspiracy case, by Justice Mitra in spite of a difference of opinion between the other Judge and himself, remarks that it is men like Mr. Justice Mitra, who inspire confidence in the people by their unflinching devotion to the cause of justice and truth, and maintain the integrity of the High Court. The more men there are of his stamp the less shall we hear of the present day unrest. MUSAFIR, 8th October 1908.

The question of bail.

25. The Indian People (Allahabad) has the following in its issue of the 11th October :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 11th October 1908.

"The important question of granting bail to undertrial prisoners has again been brought to the front by the Midnapur cases. This question it seems will never have an easy solution. Uniform practice in the matter of admitting any accused persons to bail is an impossibility, for every case must be judged by its individual peculiarity. Yet the principle has always been enunciated, and we have been taught to revere it and associate it with the enunciation of our individual right to personal liberty, that a person must be judicially found to be guilty before he is punished. Unfortunately in the present circumstances of our country the reverse of this principle seems to be in favour. The unfortunate spectacle of Mr. Justice Coxe's disagreeing with Mr. Justice Mitter of the Calcutta High Court on the question of granting bail to the accused in the Midnapur case has an effect more far-reaching than lies on the surface. The public is privileged to put its own construction on the statement made in court by Mr. Hemendra Nath Mitter who in the absence of Mr. Baxter, the now famous Crown Prosecutor, said that he had been instructed to oppose the granting of bail in the case on "administrative" grounds. The law says that in the matter of refusing bail the "grounds" for the consideration of the Judges can be nothing else than "reasonable grounds" for believing that the accused is guilty. And then this belief must be judicial, that is to say, it must be based on some substantial evidence on the record. No extraneous or extra judicial grounds should weigh in the minds of the Judges. So far as we have been able to see, we have not found any evidence to connect the seventeen accused in the Midnapur case with any complicity in a crime. To require that a man should be considered guilty till he has been able to prove his innocence is a dangerous innovation in a country like this where a man, howsoever high his social position may be, is sure to be deserted by friends and relations as soon as he is found to be in the bad books of the police. Where the heaviest sureties can be demanded, and the principles of law and justice vindicated without the aid of extraneous innovations, we fail to see why Judges should go out of their way and make an exhibition of their temper and weakness and thus bring into ridicule the palladium of justice in British India."

MASHRIQ, 13th October 1908.

The Mahratta Defamation case.

26. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 13th October, referring to the sentence of 14 days' imprisonment and a fine passed upon Mr. Kelkar of the Mahratta, remarks that the order of the Judge regarding the further confinement of the editor for an unlimited period of time if he fails to tender an apology after the expiry of his term is quite illegal. Indian lawyers, the editor hopes, will draw the attention of the Government to this.

HINDUSTANI, 14th October 1908.

Kali Charan Mukerjea.

27. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 14th October, referring to the sentence of nine months' rigorous imprisonment passed upon Kali Charan Mukerjea, by the Sessions Judge of Aligarh, remarks that in view of what the learned Judge has observed about his not being a dangerous man, the sentence seems rather a bit too severe. The learned Judge, adds the editor, ought to have taken into consideration the fact that the opinion of the handwriting expert is not infallible as has been pointed out by the Allahabad High Court.

Justice Shahdin.

33. While expressing his satisfaction at the appointment of Mr Shahdin as a temporary Judge of the Punjab Chief Court, the editor of the Mashriq (Gorakhpur), in the issue of the 13th October, complains that the claims of the Hon'ble Mr. Lalchand for the permanent vacany have been overlooked in favour of Mr. Johnston who succeeds Mr. Justice Chatterjeea as Judge of the Punjab Chief Court.

MASHRIQ, 13th October 1908.

The Judgeship of the Punjab Chief Court.

34. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 14th October, referring to the appointment of Mr. Johnston, as a Judge of the Punjab Chief Court, remarks that this decision of the Government has very much disappointed the people of the Punjab who had expected that the judgeship would go to Lala Lalchand, a thoroughly capable man in every respect. The editor hopes that on the next occasion, however, Lala Lalchand's claims will not be disregarded. He further observes that it would be better if the Indian Association, Lahore, sent in a memorial to the Secretary of State urging that out of the six judges of the Punjab Chief Court two should be Indians.

HINDUSTANI, 14th October 1908.

The Punjab Chief Court.

35. The Zul-Qarnain (Budaun), of the 7th October, repudiates the accusation so often made about the alleged partiality and prejudice of the Muhammadan rulers towards their Muhammadan subjects. The editor remarks that in spite of the evil that may have characterised any particular regime, the Muhammadan rule on the whole was as good as it could be. Even judicial and executive functions, for the separation of which at present the Congressites have been shouting themselves hoarse, were entrusted to different persons, and a perfect neutrality was observed in religious matters. They are most ungrateful beings, indeed, who represent the Muhammadan rule in such false colours.

ZUL-QARNAIN, 7th October 1908.

Muhammadan rulers.

36. A correspondent writing to the Jadd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 12th October, remarks that a satisfactory solution of the Hindu-Muhammadan problem is impossible for the Hindus will not easily give up their touch-me-not sort of scruples, and the Muhammadans will not join hands with Hindus except on terms of strict loyalty to the British Government,

JADD-O-JEHAD, 12th October 1908.

The Hindu-Muhammadan question.

37. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 14th October, referring to the swadeshi movement and the benefits that have resulted from it in the course of three short years, remarks that this movement is destined to transform Indian life. It should be divested of all political agitation and loved merely for its own sake.

OUDH AKHBAR, 14th October 1908.

Politics and the swadeshi movement.

38. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 14th October, makes the following observations :—Bijay Dasmi, as its name implies, means the day of victory. It is celebrated by us to keep alive the instincts of virtue and manliness. But in our case it has failed in its purpose ; for can we say that we are still virtuous and manly when we put up with the illtreatment that we have to suffer in Australia and the Transvaal ? We see that we are dying of hunger but we do not stir, we see that our wealth is being drained away but we do not raise our voice in protest. We see the oppressions of the police and the miscarriage of justice every day, but we remain silent.

RAHBAR, 14th October 1908.

The Poojah festival and swadeshi movement.

What can we say of victory over others, when we are not able to control ourselves? How many of us have our own cherished principles, surely not one in a hundred? Let us examine it. We are all agreed as to the benefits of the swadeshi movement, but have we all in this province taken it to heart? Do we cherish it? Do we make sacrifices for it? No, surely not. Look at Bengal and Bombay on the other hand. How marvellously have they been helping forward its cause!

It is these provinces that are entitled to celebrate the Vijay Dasmi day. Their swadeshism indeed has got a victory over Bideshism. But what have we done for our swadeshi and why should we celebrate the Dasehra? But no! we, too, have done some thing: we have realised the utility of the swadeshi movement. And we know it is thought that begets action. May this be true in our case.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 15th October 1908.

The Vernacular Press.

39. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 15th October, strongly deprecates the violent tone of the Vernacular Press and remarks that if instead of courting prosecutions Indians adopted a moderate course of agitation, their endeavours would be more successful than all the sufferings which they so manfully undergo.

VI.—Railway.

JADD-O-JEHAD, 12th October 1908.

Outrages in railway trains.

40. Referring to the murder of Miss Taylor the Jadd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 12th October, remarks that as long as these outrages were confined to Indian ladies very little or rather no notice was taken of them. But now, since the murder of Miss Taylor the Anglo-Indian newspapers have raised the hue and cry, some good result is sure to follow. He only hopes that the beneficient effects of any measures adopted in this connection will be extended to Indian female passengers also.

JADD-O-JEHAD, 12th October 1908.

Railway collisions.

41. Referring to the collision on the Lahore-Delhi line, the Jadd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 12th October, regrets the frequent occurrence of such accidents, and remarks that the railway authorities should use all possible expedition in reporting to the press the casualties on such occasions. For this, the editor thinks, would put a stop to all idle and mischievous speculations on the subject.

VII.—Post Office.

MASHRIQ, 13th October 1908.

Large size envelopes.

42. A correspondent writing to the Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 13th October, observes that the sale of envelopes of the increased size recently adopted by the postal authorities is much hampered owing to the fact that these envelopes are charged for at a higher rate than the ordinary half anna envelopes. The writer suggests the advisability of reducing their price and of selling them at the ordinary rate.

VIII.—Native Societies and Religious and Social matters.

SAMRAT, 6th August 1908.

Religious Endowments.

43. The Samrat (Kalakankar), of the 6th August, received on the 11th October, referring to the lavish way in which public money is spent by the mahunts of maths on immoral and secular purposes, remarks that the people should co-operate with the Government in making such practices impossible through legislation.

SADDHARMA PRACHARAK, 30th September 1908.

The Dasehra Festival.

44. The Saddharma Pracharak (Bijnor), of the 30th September, remarks that hero-worship is a national instinct in human being hence it is that the Bijay Dasmi day is celebrated with much eclat in all parts of India. The victory of Ram over Rawan represents the victory of virtue over vice, and therefore it should be observed with due solemnity by every section of the Hindu community. Moreover, the celebration of such festivals keeps alive all that is best in the human heart and consequently they should not be neglected.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 15th October 1908.

Evening parties and European guests.

45. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 15th October, has the following:—

"The absence of all Europeans, whether official or non-official with the single exception of one gentleman, at the last Saturday's evening party in honour of Munshi Ganga Sahai, Rai Bahadur, Deputy Collector, caused some comment among the Indian guests assembled on the occasion. The promoters of the party were sadly disappointed, for even the Magistrate of the district did not condescend to grace the meeting by his presence. He must have been prevented from doing so by some other more urgent and more important business, but people draw their own conclusions. They refer to the evening party given in honour of Pandit Raj Nath Sahib, Subordinate Judge, on the eve of his retirement from service. On that occasion too just as on the present one not a single European official or non-official attended the party although it was given at the Mayo Hall and during the working season of the High Court when all the Judges and Barristers were in the station. After such repeated disillusioning and disappointment people may be excused if they question the advisability of repeating the experiment of inviting European guests to Indian parties in future."

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 16th October 1908.

The Dewali festival.

46. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 16th October, referring to the coming Dewali festival and to the gambling indulged in so recklessly on that occasion remarks that Indians should first reform socially and morally and then aspire for Swaraj.

The Turkish revolution.

1. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 22nd October, referring to the revolution in Turkey, remarks:— INDIAN PEOPLE, 22nd October 1908.

"Such, in short, is the secret history of this epoch-making event in Turkey. The world wave of "constitutional Liberty," the affairs in Turkey and Persia, are sure to reach the Muhammadan populace everywhere. Can a man in his senses believe that the young Musalmans in Aligarh and other places are ignorant of the doings of their co-religionists in other parts of the world. The Indian National Congress has been demanding, for years past, that India should be placed on the same footing as the self-governing colonies. Suppose the Indian Musalmans in a body wanted to have control over the finances and a voice in the administration? So long as the number of educated Indian Musalmans remains small, High Court Judgeships may silence them. But when the educated Muhammadans became numerically stronger—what then?"

(b)—Home.

Bomb in Agra.

2. The Nasím-i-Agra, of the 14th October, referring to a bomb that was found at the door of a chemist's shop in Agra, remarks that the proprietor of the shop is a sober man of good character. He cannot be suspected of any complicity in the affair. The whole thing seems to be the work of an enemy who thought this the best means of wreaking his vengeance upon him. The authorities, however, are expected to trace out the real culprits soon and thus save the public from much anxiety. NASIM-I-AGRA, 14th October 1908.

Bomb in Agra.

3. A correspondent of the Agra Akhbar, writing in the issue of the 21st October, makes the following observations regarding the discovery of bombs in Agra:— AGRA AKHBAR, 21st October 1908.

"Our province has hitherto been quite safe and undisturbed by the wicked machinations of the revolutionists; but it appears now that a secret organization has been working all along in Agra also. If clues are of any help, we can safely say that the boys of the boarding house with which Hoti Lal was connected before his arrest are at the bottom of the whole affair, at least so far as the appearance of bombs in Agra is concerned. Not only this; we feel as if they have been backed from behind the scenes by men of influence and wealth. Prevention is better than cure. We would advise the Government therefore to adopt stringent—nay even Russian—measures to nip the mischief in the bud. We are sorry to note that the Government has been more merciful than it ought to be, consistently with the safety of the Empire."

Anglo-Indians and Mr. Tilak's sentence.

4. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 8th October, has the following:— INDIAN PEOPLE, 8th October 1908.

"This is a curious world, and men contain, in themselves, the most singular contradictions. The Anglo-Indians of our days, more particularly our Anglo-Indian contemporaries seem to have monopolized this characteristic of exhibiting such contradictions. According to our contemporaries the Government of Bombay in commuting the sentence passed in Mr. Tilak's case has strayed into the domain sacred to the High Court of Bombay and the interference in this case has not only been uncalled for and ill-advised but illegal. Our contemporary the Bombay Gazette characterizes this action of the Bombay Government as "Juggling with Justice." Another contemporary of the same cult apprehends that within a very short time the Government may remit the sentence altogether and call upon Mr. Tilak to go to the Legislative Council as a member. According to our contemporaries, the Government and our Courts of Justice should disregard every fact and item of evidence and must judge of every case by its political aspects. In the Bloomfield murder case, when the Calcutta High Court let off the accused, who by the way happened to be all Indians, our contemporaries raised their eyes in pious horror and thought that their existence in India was jeopardized. In the East Bengal riot cases when the innocent were punished with the guilty and the whole country was struck by the demoralization which the lower executive officials exhibited, our contemporaries had very little to say inasmuch as the action of the officials then suited their political theory. Now that the Government of Bombay has been pleased to exercise a valued privilege—it is a privilege which can be exercised by Government according to the criminal law of the country—our contemporaries seem to think that the Government ought to consult them when and how to exercise that privilege. It must have been a mistake on the part of the law-makers who never perhaps thought of such a contingency. Our contemporaries must blame themselves and their own countrymen for all this. All that we can say is that we are glad that the Government has not chosen to lend its ear to the cry of these scare-mongers. This action on the part of the Government of Bombay has not only been wise, but it has also another aspect. It will support the Government when the whole question is bound to be opened up in England. We congratulate Sir George Clarke's Government on this wise clemency and we are glad to learn that the whole responsibility of the action rests on the Governor of Bombay."

RIYAZ-I-FAIZ, 12th October 1908.

Tyrants and their punishment.

5. The Riyáz-i-Faiz (Pilibhit), of the 12th October, reproduces from the Arya Musafir (Jullundur, Punjab), an article headed "Is hath de us hath le" (as a man sows so shall he reap) in which it is vaguely hinted that all tyrants will incur divine retribution if they do not desist from their oppression.

AL-BASHIR, 13th October 1908.

Causes of the unrest during the year 1907-8.

6. In continuation of his article headed "Causes of the unrest during the year 1907-8" (vide paragraph 14, Selections no. 42, current), the editor of Al-Bashir (Etawah), writing in the issue of the 13th October, remarks that the frequent revolts even after the arrest of Bahadur Shah prove that someone else was at the bottom of the Mutiny of 1857; and who else could it be than the same Nana Rao who assumed the hereditary title of Peshwa, and who was touring madly round the country enlisting friends and followers everywhere.

The editor, then, referring to the opinions of Sir William Hunter and Mr. Cunningham, comes to the conclusion that the mischief-makers could not adopt a better method of rousing both Hindus and Muhammadans than by giving currency to the rumour that the cartridges issued to the sepoys were greased with animal fat. This served to wound the religious susceptibilities of the Muhammadans also without whose co-operation they thought they could not accomplish much. Such is the explanation of the participation of Muhammadans in the Mutiny and this is corroborated when we see that to-day also similar but ineffectual efforts are being made to win over the sympathy of the Muhammadans against the British Government.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 16th October 1908.

Popular aspirations.

7. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly) of the 16th October, referring to the delusion of the members of the Congress party that it is possible that India may become a nation in the true sense of the word in the near future, remarks that in view of the great differences in the temperaments, beliefs and habits of the various nationalities inhabiting the country, it is impossible that this long-cherished desire can be attained in a short time. The editor then points out that during the Muharram, while the Musalmans are lamenting the tragic death of Husain, their Prophet's beloved grandson, the Hindus give themselves up to mirth and rejoicing. This would lead to serious trouble if the country were self-governed. The granting of constitutions to the people of Turkey and Persia has given an impetus to the movement for reform in India, but Indian political reformers should take note of the manly way in which the patriots of those countries have borne with tyranny and oppression of the most revolting type. The same was the case with England and America. They secured popular government after a long struggle in which they had to strain every nerve. It is necessary at this juncture to work patiently and to wait hopefully for the desired result.

SWARAJYA, 17th October 1908.

England and India.

8. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 17th October, contains the following article.

"We could set our cage on fire by our hot sighs (lit. burning lamentations), but we desist from doing so to please the hunter.

"Possession is nine-tenths of the law ("jis ki lathi is ki bhains") is a well-known proverb and is put into practice all over the world. The ignorant and the wise, the rich and the poor, the oppressors and the oppressed, and men and beasts are all subject to this divine law. This is the law by which barbarians of a conquering race are called civilized, and the fools (among them) are called wise, but the refined and cultured of the conquered race are branded as barbarous, uncivilized and ignorant and the wise (among them) are called fools. Whatever the tyrannous officials of the conquering race do is thought insufficient (not sufficiently rigorous). All their actions are accepted as legitimate. Their misdeeds are turned into beneficent acts. But the legitimate actions of the children of the oppressed race are termed illegal and their demand for their natural rights is interpreted as rebellion. If the proud (Pharoah-minded) public of a powerful country, in the pride of their apish sovereignty, deprive crores of people of their daily bread it is deemed legitimate. If they make thousands of children orphans it is allowable. If they sacrifice the lives of hundreds of human beings for a small gain it is not reprehensible. No objection is made if they hang their Emperor on the gallows and it is not deemed disloyal to incarcerate their Queen in a jail. Generals were slaughtered, officers killed, kings hanged and the members of the royal family were found out one by one and shot, but all these acts were deemed legitimate, for the people had recourse to bloodshed (in defence of) their rights. The ancestors of the same English who claim to be civilized and to be the champions of liberty and who are the loyal subjects of the King-Emperor rose against the life (of the then King?.) During the reign of Charles I they not only rose against the King but captured him, sentenced him to death and executed him, and now their descendants are proud of them, for at that time they defended their rights. The King wanted to deprive them of their rights but they baffled him and punished him for his misdeeds, so that it might be a lesson to the future kings. In contrast to them we find the people of India who by the sweat of their brow have not only transformed these barbarians into Crœsuses, but always look upon their foolish and undeserving children with respect. But the result is always the same ; a well-born man is never unfaithful and faithfulness cannot be expected from one who is base born. Innocent Indians never had recourse to bloodshed and never hanged their King, nor imprisoned their Queen, nor did they ever slaughter their officials, but demand their natural rights with supplications and entreaties. And what are these rights? Natural rights—food to eat, clothes to cover their bodies with, and a hut to live in. But alas! even these are not granted. Those who demand these rights are called disloyal and those who raise their voices (in protest) are called rebels ; those who ask for bread are given a stone, those who want clothes get coarse jail blankets, and those who want huts are deported from the country. Is this justice? (Where can this be called justice. lit.)

To-day the supporters of swadeshi and boycott are held to be ill-wishers of the country. To-day impoverished and impecunious Indians are forced to surrender to them (the English) whatever wealth they still retain. (The English say) "You are to remain our bearers and khansamas, otherwise you will be held to be disloyal and rebellious and will be punished as traitors." Ah! Alas! Have these deceitful and proud Englishmen forgotten the time when in 1765 they ruined the trade of India by ensnaring innocent and simple-minded Indians with their smooth and flattering speeches? It was in the same inauspicious year that the tyrannous Directors of the East India Company ordered the poor weavers of Bengal to be prevented from manufacturing silks. They directed that the Bengalis should simply produce raw silk (cocoons) ; that silks should be manufactured only in English factories ; that silk weavers should work only in the factories of the Company and that they were to be punished severely if they worked elsewhere. But notwithstanding this barbaric order, such was the value placed on the work of these unhappy Indians, that their cloth used to sell in England at 60 per cent beyond the cost price. At last when they could not destroy our trade and when they could not turn out work better than ours, these condemners of boycott as an act of disloyalty, boycotted our manufactures in 1813. But alas! they boycotted our cloth manufactures only. It would have been well if they had boycotted everything ; our country, our silver and copper coins, our wheat, bread, and everything else also, so that they could have realized their true position and we would then have seen who could have supported these hungry and naked (wretches). We would ask them why the use of boycott is right on their part and disloyal on ours. In your country one who supports swadeshi is called a patriot and the pride of his nation and here anyone who utters the word boycott is called disloyal and one who buys swadeshi articles is a rebel. Can this be called liberty, can this be called justice, ... and you are so proud of your impartial rule!!

"What do you say is justifiable, what do you say is right. Just repeat it please.

How can one be kind to anyone when tyranny is ingrained in his nature."

But we shall only say this "If you retain the least bit of humane feeling and if you are endowed with the least sense of shame and honour, then drown yourself, leave for the place from which you come."

According to Srijut Tilak Mahraj, the prince of patriots, the true prophet of liberty and a worthy son of India, the English Parliament framed the following laws to destroy the trade of India for the benefit of England:—

(1) Any one selling cloth made in India to be fined Rs. 200.

(2) Any one dressed in Indian cloth to be fined Rs. 50.

(3) A duty of 68½ per cent. to be levied on Indian manufactures, i.e. a duty of Rs. 68½ to be levied on goods worth Rs. 100. This law was passed in the year (illegible).

But when all this proved ineffective, the duty was raised 20 per cent., i.e. Rs. 88½ were charged as duty for cloths worth Rs. 100. Were not all these tactics adopted to ruin India and to enrich (fill the stomach of) England and was not this the work of those who were disloyal to the interests of England. In answer to this all Englishmen will unanimously declare that it was the work of those who were truly loyal to England.

To-day if we proposed a law to the effect that any one selling English goods would be fined Rs. 200 and any one buying them would be fined Rs, 50 all Englishmen in the country would receive a rude shock (lit. would be burnt to death). For such a law would spell ruin for their commercial interests (lit. their house would be set on fire). But we fear that if we advised people not to buy Englishmade articles we would be at once prosecuted under section 124 and sentenced to transportation, and even if this section did not apply, section 153A is always available (lit. is not lost).

A man is eating sweetmeats, and fearing that you may want to share them he tells you that they are poison. You should not believe him, for, if they were, he would not eat them himself. So you must understand that you can be called the pride of the nation by doing for the good of your country what constitutes an Englishman a patriot if he does it for his.

If they can be called faithful to their country by doing one thing, then you cannot be called rebellious or disloyal for doing the same thing for yours. If the English, in order to give an impetus to their trade, boycott your goods, then you too can boycott their goods for your country's benefit. If they hang their King for the rights of the people, then there is no reason why you should not, under the same conditions, hang your King. If they capture their Queen and throw her into prison, then you too are authorized to follow in their footsteps at the proper time and occasion—think over the matter in your hearts. When the English keep arms for their (personal) safety, then why should you not do the same? Suppose that Japan ruled over England and the English had the collar of slavery round their throats. Try to think what the English would do if they were unarmed, as you are at present, under such circumstances as that. Whatever they would do under such circumstances is allowable for you too. It is your right, your duty to do the same, although they may call you disloyal or hold you rebellious, or condemn you to death, yet you should not care for this, for they will not allow such a golden bird (India) to fly away, but will disfigure her as much as they can by plucking her hair and feathers, and by injuring her wings, &c.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th October 1908.

The Retirement of Lord Ripon.

9. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th October, has the following remarks on the retirement of Lord Ripon:—

"The retirement of Lord Ripon from the Ministry and public life recalls the days when his Viceroyalty in India was drawing to a close and the whole country was resounding with the echoes of a demonstration unprecedented in the annals of the present rule. How our friends the Anglo-Indians hated the sight of the Viceroy being acclaimed by the plaudits of the people! If the reader will take the trouble of turning over the files of the Pioneer and other newspapers he will find that according to those papers admiration for Lord Ripon was tantamount to disloyalty to British rule. They never forgave Lord Ripon for the Ilbert Bill though that measure, thanks to the late Sir Auckland Colvin, resulted in the concordat, which gave British born subjects superior rights of trial and introduced an inequality which is a standing blot on the statute book. But the people of India forgot the law and remembered only the goodwill of Lord Ripon, his sympathy and his genuine friendliness. And the Anglo-Indian community resented it: it wants the Viceroy to be an Anglo-Indian first and a ruler afterwards. Therefore when Lord Ripon was coming down from Simla for the last time and Sir Syed Ahmad carried him on a tamjan like an Emperor to the Aligarh College the Pioneer wrote that he was coming down from Simla on a wave of adulation. That was the India of 1885, overflowing with loyalty to the Sovereign and affection for her representative in India. And the India of 1885 and the Viceroy of 1885 were openly hated by the Anglo-Indians. From 1885 to 1908 there has been a slight change, we fancy: the India of Lord Ripon was somewhat different from the India of Lord Curzon and Lord Minto. Is it a change for the better? Let our friends the Anglo-Indians answer. Instead of the Ilbert Bill and the Local Self-Government Bill we have the Explosives Act, the Newspapers Act and the Seditious Meetings Act, and have not the contentment and prosperity of India thereby increased? Who was the Registrar of loyalty meetings and manifestoes under Lord Ripon? We hope our Anglo-Indian friends are now happy since the evil days of Lord Ripon are past and the golden age of the bomb-thrower and the loyalty-conjuror has come."

The Congress.

10. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 20th October, referring to the split in the Congress camp, remarks that the Congress cause cannot suffer simply because a particular party has seceded from it. Its extinction is impossible and those who oppose it will be won over with the lapse of time.

MASHRIQ, 20th October 1908.

The editor, in conclusion, remarks that in view of the fact that the leaders of the Extremist party are absent from India it is to be hoped that the forthcoming Madras Congress will pass off smoothly.

Loyalty in England and in India.

11. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 21st October, in a leading article compares the standard of loyalty in England and in India, and remarks that in England loyalty consists in being faithful to the Central Government, while in India it means courting the favour of the Government officials and remaining in their good books. The editor says that no one in India wants to subvert the British rule, they are simply dissatisfied with some of its officials, and he thinks that it is high time that the relations between the people and the Government officials were be improved.

RAHBAR, 21st October 1908.

Loyalty of the educated Hindus.

12. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 21st October, referring to the aspersions cast on the loyalty of educated Hindus by the English, remarks that they are entirely undeserved as the Hindus have no other allies on whom they can count in the hour of need when the British Army is withdrawn from India. So, says the editor, they have to be loyal to the British Government.

Indians in the Colonies.

13. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 22nd October, has the following:—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 22nd October 1908.

"It is quite useless, therefore, for the Indians to appeal to the British Ministry or the Crown and it is useless for us to cry for help. The Colonies are determined to make radical distinctions between coloured and white men and they are in one sense right. Catholicism is not yet the faith of the white races; the bread question is now of greater importance. The products, agricultural or commercial, of the white colonized lands must be reserved for whites, the coloured races should have no share in them. The lands peopled by the coloured races must, however, be shared by the white races, if not altogether monopolized by them. This, according to the white races, is the law of nature, jus naturæ, to which may be added the doctrine of the survival of the fittest. As yet there is space in the world for the coloured as well as the white races, but Malthus's theory, notwithstanding aberrations, may in the long run be found to be correct, and the struggle may then destroy either the Kurus or the Pandavas. The burden of the earth may then be lightened for a few centuries. According to Hindu notions truth and justice will succeed. Might is not right."

ABHYUDAYA, 23rd October 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

14. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 23rd October, says that Indians should resent and never forget the ill-treatment to which their countrymen are subjected in the Transvaal. They should endeavour to secure that treatment at the hands of foreigners which is accorded to the citizens of any civilized state. They can expect to secure the respect of foreigners only when they make themselves strong by education, unity, self-respect and patriotism and by the industrial development of their country.

ABHYUDAYA, 23rd October 1908.

Ode to Liberty.

15. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 23rd October, contains an ode to Liberty in which the writer laments the absence of liberty in India and expresses an intense desire for its restoration.

The writer says:—"Had we been so powerful and wise as in days of yore, we would have fought with our enemies and removed the miseries of our countrymen. We would have crushed the pride of the Boers and never allowed them to enter our country. O powerful Mother (Liberty), you are our learning and our devotion and the new spirit that is within us. You are the destroyer of enemies. Three hundred millions of Indians are waiting for you. O Mother do not delay. Your children are in extreme distress. Without you we are not allowed to live in any country and being a subject race we have to put up with kicks in every quarter. When, O Mother, will you remove our misery and embrace us? How long will you keep us enduring misery? O Mother if you once again come to us, we shall never forget you, we shall never again be a subject race and never again be called slaves."

The Mysore Press Act.

16. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 22nd October, has the following comments on the speech of Mr. Madhava Row at the Mysore Legislative Assembly :—

"The pity is that even such a good reader of the signs of the times should be led into passing a Newspaper Regulation of the most obnoxious type that aims to strike at the root of the very aspirations which he so well lauds up in noticing the so-called unrest. His explanation of this repressive measure is simply jejune. His arbitrary temperament does not end here. The acme of his foolish policy was reached when he advised the Government of the Maharaja to set aside the election of the members to sit for the representative assembly on the Legislative Council of the State. For the first time in Mysore history this year the privilege was accorded and the body made the selection of genuine Mysoreans of high repute and extensive influence. And the Dewan has simply marred the festivities of the week by doing the unheard of thing, the vetoing of the first election of the best of representatives of the people. And his explanation is not worthy of the paper written upon. Is Mysore under the guidance of the new Dewan about to set up different models so as to lose the endearing appellation of the model state in the south?"

The Mahratta contempt case.

17. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 8th October, referring to the order of the Bombay High Court that Mr. Kelkar, the editor of the Mahratta, should be kept in prison till he made an apology, remarks :—

"The court undoubtedly stretches its authority too far when it makes a continuous offence of a single act. The defendant committed contempt of court; a rule was issued upon him to show cause why he should not be committed; if he had tendered an unqualified apology he would have been discharged; not having done so he has been convicted. But is not the punishment an expiation of the offence? A fine can be realized, a man can be sent to jail, but no man can be compelled to apologize if he holds out and is not afraid of prison life. Contempt of court is the same offence whether of the High Court or any other court. A fine of Rs. 1,000 is quite ample for the ends of justice. The order about costs was quite unnecessary. The sentence of imprisonment is almost vindictive, specially because it is on the criminal side of the jail."

Civil Administration in Kumaun.

18. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th October, referring to the probable appointment of a District Judge in Kumaun Garhwal, remarks :— INDIAN PEOPLE 18th October 1908.

"It is to be hoped, however, that a District Judge in Kumaun Garhwal would not be deemed to be more of a Sir Oracle than the incumbents of similar offices down below, and that the High Court will be allowed a free hand in the matter of correcting the errors of subordinate courts, without reference to the pecuniary value of any particular dispute. The civil Judge of Kumaun Garhwal again may with great advantage to the administration, we believe, act as the Sessions Judge of Pilibhit. For it is imperative that the present arrangement under which the criminal work of Pilibhit has become a great burden to the Bareilly Judgeship, be altered, and the posting of an Assistant Sessions Judge with a Subordinate Judge's power at Bareilly will not be a cheap alternative although more popular and acceptable to the members of the Bareilly bar."

The case of Corporal Cullen.

19. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th October, has the following notes on the release of Corporal Cullen :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th October 1908.

"Corporal Cullen of Jutogh, who was accused of murdering an Indian, has been convicted of murder but acquitted under section 84 of the Indian Penal Code on the ground that he is insane. It may be remembered that the night before Cullen committed the murder a European nurse had been murdered by a khansama; this incident is supposed to have preyed so much upon the mind of Cullen that it was unhinged and the next morning he picked up a rifle and shot an Indian driver. At the time the khansama and the corporal were arrested on charges of murder we said the public would watch the result of the two cases carefully; they have done so and the expected has happened. Let the Government ponder carefully over these results of the two cases: the khansama, who could not claim any special privilege or the right of trial by jury, was sentenced to death after a few days and probably the sentence has already been carried out. The corporal was a British born subject and he was sent to Lahore to be tried by the Chief Court. The result of the trial is mentioned above. It seems a medical expert was called by the defence to prove that the accused was suffering from melancholia on the 21st August. It is not stated however whether the medical expert is the medical officer of the jail where Cullen was detained pending trial, or another medical officer of Jutogh who examined the accused immediately after he had committed the murder. Was the khansama kept under medical observation to find out whether he was insane or not? Cullen bore an excellent, steady character in the battery and it was not alleged that he had ever had sunstroke or otherwise suffered from any disorder of the brain. His counsel said 'the man was now as mad as they made them,' but the jury after hearing arguments and expert evidence decided that the man was capable of undertaking his defence. If so, was he not capable of understanding what he was doing when he shot the Indian driver? It is absolutely impossible to expect that the Indian public will accept the result of the trial as satisfactory. There is a confirmed belief that even-handed justice between a European and Indian is seldom done in this country, and cases of this kind help to confirm this belief. Compare the result of this case with that of poor Durga Charan Sanyal and then imagine the feelings of the Indian community. Sedition and exciting race hatred are easily punished by the law, but who can say what incalculable mischief is done by the failure of justice? The Government is perfectly aware that antagonistic forces are at work against the British rule and it is a pity that those should be given a handle in any way."

THE THEORY OF INSANITY.

Section 84 of the Indian Penal Code is as follows:—"Nothing is an offence which is done by a person who, at the time of doing it, by reason of unsoundness of mind, is incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that it is either wrong or contrary to law." Under this section the jury acquitted Corporal Cullen, while finding him guilty of murder. Mr. Justice Rattigan, the presiding Judge, accepted this verdict and remanded the accused in custody. The theory that was set up by the defence was that the accused was suffering from melancholia, that he had no grudge against the murdered man and could not therefore be held reponsible for his act. Now Corporal Cullen was perfectly sane and rational before the day of the murder. He was not examined or treated for melancholia or any other form of mania before he committed the murder, nor was any evidence produced to prove that he was insane at the time he shot the driver. The section under which he was acquitted presumes that a man is insane at the time he commits an offence. A man who commits a murder may become naturally melancholy afterwards and repentant, but that does not make him the less guilty. Besides, melancholia is a form of insanity of slow growth. We do not believe that there is any instance on record in medical science in which a man suffering from a first attack of melancholia ceases to be responsible for his actions within twenty-four hours of the attack. Next as regards killing a man without any provocation, the best analogy is that of a man running amuck. Mayne, in his commentary on the Indian Penal Code, speaks of this class of murder and quotes the opinion of Dr. Norman Chivers. A man who runs amuck is undoubtedly insane during the time he rushes about killing or attempting to kill every one whom he meets, without any provocation or cause. But the plea of insanity does not avail him at all. Mayne says:—'In most of these cases the Judges appear to have, in my opinion wisely, exacted the extreme penalty of death.' Cullen was disarmed as soon as he had shot one man. He might or might not have run amuck. If the theory of the defence and expert evidence were right the Judge should have stopped the trial as the accused was not in a fit condition of mind to stand it. The jury did not accept the evidence for the purpose of the trial itself but accepted it to acquit the accused after holding him guilty of murder. In one opinion the procedure and verdict are both wrong and there has been a distinct failure of justice."

ADVOCATE, 18th October 1908.

Corporal Cullen.

20. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 18th October, referring to the acquittal of Corporal Cullen, remarks:—

"So the Simla tragedy has ended in another tragedy in the Chief Court and this time the tragedy is of the murder of British justice at the hands of 9 English jurors. It is superfluous to say with what feeling of indignation the verdict of the jury and its acceptance by the Judge will be received throughout the country and what conclusions will be drawn by the people."

ABHYUDAYA, 23rd October 1908.

Corporal Cullen.

21. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 23rd October, says that the grounds on which Corporal Cullen has been acquitted will not satisfy the public, for as is usual in such cases various reasons were put forward to save the criminal from the punishment which he deserves. The public would not have cared so much had such a case been the first of its kind. It is no wonder that the people are dissatisfied with the decision in this case, knowing as they do that in all such cases the accused are invariably let off without adequate punishment.

The editor in conclusion remarks that it is such judicial findings that create real race hatred and disloyalty towards the Government.

22. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 20th October, referring to the appeals of Shanti Narain and Fazl-ul-Hasan that have recently been dismissed by the Allahabad High Court, remarks that the Government of the United Provinces should now exercise its prerogative and pardon these editors as they have already suffered much for their follies and misdeeds.

Octroi taxation in the United Provinces.

24. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 18th October, has the following :— ADVOCATE, 18th October 1908.

"Sir John Hewett has given another proof of the grasp he has of the real needs of the people by issuing an important resolution on the octroi taxation of these provinces which we reproduce elsewhere. The causes of discontent of the people are many and deep-seated, but there are few which affect the mind of an ordinary trader, particularly so the mind of one who is enjoying the fruits of peace and of his own industry and labour, as the levy of octroi. This tax is the one serious cause of irritation and vexation to the trading classes and one great source of discontent in business men who have little reason otherwise to feel personally discontented. This feeling is shared by rich and poor alike. The poor feel that octroi not a little contributes to dearness of food stuffs. Large towns, once centres of trade, have been ruined owing to this duty, which has killed all import trade and transferred business from important places to out-of-the-way marts. No action on the part of Government will be hailed with greater delight than the one which will do away with this form of taxation. But the question is, what steps should be taken to substitute this tax? This is a very difficult question to answer. Our own view is that in larger towns a terminal tax should be levied on all goods and stores irrespective of the fact whether they come for consumption by the Government or the people and the deficit should be met by contributions from the provincial treasury till such time that the terminal tax does not show improvement. Our belief is that as soon as octroi is removed larger towns will have bigger imports and the deficit will in no time be made up. If within the last twelve years it was possible to raise the income from direct taxation from three to thirteen lakhs of rupees, we are sure that this improvement will be kept up and the loss of a few lakhs of rupees, which the Government will have to meet in the first few years from its treasury, will be made up by greater prosperity of the town population. And, what is more, by the removal of one great source of irritation from the middle classes steady prosperity of large towns will be fully assured. The Committee appointed by the Government has our hearty good wishes. Its proceeding will be watched with keen interest by all municipalities in these provinces."

Octroi taxation in the United Provinces.

The Octroi Commission.

26. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 20th October, referring to the Commission appointed to consider the question of the octroi tax, remarks that its constitution is open to objection inasmuch as Indians who on account of their local knowledge are peculiarly fitted to form a correct opinion on the question are not sufficiently represented. The editor, however, thanks the Government for taking into consideration this question of vital importance and hopes that expert Indians will come forward to help the Commission with their valuable opinion. MASHRIQ, 20th October 1908.

House-tax.

27. A correspondent of the Hindustani (Lucknow), writing in the issue of the 21st October, complains that the assessment of house tax in the Act XX towns of Kakori and Malihabad is very unjust and that appeals against the decision of the local officials are not entertained by the higher authorities. This he thinks is a flagrant miscarriage of justice, which should be looked to.

(e)—Education.

CENTRAL HINDU COLLEGE MAGAZINE, October 1908.

Educational system in India.

28. Mrs. Annie Besant, writing in the Central Hindu College Magazine (Benares), for the month of October, on her return to India, refers to the anarchism and unrest in the country and observes that even Russian anarchists, maddened by the knout and by outrage, slay only those who have committed brutal wrongs; even they do not stoop to the murder of women who have wrought no crime. She says that if Mr. Tilak's amiable forecast that these methods would spread to other parts of India should be fulfilled, India would sign her own death warrant and shame the glorious name which no conquest and no oppression has hitherto been able to degrade.

It is interesting, she says, to notice that the view that has been put forward by the Central Hindu College is now winning acceptance on all sides. She then refers to a recent article in the Manchester Guardian, commenting upon a paper by Mr. A. G. Fraser, republished from the East and West on the system of education in India and contrasting it with the Japanese system. In her opinion all that has been said is true, though, with the usual running to extremes of the newspaper writers, the very real value of much of the education given is ignored.

Hitherto England has come first and India second; now India must come first and England second. The education given must aim at making good Indian citizens, instead of denationalized copies of Englishmen. Even much of the patriotism bears the English trade mark, and is not swadeshi in any way; it is as foreign made as many of the clothes that are sold as of home manufacture and both show too much of the shoddy element.

Mrs. Besant quotes a paragraph that appears in the October number of the Theosophist as another comment on the effect of English education from a different standpoint in which it is noticed how the action of the Theosophical Society in aiding the ancient religions of the East to protect their children against the disintegrating influences of missionary education is gradually being recognized as a policy beneficent to morality and therefore to the State as a whole.

She concludes with the remark "where missionary effort is undermining the foundations of the State and of Society, Theosophy is strengthening them, by pouring new life into the ancient religions and by training the young along the lines laid down by these ancestral religions and morality."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 8th October 1908.

Education in Kumaun.

29. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 8th October, commenting on the agitation among the educated classes in Kumaun, for the improvement of educational facilities, remarks that all that the people of the division need is the establishment of well-equipped Government schools in all the districts and the strengthening of the Ramsay College at Almora. For higher education, the editor thinks it advisable to start a fund to enable deserving Kumauni students to attend colleges in the plains.

SWARAJYA, 17th October 1908.

Sir G. Clarke's circular.

30. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 17th October, commenting on Sir G. Clarke's educational circular, remarks that as long as Indian students held themselves aloof from the progressive movements in the country, neglected their physical development and wasted their time in imitating the frivolous manners and customs of Europe, the Government did not worry itself about them, but as soon as they realized their real condition and threw themselves eagerly into the domain of politics, the Government all of a sudden developed a paternal interest in them and began to frame laws to regulate their lives. But, says the editor, these sly tactics of the Government will not have the desired effect, as students will not submit to them and will prefer to go without the education imparted in Government institutions.

The system of education in India.

31. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 22nd October, has the following under the heading "The Young Idea":— INDIAN PEOPLE, 22nd October 1908.

"Putting together the recent resolution of the Bombay Government, the instructions issued by the Education department of various provinces, the Risley circular and several other orders and regulations we are driven to the conclusion that there must be something seriously wrong with the system of education prevailing in India. Now this system of education is not an indigenous institution. The wisdom of the British Government in India is unfettered in this as in everything else. If therefore the system of education in this country has been found to be seriously defective, it is the fault of those who introduced it. There will be no objection on the part of wise Anglo-Indians of to-day to fall foul of Macaulay any more than the Anglo-Indians of another day refrained from abusing Lord Canning or denouncing Lord Ripon. The education given in Indian universities has been severely criticized from another point of view by Indians themselves, but the present official attitude is very different. So long as the universities produced men who aspired to nothing more than making a living, whether it was a judgeship of the High Court, a place in the legal profession, or a stool in a Government office the system of education was perfect. It is the appearance of disaffection among students and young men that has revealed the defects of the educational system. Is it in the study of history, or wicked newspapers, or the classical languages that the blemish is to be found? It must be somewhere and hence the statesmanlike measures that are being taken to improve students and teachers and the course of studies. The young idea must be taught to shoot properly so that it may not shoot in the direction of revolution and anarchism. History is a very bad subject for study: it stimulates the imagination, recalls inconvenient memories of the past, exposes the former weakness of great nations and inspires an ambitious conception of the future. Exclude history from the curriculum of studies. But that is not enough. Why do teachers talk to their pupils anything about politics? They must be forbidden to do so. Why are bad newspapers read by boys? That must be discontinued. The threatened loyalty of the future generations of India will be thus saved by wise precautions and regulations. May we respectfully ask if it is known what are the sentiments of those who do not read English or English history at all? The steps that are being now taken are childlike in their simplicity and extreme credulity. Is it really seriously believed that there will be no revolutionists or anarchists if the system of education is modified or changed, or students and teachers are carefully watched and guarded? What about the Indian revolutionists in England and America and the young Indians at school and college in England? What the authorities are trying to do here is to set back the hands on the dial of Time, and they know perfectly well that they cannot do it. Instead of meeting the situation and the future in a statesmanlike and open manner they are trying to burke the whole thing as if ideas in their birth can be strangled. Education or no education, the generations that are coming will not be won over by methods that sufficed for their ancestors and we believe we are but on the threshold of the stormy days that are still in store for India."

Agricultural Exhibition at Bareilly.

32. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 21st October, notes with satisfaction the holding of an Agricultural Exhibition at Bareilly, but is of opinion that with a view to enlisting the sympathy of the educated classes with the agricultural development of the country, it would have been well if industrial exhibits too had been included. AL BASHIR, 13th October 1908.

Musalmans and High Court Judgeships.

34. The editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 13th October, thanks the Government for the appointment of a Muhammadan Judge to the Punjab Chief Court and says:—

"We hope that the cherished desires of the Muhammadans of Bombay and Burma will be fulfilled by the appointment of Muhammadan Judges to their High Courts also. We trust the Government will not listen to the opinion of the Governor of Bombay who has evinced much weakness by replying to the address presented by the Muhammadans in the way he did. The Government should now satisfy the dejected Muhammadans of that province by appointing one of them as a Judge of the High Court. This weak policy of the Governor of Bombay is encouraging a class of men who openly preach sedition and provoke riots. To disappoint the Muhammadans and to congratulate Dadabhai Naoroji on the occasion of his birthday are highly imprudent acts especially when they emanate from the highest official of a province. The commutation of the sentence of a rebel like Mr. Tilak is one more instance of the lack of common sense and prudence in a Governor. Surely no one can be worthy of such a high post as that of a Governor who fails to appreciate loyalty and punish disloyalty."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th October 1808.

The Unemployed.

35. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th October, commenting on the question of the unemployed in England, remarks:—

"It is interesting to note the relation of the situation created here by a famine and the situation created in England now by the cotton look-out. The causes of the famine, at least the causes that are officially recognized, are superhuman. The lands are there, the cultivators are ready and willing, but it pleases some one else to withhold the rains which no amount of human efforts and foresight can create. Thousands go about famishing and then the Government steps in with the relief works. And persons without any social distinction and without any efforts at displacing those already in employment, receive either work or charitable doles and tide over the difficult days. The parallel lies not in the causes which bring about the misery. It lies somewhat in the effects, in the want of food for the people. But how dissimilar are their respective conducts in the circumstances? The Indian people would go about begging and if nothing is available would meekly lie down and die on the roadside. Others there are of a superior social grade who would look blue about the lips, bless or curse their kismat according to temperament, but would lie down and die all the same.

This is simply because the Indian peoples are not conscious of any political existence. But in England every individual knows and feels, be his social grade superior or inferior, and be he rich or poor, a capitalist or a day labourer, that he possesses a vote and that he and those like him can combine and make the Government do what they desire. The Government does not exist there to rule over them. They exist and create the Government for the protection of society. Without any violation of any rule or law of Religion, Society or Politics they can come together and exclaim, "Do all you know comrades, to raise such an agitation as shall fight this Whig Government clean out of its boots, and cause it to have regard for this vital question of unemployment." Here the people accept Government help as alms. There the people demand Government help as of right and the consciousness of political power makes them noisy, ready and unreasonable. They intrude upon church assemblies, break down public offices and thrash officers and ministers and the ministers go about touting for votes and making speeches for conciliating the people. Here you organize a meeting of sober, famishing and law-abiding people, suggest that the Government should do this or that, tell the people that the Government has failed in doing its duty in a particular direction, you are thereby creating "disaffection" in the people, and straightway you are marched to the jail through which the road lies to Mandalay or the Andamans—the final goal of all your ambition or enlightened ideas."

36. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 18th October, referring to the future of the famine orphans in orphanages, remarks :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 18th October 1908.

Famine orphans.

"The lads in the Arya Samaj and the Muhammadan orphanages grow up as domestic and "menial" servants and those from the missionary institutions go to swell the ranks of clerks in Government offices. We believe a slight effort is made to give the boys some sort of technical education, but so far as is known to us such effort is not crowned with any success. It seems to us that this material in our hands is being wasted. If instead of opening these orphanages in out of the way places they are opened in industrial centres like Ahmedabad, Bombay, Calcutta, Cawnpore and other places where there are mills and the lads be given such training as will make them efficient and skilled mill hands a distinct want of the country will be removed. On the face of it labour is very cheap in India. But if we compare the amount of work done in the course of a day of 6 or 8 hours by an Indian workman with that done by an English workman in the same time it will be apparent to every one how very dear labour really is in India. We have the raw material but we do not care, we make no effort, to turn the same into skilled labour. And then the sense of discipline and the sense of responsibility are so wanting in our workmen. Now if orphanages are opened in the vicinity of mills and if their moral, intellectual and manual training go hand in hand some of the grave defects in the character of our working classes, if not removed altogether, will at least be minimized. Then again it is well known that there is dearth of labourers in the tea districts of Assam, and the employers of labour there have to spend money for the purposes of procuring labourers for their plantations. And it is also well known that the men who recruit for labourers occasionally take to methods which are neither sanctioned by law nor approved by public opinion. Now if the famine orphans are drafted to those districts, and a settlement of such orphans is made there not only the lads themselves but the planters too will be benefited."

37. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 18th October, referring to the circular issued by the Commissioner of Excise ordering all Excise Inspectors to sign a declaration to the effect that they will not go up for any law examination or if they cannot comply with it to resign their appointments, remarks that this is extremely unjust as the men were not informed of this when they joined the department. Many of them resigned good posts in order to be appointed as Excise Inspectors. Besides this a knowledge of law will be helpful to them in the prosecution of offenders against the excise law, which they are required to undertake. ADVOCATE, 18th October 1908.

40. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 20th October, referring to the proposal for abolishing the system of granting commission to sub-registrars, remarks that this proposal would be hailed with delight if their pay were increased in proportion to the amount they used to receive as commission. As regards the admission of graduates into the department, the editor is of opinion that they should wait till the candidates already on the list are provided for. MASHRIQ, 20th October 1908.

Sub-Registrars.

MASHRIQ, 20th October 1908.

41. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 20th October, referring to the rumour regarding the redistribution of certain districts in the United Provinces, makes the following suggestions for the consideration of Government :—

Redistribution of districts in the United Provinces.

(1) That the Jaunpur district should be included in the Gorakhpur division.
(2) That some of the districts should be taken away from the Allahabad division and formed into a new division.
(3) That as the peculiar local conditions of Bundelkhand sometimes necessitate fresh legislation, it is desirable to separate it completely from the United Provinces and place it under a Commissioner with an Assistant.
(4) That some of the tahsils of Fatehpur, Etawah, Cawnpore and Farrukhabad should be grouped together and formed into a new district.
(5) That Aligarh should be separated from the Meerut division.
(6) That Gorakhpur should on no account be made over to Behar as it has progressed by leaps and bounds since it was included in the United Provinces.

HINDUSTANI, 21st October 1908.

42. A correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 21st October, referring to the prevalence of malaria in rural areas, advises the Government to adopt measures to lessen its ravages, otherwise a considerable section of the agricultural population will be unable to work during the most busy part of the year and the result will be the continuance of the famine.

Malaria.

HINDOSTHAN, 20th October 1908.

43. The Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 20th October has the following remarks on the Court of wards :—

Court of Wards.

"They of course manage the state under the Court of Wards better than the incapacitated landowners, but we want now some better arrangements introduced in that department. Perhaps it would be much better to make such States over to the Registrar with an increased establishment ; because the Court of Wards very seldom offers any loan to the state under its charge and neglects the owners of the states shamefully. We don't want to enter into the circumstances of the landed proprietors and the tenants who earn their livelihood by labour ; but we think it absolutely necessary that the present state of the Court of Wards should be improved."

ADVOCATE, 22nd October 1908.

44. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 22nd October, has the following remarks on the report of the Sanitary Conference :—

The Sanitary Conference.

"The net result of the Conference is in the possession of the public in the shape of resolutions published by us in extenso in our issue of the 4th instant. These cover an extensive ground and refer to all causes that lead to insanitation in our towns. There is not one resolution which places before the Government and the municipalities any utopian scheme which cannot be carried out. The resolutions of the Conference are of two kinds: one in which Government or legislative action is necessary, and the other which can be carried into effect by local bodies and the public at large. The resolutions of the first category are of greater importance and unless the Government comes forward to spend larger sums of money on both rural and urban sanitation, these resolutions will remain a veritable dead letter. We know that the Local Government is ready to do its best for sanitary improvement in these provinces. Lord Minto has also given proof of his earnest desire to save people from premature death by disease and pestilence. But His Excellency's Government has to give more practical proof of this sympathy by according a better financial treatment to the United Provinces than what it has hitherto done. Every suggestion of the Conference means expenditure both by the State and the people. Municipal taxation has reached its highest limit; every conceivable tax has been levied on the people. There is little room for addition in taxation, though improvement will be maintained. But the Government spends very little of its revenues on the sanitation of the province. If after the Conference the State will not come forward to spend money with liberality, all the energy spent over the Conference will amount to nothing. The deliberations of the members of the Conference, who while sitting in the Conference keenly felt that hundreds of thousands of people were dying prematurely throughout the United Provinces of preventible diseases will remain pious wishes only. The resolutions make out a strong case for a better financial settlement of these provinces and we hope Lord Minto during his fortnight's stay in these provinces will be struck with the real condition of the people, that he will go back to Calcutta fully convinced that the United Provinces have long been treated slightly in the matter of financial allotment, and that the first thing which his financial advisers should do is to right a wrong from which the people of the United Provinces who loyally pay more revenue than any other part of India, but on whose educational and sanitary needs the least percentage of revenue received is spent, have been silently suffering. The United Provinces do not want any special treatment. What they want is their fair share of revenue contributed by them at the ratio at which allotments are made to Bombay, Burma and Bengal. This claim for financial justice has been strengthened by the deliberations of the two Conferences held at Naini Tal in 1907 and 1908."

Sanitation.

45. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 22nd October, referring to the Government resolution on sanitation, remarks :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 22nd October 1908.

"The general causes being theoretically well known and firmly established, at least satisfactorily to scientific men, the only matter for discovery must be the tracing of local areas where fever has raged and is still raging. The present is the best season for investigation, which is really very easy. The investigating officer must visit each infected locality and find out the removable local insanitary conditions. Malaria is a preventible cause of fever; the difficulty of removal, however, is great. The people are poverty-stricken and they have no idea of sanitation. They have neither faith in the utility of systematic drainage nor the means of removing cesspools and other anophele dépôts. They must be taught and helped with money to carry out works of sanitation. The sale of cheap pice packets of quinine through post offices will not do. People would not be easily induced to use it in prophylactic doses and thus prevent attacks of fever. Very few have means to use mosquito curtains, and our Government might well follow the example of the Italian Government and furnish curtains to some villages in order to encourage others. The system of drainage should be extended and completed and funds for this purpose should be found either from local or Imperial sources."

The Civil Courts' ministerial establishment.

46. A correspondent who signs himself "Good Wisher" writing to the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 22nd October, refers to the general discontent prevailing among the employés of the civil courts with regard to their pay and prospects. He compares the salaries and positions of the civil courts' clerks to those of revenue courts and requests the editor to bring the matter to the notice of Government, the High Court and the Judicial Commissioner and ask them to appoint a committee to look into the grievances of the subordinate staff that call for the careful attention of the Government. ADVOCATE, 22nd October 1908.

Safety in railway travelling.

47. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 8th October, has the following :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 8th October 1908.

"Inscrutable are the ways of Providence. We might have cried ourselves hoarse, and nobody would have thought it worth while to notice us, if we had tried to point out how railway travelling is fraught with peculiar danger especially to lady passengers. But after recent events all Anglo-India seems to have arisen as if from a deep sleep and is looking every way with bewildered eyes. One innocent life has paid the penalty of the indifference of which the class to which she belonged has been guilty. Those who have a weakness for expressing their own views in the public press have not been idle and all our leading Anglo-Indian contemporaries have thrown their columns open to correspondence criticizing railway administration in the country and especially suggesting means whereby travelling may be rendered more secure in so far as the danger from train-lifters and travelling marauders is concerned. But has this danger newly appeared or has it existed since the creation of railways? Can we not cite numerous instances where innocent Indian girls have been cruelly done to death or more cruelly outraged while travelling on Indian Railways? What has been done up to this time to minimize this danger? What we have noticed in all these cases is that a particular class of people, a class for which the railway administration all over the country has a peculiar fondness, has been found guilty of all manner of outrages on female passengers. Indians may have been convicted for petty thefts in running trains, but for systematic train robberies and outrages on defenceless females we cannot hold them guilty. And this will perhaps be the outcome of the inquiries into the Multan murder case. We also draw attention to the case recently reported by the Punjabee. In this case the offender was a "soldier guard" and perhaps a British soldier and not the usual Eurasian employé. Although this guard "sneaked away" and afterwards "apologized" we believe better sense will prevail and this attempt will meet with a deterrent punishment. The authorities are themselves to blame if such cases multiply. Neither the public administration nor the North-Western Railway authorities have in the past been very fond of severely punishing this class of offenders. We hope, however, the authorities concerned will now make some examples to act as a deterrent to future attempts."

In a subsequent article, while commenting on the various proposals made by the Railway Conference at Simla for the safety of railway passengers, the editor remarks:—

"All these measures concern more or less first and second class passengers only. The only recommendation which will affect lower class passengers is that of removing continuous footboards and horizontal handrails. These are of course a great convenience to train-walkers at night and criminals, but their removal means a serious danger to the travelling public, specially third class passengers. They crowd the carriages, they are awkward and they always make a rush. The danger is mentioned in the note in paragraph (2), but it should be fully recognized. If there were no handrails and no footboards the danger of serious and even fatal accidents on such occasions as the Magh Mela or the Kumbh would be fearful. If provision for the security of passengers is to be made care must be taken that they do not meet with accidents in the act of getting into or out of railway carriages."

VYAPARI AND KARIGAR. 15th October 1908.

The Railway Act.

48. A correspondent in the Vyápári and Kárigar (Benares), of the 15th October, complains of the ambiguous wording of section 77 of the Railway Act, which is often a fruitful source of loss to consigners of goods. He suggests that the term "Managers of railways" should be more explicitly explained. It should be made clear whether this term includes managers or agents only or district traffic superintendents as well.

ADVOCATE, 22nd October 1908.

Railway construction.

49. A resident of Chandpur, writing in the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 22nd October, draws the attention of the Government to the claims of Chandpur town in the Bijnor district with regard to the railway construction programme for the coming year. He points out that:—

(1) The railway line in question which has already been surveyed besides affording convenience for a trading centre like Chandpur will connect the head quarters of the district Bijnor with other places of importance.

(2) There is no river or stream between Gujraula and Chandpur or even between Chandpur and Bijnor to be bridged and thus there will be no expenditure on this account.

(3) About six or seven miles from Chandpur there is a place reserved for the Tent Club, Meerut, who resort thereto a few times every year.

The head quarters of the tahsil is more than 20 miles from Chandpur, which puts landlords, tenants and travellers to great inconvenience.

The editor says that the inhabitants of Chandpur have submitted several memorials to Government in this connection representing the losses and inconveniences they are suffering for want of a railway line and hopes that the Government of Sir John Hewett will not leave their grievances unredressed.

50. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 17th October, referring to the statement of Kali Charan Mukerjee of Aligarh regarding the cancellation of his license on the ground of his having on one occasion attended a meeting of the Arya Samaj, remarks:— MUSAFIR, 17th October 1908.

The Arya Samaj.

"Is it really a crime to attend the meetings of the Arya Samaj? Is the Arya Samaj in any way connected with the anarchist societies? If the statement of Kali Charan is true surely we cannot imagine any more serious accusation directed against a religious body. We believe that Sir John Hewett, who has promised to listen to reasonable representations, will look to it that the misapprehension caused by such a damaging statement is removed. We have every confidence in the good sense of our Lieutenant Governor and we trust he will not allow the matter to pass by unnoticed."

51. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 21st October, complains that gambling is very common in Cawnpore from the Dasehra to the Dewali and leads to the ruin of thousands of people as sharpers resort to the place from many large towns. The editor suggests that the procedure adopted to put a stop to gambling in Lucknow should be adopted in Cawnpore also. HINDUSTANI, 21st October 1908.

Gambling.

52. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 23rd October, says that in spite of their intrinsic qualities the missionaries are weakening the hold of Hinduism upon the people in a thousand ways. The editor urges that Hindu parents should never allow their children to attend mission schools and colleges and that they should build their own educational institutions where adequate arrangements could be made for religious instruction. ABHYUDAYA, 23rd October 1908.

OUDH AKHBAR, 24th October 1908.

Morocco and France.

1. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 24th October, referring to an article published in an English paper on the victory gained by Mulai Hafid over his brother in Morocco, remarks that after an amicable settlement of affairs in Morocco, Mulai Hafid, as he has himself stated, intends turning his attention to Europe and more particularly to France. If this conveys anything to the initiated, it plainly refers to some impending trouble with France. And this view is rendered very plausible when we take into consideration the fact that Germany would prefer to side with Hafid against France than espouse the cause of Abdul Aziz. Be this as it may, one thing is certain that the man who has survived the political tactics of mischievous powers so long will not fall an easy prey to his enemies, now that he has once emerged successful from the troubles that threatened to bring about his downfall before.

As regards Turkey, we are sure that in spite of her many difficulties she is now able to hold her own against any such petty dependencies as Bulgaria. Let us only hope that she will not suffer from the interference of "Arbitrators."

SWARAJYA, 10th October 1908.

The moral of the Dasehra festival.

2. While recapitulating the manifold virtues of Shri Ram Chandra, the editor of the Swarájya (Allahabad), writing in the issue of the 10th October (received on the 29th October), makes the following observations:—

"Would that our rulers, too, leaving aside their habits of luxury, cared for the welfare of their subjects in the same way (as was done by Raja Ram Chandra)! But who is to do this? They simply require their bread, and then let what will befall their subjects (lit. the subjects may die of starvation). Poor fellows! they may not get even dilapidated cottages to live in, but what does that matter? They must have bungalows for their comfort. Our rulers do not seem to realize that

'A king is like a tree and his subjects its roots.'

These gentlemen are not content with this much only. They also consign to prison those who raise a voice for liberty and demand their rights. They have quite forgotten the royal Proclamation of the Queen and are acting quite in contravention to it and are thus tormenting her soul."

SWARAJYA, 10th October 1908.

Odes.

3. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 10th October, contains the following political odes:—

"(1) By Seth of Bareilly:

Will you awaken sleeping India or not?
Tell me are you willing to take up the national cause?
Will you efface the reign of tyrants or not?
And will you establish swaraj in the country or not?
O! India, will you call back Tilak to the country or not?
And will you restore Narayan to the Swarajya?
Will you inculcate patriotism in every one or not?
And will you preach the use of boycott?"

(2) By Pandit Ram Sarup, Sharma, of Jalesar:

"How long will you continue to enjoy this sound sleep (lit. sleep of neglect)?
Will you not save your wealth and property from the plunderers?
You have been kicked as dead bodies by strangers,
Will you not strike a blow in return?
The winter season has set in, O! Indian craftsman,
Will you not prepare swadeshi chintz too?
How long will you continue to be called ignorant slaves and barbarians?
Will you not remove this stain (from your character)?
Foreign countries laugh at your ignorance,
Will you not cause those to weep who laugh at you?
Sacrifice your lives, but do not give up your ideals (lit. hopes).
Tell me, Sharma, would you like to be called a conqueror or not?"

Odes.

4. The following political odes appear in the Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 24th October :— SWARAJYA, 24th October 1908.

(1) By Bebák of Alipur :

" All this wrangling is about to cease now,
For we are shortly to get swaraj (once again).
Thunderbolts will assuredly fall down from the Heavens.
Thy oppression, O Tyrant, will soon be put down.
The place that was a wilderness before (lit. where the whole space was empty)
Is going to be transformed into a garden.
Brethren, you will see some day or other
Swadeshi in all its glory (lit. the drum of swadeshi is about to be beaten now).
I will call him loyal only
Who is a well-wisher of his nation.
What a storm the mischief-makers have created.
The quarrel (however) is going to cease very soon.
After slaughtering me, the Qátil (slayer—nom de plume of the poet) says :
' Why dost thou roll about, what else dost thou want ?' "

(2) By Karam Chand, Banbási :

" Why dost thou weep
O Hind ! What dost thou want ?
Why dost thou roll about and what dost thou desire ?
How long shall we bear this tyranny and oppression ?
The enemy wants to hear something from me now.
These currents cannot be stemmed (lit crushed),
For India is on the verge of progress now.
O ! Indians, open wide your eyes
The enemy wants to gag your mouths.
O ! my Indian brethren, take care even now,
They are about to disgrace and defame you.
Indians, if you will shake off your profound sleep
India will become ours once again.
O ! Banbsái (inhabitant of forest—nom de plume of the poet) see that you do not get ensnared,
For the tyrant is trying to deceive you."

(3) By Nasim Mahangwi, Allahabad :

" Why dost thou roll about and what dost thou want ?
Swaraj is about to be established (in the land).
O ! nation worshippers, do not be anxious
(For) you are about to get the fruit of your labours.
Friends ! proceed. Do not lose heart,
India is shortly to assume her former prestige.
You work oppression day and night upon Indians,
Do you expect loyalty in return ?
Swadeshi has become a power in the land,
For England is doomed to die of starvation.
Though they concealed this for years
Yet, Nasim, the hidden secret is being (lit. about to be) revealed."

(4) By Sajjad Hassan, Sajjad, of Allahabad :

" God only knows what my heart desires,
Why it flutters and what it wants.
Wake up from your deep slumber, O Indians,
For your Bharat is about to be robbed.
If you boycott their bideshi goods,
India will become ours once again.
Though I am writing about the condition of India
The heart of my pen is breaking (because of too much grief).
Strangers are passing their days in ease,
(While) the morsel (of food) that we have is being snatched away from us.

Friends are turning into strangers.
And all this is due to disunion.
India has begun to be free from slavery,
And is about to become a paradise once again.
Would that some one said to the strangers:
'Go out'. If thou wishest thy good.
Do not lose courage, proceed onward
And see how Providence helps you (lit. what God wishes).
How long shall we exercise our patience? There must be a limit to it.
Our hearths and homes, everything is being plundered.
If strangers are jealous of Sajjad let them be so,
For only that will happen which God wills."

(5) By Gobind of Meerut:

"It is a wonder that they expect good for themselves
Who wish evil for India.
Ill-wishers alone are bad.
And only well-wishers are good;
Dost thou expect loyalty for oppression?
(If not) why dost thou, O faithless one! expect loyalty from us?
A sore heart wants to realize its aims.
O! solver of problems! (lit. one who shows a way out of difficulty) it craves help from thee.
This country is about to become a nation.
All this fuss is going to cease now.
Thy record is black with oppression.
The prestige of the enemy is about to be lowered.
How can'st thou extirpate us, humble beings,
When thy existence itself is shortly to be effaced.
Go on striving, O! ye sons of India,
Your arrow is about to take its aim.
The day is approaching when every ill-wisher
Will disappear from the face of the earth.
Money, strength or arms cannot accomplish anything:
Only the will of God will prevail (lit. only that will happen which God wills).
That my enemy should leave my home
Is the dearest desire of my heart.
This pride of yours will receive a fall.
The day of judgement is at hand.
Our condition which has hitherto been so pitiful
Will improve with the help of swadeshi.
That tyrant wants to prolong his stay
By shutting our mouths and removing our pens.
Grant to the subjects their lawful rights
India wants nothing else.
Pack up your bag and baggage and take to your way,
Otherwise you will hear of it.
Release us from the chains of slavery,
This is our prayer morning and night.
Although swaraj is acquired with difficulty
Still the reward of our labours is soon to be reaped.
Behold! Gobind! you are to get swaraj now,
Why do you roll about and what else do you want?"

(6) By Babu Ram, Hari, editor of the Swarajya:

"Now the country desires its good,
For those who were asleep are about to awake.
The garden that the autumnal winds have devastated
Is about to bear fruit and flowers.
Robbers are flying from this place.
The mischief that is going on is about to be suppressed.
Wells are being dug

For those that were digging ditches for us.
The flash of the Indian sword will soon be seen.
And our enemies will soon be blood and dust.
The desire that was hidden like a secret
Is openly expressed by every one now.
Send away the silent to the land of repose,
For India will soon resound on all sides (lit. noise is about to ensue in India).
And winds of independence will shortly blow
For both young and old aspire for swaraj.
Strangers will go away shoe-beaten
And will pack up bag and baggage one day.
The reign of tyrants is about to change.
The crow of inauspicious colour is shortly to fly away.
He that wants to sit at ease
Should get up and endure grief and trouble for a few brief days (lit. two days).
The lightning of the sword does not flash, O God!
I am dying of suffocation in the darkness.
Why should not Hari be free
As Bharat (India) is shortly to become independent."

Bombs in Agra.

5. Referring to the bombs that have been found in Agra, the Musáfir (Agra), of the 23rd October, remarks that the Agra public have much confidence in the detective ability of Mr. Bramley and hope that he will spare no pains in bringing the offenders to justice.

MUSAFIR, 23rd October 1908.

The new spirit.

6. Under the heading "The Spirit of Opposition", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 25th October, says that "the fact is rather curious, and it is remarkable to note that the new spirit, of which we have so much evidence here, is not particularly the growth of this country. The so-called feeling of disloyalty which is being made such capital of against the Indians by our Anglo-Indian friends is not by any means confined within the boundaries of India."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 25th October 1908.

The editor refers to the article contributed by "A Dissatisfied Colonial" to the Daily Mail of September 30th in which he shows that India is not the only portion of the Empire in which the bureaucrat has been found out. The country, he says, is flooded everywhere with literature on the subject of the people's rights, liberties and privileges, and reading between the lines, one will everywhere detect a certain ill-feeling, not so much against the system of government as against the young English administrators personally. These young Englishmen as a class are hardworking, capable and honest. But they become unpopular owing to their lack of sympathy with the people. This cult of Imperialism is the root of all evils. It enshrouds the official body with an impervious wall of aloofness which, whatever useful official quality may be ascribed to it, can never be useful in creating any sympathy between the rulers and the ruled.

Lala Lajpat Rai in England.

7. "Hindus have to suffer constant disappointment although on the occasion of a frontier war it is upon them falls the maintenance of British rule in India." Such is the view, says Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 27th October, expressed in England by Lala Lajpat Rai, one of the foremost men of the Indian National Congress. We do not know if Lala Lajpat Rai, or his other numerous supporters for the matter of that, can quote facts and figures to prove the truth of this statement; but one thing is clear, the statement, if true, implies a serious accusation against the Muhammadan community as a whole. It shows that with the gradual development of a prospect of war with the frontier tribes, the loyalty of the Muhammadans fades away and their sympathies go over to the other side leaving the Hindus alone to support and uphold the cause of British government in India. This mendacious pervertion of facts demands special attention here and we are constrained therefore to challenge every recognized leader of the Congress party to come forward and show on what special occasions Muhammadans have received exclusive privileges from the British Government: we admit that the injustice and oppression to which they have been subjected in the past on account of the misrepresentations of the so-called nationalists have become rare now, because time has revealed our 'patriotic' brethren in their true colours. But it is one thing to cease to do an act of injustice and it is another to grant an exclusive privilege. Who has the audacity in the face of these facts to come forward and say 'Muhammadans have been the recipients of special attention at the hands of Government,' except these self-constituted leaders of public opinion? Fortunately, however, every one knows that they are capable of anything if they can successfully criticise the Government and work harm to the Muhammadan community. Lala Lajpat Rai's opinion, therefore, does not come as a surprise to us, especially when we remember that he has to preserve his reputation as an Arya Samajist also. We would have let the incident pass but alas! it is still fresh in our minds that through the misrepresentations of their enemies Muhammadans have been held responsible for everything; from participation in the Mutiny down to sympathy with the frontier tribesmen. Even Lord MacDonnell could not help falling a prey to our nationalist brethren, for how else can we account for his ill-treatment of the promoters of the Nadwat-ul-Ulma? Poor fellows! finding it hard to oppose him they had no recourse left but to leave the country.

AL BASHIR, 27th October 1908.

However, we challenge once more every sympathiser of Lala Lajpat Rai to come forward and to prove by facts and figures the truth of his statement.

'HINDOSTHAN, 27th October 1908.

The Indian National Congress.

8. The following is from the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 27th October :—

"We are glad to reproduce the following paragraph from the Pioneer :—'The President, the Hon'ble Dr. Rash Behari Ghose, and the Secretaries (Messrs. Dinshaw Eduljee Wacha and Daji Abajee Khare), of the Surat Convention, accepted the invitation of the Madras Provincial Congress Committee to hold the session of the Indian National Congress during the ensuing Christmas in Madras.'

Now the matter seems to have advanced a step further. It is not only that the point has not been settled and is in dispute, but it has been decided by the Surat Convention Committee and gladly adopted by the Madras Provincial Committee and since then it has been admitted by all the Congresswalas in India and out of India, and here we repeat a portion of a Sanskrit poem which runs thus :—"Angikritam swikritinah paripalyanti" (what great people admit and accept they adhere to till they breathe their last). Therefore, as we, the Congresswalas, have begotten the child named the Congress, nourished it in its infancy and pushed it forward to its puberty, we must not let it die an unnatural death in the prime of its youth, but heartily support it, tooth and nail, that it may grow strong and reign over India, as its countrymen created King Congress predestined one day to free the country of the proverbial phoot, disunion."

Swami Dayanand and Swaraj.

9. One Brahmanand, writing to the Saddharma Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), in the issue of the 21st October, tries to refute the views expressed by Shyamji Krishna Varma in the May number of the Indian Sociologist that Swami Dayanand's chief aim was to teach the establishment of Swaraj, but that for obvious reasons he did not publicly put forward his political ideas. The writer remarks that he was a social and religious reformer and a benefactor of the whole world, and that as such he looked upon foreigners with as much affection as upon Indians.

AL BASHIR, 27th October 1908.

Causes of the unrest in India during the year 1907-8.

10. In continuation of his article headed "Causes of the Unrest in India During the year 1907-8" (vide Selections no. 43, paragraph 6), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), writing in the issue of the 27th October, observes that the only persons who could be supposed to have caused the Mutiny of 1857 are Bahadur Shah, Wajid Ali Shah and Nana Rao.

As regards Bahadur Shah, the question of his complicity in the Mutiny has already been discussed at some length in previous notes.

His natural tendencies and habits of luxury place Wajid Ali Shah also beyond suspicion. But as to Nana Rao we admit he had sufficient motive to bring about a revolt. He fought bravely to the last and when defeat became inevitable he fled away and passed the remainder of his days no one knows where. The British Government, too, could not ascertain where he lived and where he died, but we are inclined to think that even after his defeat he was preparing that class of man in the Deccan that is at the bottom of the present day unrest.

Unrest in India.

11. Referring to the opinion current among a certain section of Anglo-Indians and Englishmen that the cause of the unrest in India is the system of Western education inaugurated in the country by Lord Macaulay, the editor of the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), in the issue of the 30th October, remarks that this diagnosis is quite incorrect and that the real cause of the unrest is the disregard of Indian public opinion and the non-fulfilment of those hopes and aspirations which were created in Indians by English education and by the late Queen Victoria's Proclamation.

ABHYUDAYA, 30th October 1908.

Indian reforms.

12. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 29th October :—

INDIAN PEOPLE. 29th October 1908.

"Recently a rumour obtained currency in the Indian press that the anniversary of the Queen's Proclamation would be celebrated in India by the Government announcing the much-talked-of and much-expected 'reforms.' Whatever may be the character of these long-delayed 'reforms' it would have been peculiarly in the fitness of things if they could be announced on the 1st of November, a very sacred day in the annals of British Indian politics. Such an observance of the day would have enhanced its sanctity and confirmed its character in the mind of the Indian public. The Queen's Proclamation is the Magna Charta of Indians, and any announcement made by Government on the day of this Proclamation, consistent with the spirit and policy of this charter of the Indian people's rights, would have been a real parallel to the historical 'confirmation of the charters' of England; and the names of Lords Morley and Minto would have gone down to posterity with such a character as that of King Edward I in the history of the English Constitution. Hitherto, however, all efforts of the Indians to obtain a loyal recognition of the spirit of this Proclamation have been unavailing. In connection with his coronation, His Majesty King Edward VI was gracious enough to declare that 'The Empire of Rome was composed of slave states; the British Empire is a galaxy of free nations.' We also would like to cry amen to this, but is the nationality of India recognized? In what sense is India a part of the Empire and what is the character of its freedom are some of the questions which the future historians must discuss, for our mouths are shut. At that London Colonial Conference which was called together for consultation about the interests of the entire Empire how was India represented? British statesmen never tire of boasting of 'our Indian Empire,' and of speaking of India as 'the brightest jewel in the British crown.' But we are not perhaps to judge what amount of the light of political freedom is reflected from this so-called brightest jewel. Lord Curzon himself in his Durbar address at Delhi declared that the 'principal condition of the strength of the British throne is the possession of the Indian Empire, and the faithful attachment and service of the Indian people.' Yet the people of India have been long enough fed on hopes deferred, and if their hearts have grown sick in consequence it is no wonder that they have grown to be sullen and callous. Much therefore depends on Reuter's latest news. Lord Morley, it is announced, will make a statement on Indian reforms about the 17th November. Our expectations are big. Who knows what this statement will be? Will it again be reiterated that Indians are not yet capable to look after their own affairs to any extent? It is supposed, however, that both Lord Minto and Lord Morley are anxious to do some real and substantial good to the country and it is to be sincerely hoped that they will not throw away the splendid opportunity which they have still before them of gratifying Indian sentiment and rallying round the sober and reasonable element of Indian politicians. A scheme of reforms which is real and not sham, which has for its object the true progress of the country, and which does not honeycomb Indian society with differences, will evoke more genuine and powerful feelings of attachment than any number of lectures or speeches delivered by governors inculcating loyalty. The only hopeful sign seems to us to be that certain Anglo-Indian papers have already begun to raise a cry against the reforms and are discrediting the Indian cause as best as they can."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 29th October 1908.

The Indian Moderates.

13. Under the heading "Rallying the Moderates," the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 29th October, has the following :—

"Educated and enlightened India—those who have political consciousness—may be divided into two classes, the Moderates and the Extremists, those who have faith in British 'justice, equity and good conscience' and those who have no such faith. Lord Morley, not very long ago, spoke of rallying the Moderates, but unfortunately we see no effort either on his part or on the part of his colleagues and subordinates to that effect. Not only is there no effort made in that direction but every opportunity seems to be taken advantage of to exasperate the Moderates. He must be a fool or a lunatic who can say that the suggested reforms which are in the air—reforms about the advisory council of notables and many other things—are not meant to be a distinct blow at these Moderates. Men who by sheer dint of industry, perseverance and ability have made their mark are not supposed to be fit to give advice in the advisory, legislative and executive councils, but men of little learning and less ability but whose progenitors were so kind as to leave for them some money are, by a queer irony of fate, supposed to be fit to advise the administration. How would the Britisher like to have the destinies of the vast British Empire to be guided by the House of Lords alone with the House of Commons abolished? And then in the maintenance of order—or rather to call a spade a spade—in the promulgation of the recent repressive measures no distinction seems to have been made between Moderates and Extremists. Houses of men who throughout their lives never dreamt of anarchism or terrorism have been searched. Meetings organized by men of light and leading of moderate views and brilliant records, meetings organized for the purpose of condemning terrorism and pushing on peaceful 'honest' swadeshism have been prohibited. Administrative blunders have been made, failures of justice have occurred without any responsible official moving his little finger without any effort to rectify them. And, to crown all, a certain section of the Anglo-Indian press, in season and out of season, condemns the Congress movement and ridicules the moderate leaders. The mischief this section of the Indian press does to the administration is not very small. The Extremists and terrorists in the country is in a microscopic minority; but the conditions of the surroundings necessary for their growth and development appear to be favourable. If the administration is not apathetic we are afraid they are being led astray by thoughtless people who keep no eye on the future."

ABHYUDAYA, 30th October 1908.

Loyalty meetings.

14. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 30th October, says that it would have been no wonder had people held meetings in Bengal to condemn the anarchists and their violent methods and to proclaim their loyalty in order to save themselves from suspicion, because it is in that province that political agitation is most vigorous and that conspiracies against the Government were unearthed, but it makes one laugh in one's sleeves when he hears of loyalty meetings being held in such peaceful places as Almora and Pilibhit. Such loyalty meetings, the editor adds, can have no effect upon the public, since their conveners are generally persons who have never taken part in works of public interest and have never made any sacrifices in the cause of the country. Neither can their professions of loyalty be of any help to the Government, for they have no influence on public opinion. The editor would not have directed his attention to the subject had not the repressive policy of the Government been supported in some of these loyalty meetings contrary to the general opinion that such a policy only makes the situation all the worse for it.

ABHYUDAYA, 30th October 1908.

The Proclamation Jubilee.

15. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 30th October, says that in view of the prevailing unrest in India, the message which His Majesty the King-Emperor intends to send to the princes and peoples of India on the fiftieth anniversary of the Proclamation Day will have a very beneficial effect. It may be prophesied that this message will raise hopes in the hearts of Indians of endeavours being made to increase their happiness and respect in future. The people, adds the editor, have begun to entertain a hope that all political prisoners will be released in honour of the celebration of the Proclamation Day and there is no doubt that such an act of grace will cause much gratification to the people and tend to increase good feeling between the rulers and the ruled.

Shanti Narain and his apology.

19. The editor of the Swarajya (Allahabad) makes the following observations in the issue of the 24th October :—

SWARAJYA, 24th October 1908.

"Shanti Narain, that man of stern moral principles, the upholder of the cause of truth and justice, the man who could spurn a conditional offer of pardon, the staunch supporter of the cause of independence. Alas! such a man is represented to have tendered an apology to secure such a petty thing as his release. But for the arrogance of his counsels we would have laughed at the incident. They do not seem to realize how deeply they have wounded our dear Shanti Narain's heart. In spite of his telegram sent through his father forbidding his pleader from tendering an apology, pardon was implored on the ground of repentance instead of justice. We are shocked to see how our dear Shanti Narain's instructions have been disregarded.

However, let us try and train up the plant (the Swarajya) which he has watered with the blood of his heart. It will be sufficient satisfaction to him to know that his organ has become politically a power in the land."

The Octroi Commission.

20. The Awáza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 24th October, referring to the appointment of a Commission to consider the question of reducing octroi duties on articles of daily consumption, remarks that the present system is open to much objection inasmuch as refunds are sometimes demanded on articles of local product on the ground that they are to be sent outside a particular town, in spite of the fact that no import duty was paid for them. Municipalities have to grant refunds for such articles and thus suffer much loss. It would be better, suggests the editor, if the municipal authorities insist on railway receipts being shown both for imported and exported articles.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 25th October 1908.

22. Referring to the financial difficulties in which the municipality of Benares has found itself placed (vide paragraph 30, Selections no. 40), the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 25th October, has the following:—

Control of municipal finances.

"What is therefore the cause of the present state of things? As yet everything seems to be shrouded in mystery. The city fathers are not sufficiently informed and in most cases do not care to trouble themselves with such difficult problems. To most of them the obtaining of a municipal commissionership is simply the getting of an opportunity of acquiring an amount of local importance and of being able to keep in touch with the authorities and to do things pleasurable to them in season and out of it. Few there may be who understand the responsibility of the thing, but they often find themselves in the minority and are disregarded and humiliated for their pains. In Benares the popular notion is that the engineering department has been the ruin of the municipality. There is no expert on the board to understand anything of this department. This has been for several years the most important department, and as the commissioners know they have had no control over it, it is said that the present Chairman of the board has put every blame upon his predecessor in office and has blamed the commissioners for not looking after things properly and especially for sanctioning schemes about which they understood very little, and expenditure which they had no means to satisfy. Mr. Radice was very popular and very strong. Things were not properly put before him. He kept himself busy with so many minor things. The commissioners, as a matter of course, had to sanction anything which had received the Chairman's imprimatur. Where is the commissioner bold enough in these days to oppose the official Chairman in anything, even if he is asked to build a ladder to the heavens? It is not his money which he is asked to spend. Poor commissioners! they are now blamed for that very thing which was perhaps their supreme virtue under the last régime."

23. A correspondent, writing to the Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 27th October, complains that for want of urinals by the side of public roads people are put to much trouble and inconvenience. This state of affairs calls for the special attention of the municipal authorities.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 25th October 1908.

24. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 25th October, referring to the press note issued by the Government of Bombay with regard to the pay and prospects of teachers, makes the following observations:—

The lot of the teacher.

"We have always asserted that it would be useless to try to improve the morale of our young men unless we made an effort to improve the teacher. That policy is a shortsighted one which prescribes rules and regulations for the conduct of the boys in our public schools, but does not trouble itself to know what sort of teachers there are either to exact a strict observance and an absolute obedience to those rules or to understand the principles upon which they are based. Mere providing the country with an institution for training the teachers in the art of teaching and governing the boys will scarcely suffice. The teacher's work is the most ill-paid of all works; and the present generation of teachers who judge their profession simply at the money-making facilities it affords, does not command that confidence and respect which are said to be the social compensation of the poverty of pay. The most successful of our graduates are those who have taken up other professions than that of a teacher. It is absurd to think that our graduates will like to permanently enter this department when there is the ghost of a chance of their being able to enter any of the other lucrative professions. The mere clerk in any of the several public offices has a better prospect than the subordinate establishment in the educational service, and yet the lot of the clerk is bad enough in all conscience, and the teacher's work is the most onerous, the most responsible and withal the most burdened with severe rules and irksome restrictions. Times have also changed. With regard to the existing circumstances the teacher's pay and prospects ought to be made more hopeful. We therefore sincerely congratulate the Government of Bombay in their efforts to ameliorate the lot of the teachers."

The Sanskrit College, Benares.

25. Referring to the new rule enforced in the Sanskrit College, Benares, whereby fees for appearing at the various Sanskrit examinations have been raised and which requires the payment of these fees by the scholars of the Benares Sanskrit College also, who were so far exempt from the same, the Bhárat Jiwan (Benares), of the 26th October, remarks that as the payment of these fees will press heavily upon the students of the college who are generally very poor and will thus indirectly discourage the study of Sanskrit, it is desirable that the rule referred to should be cancelled.

To remedy this evil the editor suggests the introduction of the Muhammadan element on a larger scale in the Education department.

Education in Kakori.

27. A correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 28th October, requests the Government to establish the proposed vernacular middle school in Kakori in spite of the protests of the leading men of that town whose opinion, the writer remarks, is not worth notice, inasmuch as they are well-to-do and can afford to send their children to be educated elsewhere. The Government would be conferring a real boon upon the public if it agreed to grant aid to the English middle school also.

Agriculture.

28. The editor of the Educational Magazine (Ghazipur), writing in the August number, makes the following suggestions for the teaching of scientific methods of agriculture to Indian peasants :—

"(1) That agricultural colleges and schools should be established in the big towns of every province.

(2) That there should be at least two colleges in every province and one school in every big city.

(3) That Government should set apart lands for experimental farms in every district.

(4) That newspapers and periodicals should be issued in different vernacular languages all over India to make scientific methods of agriculture popular among the masses."

The editor, in conclusion, remarks that Indian peasants are steeped in gross ignorance; it is the duty of the Government therefore, to come to their help and enable them to adopt improved methods of cultivation.

Plague.

29. Lala Hardayal, writing in the Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 10th October, makes the following observations on plague and its causes :—

"There is no doubt that if mortality goes on increasing at such an alarming rate as at present we will witness a terrible result so far as India is concerned. The more we consider this question of the decrease in the population the more irresistible becomes the conviction that poverty is one of its chief causes. For we know only too well that poverty engenders plague, one of the chief causes of the deterioration of the Indian population. There are two current theories regarding the origin of plague. One attributes it to Government and the other to the will of God. The Government is held responsible because it is believed that it pollutes wells by throwing poisonous medicines into them. Be this as it may, we too hold the Government responsible but in another sense. Government levies heavy taxes which causes poverty and poverty in its turn engenders plague. This view is corroborated by the remarks of Mr. Hyndman (vide his book re the exploitation of India under British rule, page 13) and of Mr. Gokhale who has said:

SWARAJYA, 10th October 1908.

'Those that take a superficial view of the case consider plague to be a heavenly visitation. But thousands die of it because through lack of sufficient food they have no strength left to survive its attacks.' "

Malaria.

30. The Jadd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 19th October, referring to the misery and hardship caused by the outbreak of malaria in the United Provinces, appeals both to the Government and to the people to come to the help of the impoverished masses who on account of the recent famine have lost all power of resistance and are succumbing to the disease which they could well have withstood under normal conditions. The editor suggests that qualified medical men should go about in villages and distribute medicine free of cost.

Quinine.

31. The Tafrih (Lucknow), of the 28th October, makes the following suggestions for the consideration of Government regarding packets of quinine that are sold for the convenience of the public in post offices :—

" (1) That the packets should contain directions for use both in Hindi and Urdu instead of in Hindi alone.

(2) That it should be explicity stated on the packet that quinine should not be used when fever is very high."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 29th October 1908.

Malaria in Upper India.

32. In a note in the issue of the 29th October, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), says 'the whole of Northern India is in the grip of malaria, and the prevalence of fever all over the country is a far more serious matter at the present time than even the mortality from plague. Whatever be the causes to which this abnormal condition of things may be ascribed, the fact that something must be done immediately to remedy this terrible scourge is of vital importance.' He suggests that 'hospital assistants and compounders should be available at every tahsil to go out to all the surrounding villages with free packets of quinine and malaria pills; that large municipalities should make an allowance to Vaidyas, Hakims and homœopathic practitioners who in most cases have to serve out medicines gratis and that their agency may also be employed for the free distribution of quinine packets or malaria pills. If money help is impossible they may be made to accept it in kind in this way.'

Law and Excise Inspectors.

33. Referring to the circular issued by the Commissioner of Excise prohibiting Excise Inspectors from appearing in any law examination, the Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 24th October, remarks that in these days when concessions and reforms are being demanded everywhere, it is really surprising to find an official who thinks it wise to take a retrogade step without pausing to consider even for a moment that by this single act of his he is really destroying all the hopes and prospects of many an Indian youth.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 25th October 1908.

Clerks in Government offices.

34. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 25th October, says 'that as a very high percentage of the middle class people earns its livelihood by Government service, and this service in the majority of cases only means an engagement as a clerk, it is high time now that something were done for the amelioration of the condition of the clerks in public offices. Whatever therefore affects the pay and prospects of this class of people is of no small moment either to the country or to its Government. Considering the circumstances that now prevail, the cost of living not now being the same as it was when these scales were fixed and the purchasing power of the almighty rupee having fallen as much for these persons as for those for whom a benign Government arranged for an exchange compensation allowance, it ought to be conceded now that the scales of pay fixed for the subordinate establishment in all the departments and public offices require a readjustment.' He says that 'it is absurd to think that any grain allowance or some such make-shift arrangement for an infinitesimal number of any class of persons can really suffice to stay or retard the rigors of a condition of things which is neither temporary nor accidental, but has come to stay in our midst and has affected a really larger class. The Government after all must do something in this respect. And it is an unsound principle to wait until circumstances force its hands.'

He then refers to the ways and means adopted by men in the Telegraph department to better their prospects and remarks that neither we nor the Government would wish a repetition of the same procedure in any other department. He asks 'is not the condition of things in one department or office the same as in every other, and has not work increased in every department? Where again is that grace in the gift which you are forced to bestow either by animal force or by the force of logic? We believe this is a matter, the importance of which did not escape the notice of the officers who recently met in the Conference at Naini Tal.'

Sir Ernest Cable and Indian wealth.

35. Adverting to the suggestion regarding the nationalization of Indian Railways made by Sir Ernest Cable in the pages of the London Times in which it is said that the economic salvation of India would be assured if only India had more railways and rolling stock, and Indians are therefore asked to invest in railways in India in preference to all other stocks. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 25th October, observes :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 25th October 1908.

"But it would be insulting Indian intelligence to ask us to find the funds for what would be exploiting our own country for the benefit of others. Are there not diverse other ways, industrial and commercial, wherein Indian money, if money there is, may be employed far more usefully to the individual, the community and the country?"

Coining implements in the Agra jail.

37. The editor of the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), writing in the issue of the 26th October, condemns the action of a young Muhammadan vakil who accepted remuneration for pleading the cause of the accused in the Etawah forgery case, as unpatriotic, and remarks that such conduct is not in conformity with what is to be expected from a Muhammadan graduate of light and leading. NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 26th October 1908.

Sub-Registrars.

38. A correspondent, writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 28th October, makes the following suggestions for the consideration of Government in connection with the reorganization scheme of the Registration department :— HINDUSTANI, 28th October 1908.

"(1) That in view of the fact that the social status of Sub-Registrars is not inferior to that of a Tahsildar, their consolidated pay should be raised to Rs. 100 or at least to Rs. 75.

(2) That sub-registrars should have their own peons instead of tahsil chaprasis.

(3) That quarters should be provided for sub-registrars as is sometimes done in tahsils.

(4) That the pay of Sub-Registrars already in service should be fixed with reference to the services they have rendered to the department.

(5) That District Registrars should be authorized to transfer Sub-Registrars from one tahsil to another within their jurisdiction."

The Panjab Chief Court.

39. Referring to the retirement of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice P. C. Chatterji from the Panjab Chief Court, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 29th October, observes that Mr. Chatterji's retirement however has led to a bitter disappointment, in so far as the question of his successor has been solved by the Panjab INDIAN PEOPLE, 29th October 1908.

Government. 'In the first place no Indian lawyer has been given the permanent vacancy and in the next the temporary appointment, too, has not been filled by a man who was, in the estimation of the Panjab lawyers, the best available candidate, viz. Rai Bahadur Lala Lalchand. Mr. Lalchand's supersession coming as it does after he has already officiated for ten years as Judge with great ability, has come as a surprise upon the Panjabis, but in these days of surprises of all sorts the Panjabis might well have been prepared for such a surprise. Judicial appointments in India have recently been made in a manner which is sure to cost our High Courts their prestige and it is time that the Government took note of the strong feeling of resentment provoked by such appointments. Some third rate lawyers, European and Indian, have been pitchforked into our High Courts and this cannot do good either to the people or the Government.'

INDIAN PEOPLE, 29th October 1908.

Witnesses.

40. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 29th October, draws the attention of the authorities to the numerous difficulties, inconveniences and discomforts to which witnesses, assessors and jurymen are put for want of accommodation in the civil courts at Allahabad. He says that there is not even water connection in the local civil court buildings and there is no room where jurors and assessors can retire and wait till they are required by the Judge.

Under-trial prisoners in the Court of Sessions have similarly to stay outside underneath the trees or in the portico of the court exposed to all the rigours of the weather. He suggests that the old police office should be utilized as a room for jurors, assessors and counsels coming from the High Court, and for respectable witnesses and that water-taps and water stands should, as in the case of the Magistrates' court building, be provided in the civil court compound.

ABHYUDAYA, 30th October 1908.

The Swadeshi movement.

41. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 30th October, says that heretofore Indians have been in a stupor and have sunk to the lowest level of degradation, but that they are now awakening to a sense of their condition and will arouse themselves once more. They will develop the swadeshi movement in spite of the various misfortunes and troubles that they may put up with and no earthly power can deter them in this. They cannot but have recourse to the swadeshi movement to preserve themselves in the great struggle for existence among the different nations of the world, and it is certain that this movement will prove to be a panacea for all the evils under which India is labouring.

The editor, in conclusion, remarks that the swadeshi movement is a lawful one which has the fullest sympathy of the Government and no one should therefore be afraid of the authorities in encouraging it, and that the opposition to it of any subordinate officials should be brought to the notice of higher authorities.

District authorities and railway accidents.

42. A correspondent in the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 28th October, makes the following suggestion for the consideration of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces:—

"In view of the fact that the railway authorities often suppress the facts of a case in order to save their subordinates from blame, it is desirable to authorize District Magistrates to take cognizance of cases occurring on or near the stations within their respective jurisdictions."

ADVOCATE, 29th October 1908.

Telegraph signallers' grievances.

43. Commenting on the resolution of the Government of India on the grievances of telegraph signallers, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 29th October, makes the following observations:—

"The promised steps to remove the grievances of telegraph signallers have been revealed in a resolution of the Government of India, in the department of Commerce and Industry. But it has been received with disappointment by the men in Calcutta, and the feeling of dissatisfaction is said to be shared by the signalling staff in all other large offices.

The resolution has caused disappointment. And this feeling is not to be expressed in simple breath; the signallers are not going to take it lying down. 'There is trouble ahead', said a taciturn man to a representative of the Statesman of Calcutta, 'its going to be war without a doubt.' This is rather unpleasant and suggestive of no agreeable future for the departmental head as much as for the public if one were to draw his lessons from the experience of the strike that followed the introduction of the Newlands scheme of work. That the juniors would receive immediate benefit is admitted on all hands. The case is the reverse with the seniors who would not only gain nothing but the prospects had been, it was said, rendered much more gloomy than they were before. The whole scheme is characterized as mere jugglery, suggestive of the mountain in labour with its inevitable consequence, and an attempt at giving with one hand and taking away with the other. This is ominous indeed if the protest were to be translated into action as it is very likely to be done."

44. A correspondent in the Jain Gazette (Deoband), of the 24th October, suggests that the following measures should be adopted for the protection of the Paras Nath Hill:— JAIN GAZETTE, 24th October 1908.

The Parasnath Hill.

"(1) That the Jains should have recourse to the civil courts for the establishment of their rights over the hill.

(2) That a deputation should proceed to England to wait upon the King-Emperor and lay the grievances of the Jain community before His Majesty. It should further take steps to secure the sympathy of the British public with its cause.

(3) That the Jains should encourage the swadeshi movement so that the British public feeling the loss of their trade with India may turn their attention to the grievances of the Jains and take steps for their redress."

1. The Oudh Akhbar (Lucknow), of the 31st October, referring to the contemplated infringement of the Treaty of Berlin by Austria and Bulgaria, remarks that the infringement is unavoidable and the other Powers in Europe will be unable to prevent it. The whole of Europe will, the editor thinks, be plunged into an international war by the selfishness of these two states.

2. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 1st November, has the following comments on the recent political activities of the Maharaja of Benares :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 1st November 1908.

The Maharaja of Benares.

"Who knew that the Maharaja of Benares, hitherto unknown to fame, was to become one of the pillars of the Empire? And yet the feat is very simple. A speech in a public meeting, a letter to the Times or a magazine article and the thing is done. We have in this case a renewal of a fashion that was quite common some years ago. Does the Maharaja of Benares write English? No one can say that the speech he delivered at Benares, or the letter he wrote to the Times, was actually written by him. But if the sentiments are his it is immaterial who wrote them. Experience, however, tells us that there is nothing behind these vicarious lucubrations, and if there is, it is some selfish motive. People are already asking what the Maharaja expects to gain by his contributions to loyal literature. The real unrest is not among wealthy noblemen or elderly sober people, but the hundreds of thousands of young men and boys whose minds are in a state of distraction. Over them territorial magnates in the position of the Maharaja of Benares have no influence and their speeches or writings will pass by them as the idle wind."

3. The following is from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 5th November :—

ADVOCATE, 5th November 1908

The Maharaja of Benares on the political situation.

"Long before the Maharaja of Benares has been made an Indian chief in the proper sense of the word, His Highness has run all the way to London to seek the protection of the Times on behalf of the native chiefs. He is averse to the agitation for self-government, but the principle has been admitted by the British people and the Sovereign. The people have been associated with the Government and can be further associated without imperilling the integrity of Indian Chiefs. His Highness's solicitude on behalf of the swadeshi movement is commendable and the country will agree with him that it should not be injured by the introduction of the boycott. But may we suggest to His Highness to give some practical proof of his solicitude of swadeshi and not follow the example of empty talkers? From the treasury of Ramnagar Fort nothing has been as yet spent to develop any industry of the province or the town of Benares. The Maharaja will help the export trade about which he is so much concerned, not only of raw materials but of finished articles also if he were to do something at home instead of going to seek the help of the Times to express his sympathy with the swadeshi movement."

4. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 1st November, has the following :—

ADVOCATE, 1st November 1908.

Indians in South Africa.

"Could there be anything more irritating than that Mr. Ghandi in convict dress was marched publicly in daylight through the roads of Johannesburg? Does it not mean interference with the privacy of Indian home life in Natal when women are taxed for the privilege of living with their husbands or under the protection of their natural guardians—a course unheard of in any other country under the British flag? In a petition to the Parliament of Natal in regard to the tax of £3, the Indian Women's Association states :—

'Your petitioners regard with great shame and sorrow that women who are in default of payment are sentenced to imprisonment, and the very dread of being marched up to the court and gaol is enough to numb their intellect and cause terror, to escape from which the aforesaid Act fosters in them a temptation to barter their female modesty and virtue.'

One cannot but be tempted to say that Natal is outside the pale of civilized society, and certainly not within the jurisdiction of the British Empire. What is more, the authorities in the Transvaal are also taking a mean advantage of the helpless position of Indian prisoners convicted under the Registration and Immigration Acts. They are not only starved but otherwise ill-treated in gaols which facts have given occasion to spirited protests from the entire community there. Because the passive resisters have chosen to go to prison as many times as they are convicted, life in gaols must be made as irksome to them as possible, even by throwing to the winds all sense of justice and decency. Our outraged countrymen there look up to the King-Emperor alone for redress of their grievances. Will the Jubilee of the Victoria Proclamation bring them any relief?"

HINDUSTANI, 4th November 1908.

Indians in South Africa.

5. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 4th November, reproduces the comments of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 1st November, regarding the treatment of Indians in South Africa.

TOHFA-I-HIND, 4th November 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

6. The Tohfa-i-Hind (Bijnor), of the 4th November, referring to the ill-treatment of Indians by the Boers in the Transvaal, remarks that it is due to the valuable help rendered by Indians to the British forces during the late South African war which the Boers severely resented. Under the circumstances the editor hopes that the Government will come to the rescue of its loyal Indian subjects in the Transvaal and gratify the Indian public who are eagerly waiting for the intercession of the Imperial Government in the matter.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 5th November 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

7. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 5th November:—

"The intelligence that Mr. Ghandi, after being sentenced to hard labour for two months, was brought down to Johannesburg and marched through the streets in convict costume, has excited the greatest indignation everywhere. It could not have been a piece of carelessness: it must have been done deliberately to strike terror into the hearts of Asiatic evildoers and to show the Indians the sad plight of their leader. But not one Indian has been intimidated or disheartened. No one will believe for a moment that Mr. Ghandi is a criminal because he has been made to don the convict's garb and exhibited therein to his exasperated countrymen. It is further stated that at Volksrust he was made to do scavenging work in the public square. The crown of martyrdom is intended for men like him and the lesson of his struggle will not be lost on his countrymen either in Africa or India. The indignation of a few English friends has been of no avail and the Asiatics in South Africa must bear their burden unaided. Truly the white man's burden is heavy—in South Africa, or at any rate, his hand is heavy."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 1st November 1908.

The King's message.

8. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 1st November, has the following:—

"It is officially stated that His Majesty the King-Emperor will send a message to the princes and people of India on the 1st November, the fiftieth anniversary of the famous Proclamation of Queen Victoria. We are aware of the sentiments of the King-Emperor as well as the Prince of Wales and we are sure it would give them the greatest pleasure if the condition of the people of India could be improved and they could be given a real share in the administration of the country. At the same time we cannot forget that even the Proclamation of 1858 has not yet been fulfilled and it is a cause of the most serious grievance throughout India. If, therefore, any new promises are made they should be fulfilled without delay, or at all events the Queen's Proclamation should no longer be treated as a dead letter. We deny that either the King's message or the reforms under consideration are a concession to anarchism, but we also maintain that the time has gone by for more promises or shadowy reforms."

ADVOCATE, 5th November 1908.

The King's message.

9. The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 5th November, makes the following observations on the Royal Proclamation read by the Viceroy in a grand darbar at Jodhpur:—

"A review of what happened during this period is only natural, particularly so when we are on the eve of a new era. And this task is done by the Emperor himself showing the fulfilment of past promises and laying down the future path to be travelled in order to stimulate the peaceful industry of India, to promote works of public utility and improvement and to administer the Government for the benefit of all residents therein. It is no time to enter into a hair-splitting discussion about the petty measures adopted or withheld, the controversial topics such as whether India has really prospered materially during this period or not, and the many lapses from the righteous and straightforward path dictated by a Sovereign and carried through by a body of officers with a high sense of responsibility. The spirit that guided the administration is the one thing to be looked into. And that spirit, barring the régime of a few Viceroys, must be said to have acted all along towards broadening the basis of the Government on the willing and intelligent co-operation of the Indian people. From sharistadars, tahsildars and sadr amins, the highest posts open to the people during the early days of direct administration by the Crown, the last days of Queen Victoria saw Indians as covenanted civilians, High Court Judges and Legislative Members, from mere spectators of local work Indians are now actively associated in the discharge of rural and urban duties of the Government. The appointment of two Indians to the Secretary of State's Council in London is no less an example of the fulfilment of the promise made fifty years ago.

But all these changes took place, not because of the expression of a royal desire alone. If they originated in the gracious Proclamation of 1858, action could only be taken because of a serious movement in the people themselves.

The inevitable result has been the great intellectual progress of the—and practically the rise, too, of a—middle class in India. The qualification being thus acquired, the wish came naturally in its train to have a large Indian element in the public services of the country on the part of educated Indians throughout the land. And those in whose hands the disposal of such favours rested could not very conveniently shut qualified Indians out for the sake of the members of their own community.

Here was discovered the germ of a new situation, the birth of a struggle between Indians and Anglo-Indians, and distinctions of race broke out in all their fury.

The Ilbert Bill controversy and the recommendations of the Public Service Commission were ugly revelations of the Anglo-Indian attitude towards educated Indians. This distinction on racial grounds began with the educational service and ended in the police where educational test is practically non est, and no Viceroy unfortunately so helped in widening this gulf as Lord Curzon, the great admirer of Lord Dalhousie. There has been a serious set-back in the peaceful progress of education, resulting in a serious and widespread unrest. We are afraid that the conditions proposed for the obliteration of race distinctions in the King-Emperor's message itself may strengthen the position taken up by such among the officials who would defeat the good intentions of our late Sovereign who wanted to see that 'our subjects of whatever Race or Creed, be freely and impartially admitted to offices in our services, the duties of which they may be qualified by their education, ability and integrity, duly to discharge.'

Notwithstanding the reaction in certain rulers in India, Indians steadily advanced towards the goal opened to their mental vision by the spread of education and diffusion of new ideas. From the desire to serve in high capacities —a desire that has been only partially realized—the people reached a higher stage, the desire to direct the administration of the country; from equality of opportunities in service they advanced to demand the privilege of co-operation in direction.

Abroad in the Colonies, too, which formed but a part of the British Empire, Indians naturally aspired to exercise practically what was long ago theoretically by Parliamentary statutes granted them—the rights of British citizenship—a fact recognized by the new Proclamation. And nothing would have given greater satisfaction to the people of India at this juncture than a declaration from the Crown that the rights of citizenship will not only be secured to Indians within the limits of India but outside it, in all parts of the British Empire.

There is, he says, a definite promise foreshadowing the spirit of the new order of things to come. Now, if this promise means that the people will have some control over their own Government, it will give immense satisfaction. On the other hand, if 'contact' is mere consultation for the expression of opinion, then it is no use concealing the fact that keen disappointment will be caused to the people. If Lord Morley in England and Lord Minto on the spot interpret the wishes of the King as a promise to give the people a greater share in the administration of their country, then only King Edward's message will become as memorable in the annals of India as is the Proclamation of Queen Victoria of blessed memory, and the event of the jubilee will be such a landmark in the history of India as release of prisoners and addition to the pay of soldiers will not possibly make."

HINDUSTANI, 4th November 1908.

The King's message.

10. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 4th November, reproduces the comments of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 5th November, on the Royal Proclamation.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 5th November 1908.

The King's message.

11. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 5th November, says that the greater portion of the message is of the usual official character and presents no distinctive features. It is assumed that the promises made in the Queen's Proclamation have been fulfilled.

The reference to the conspiracies is brief but significant and the widespread suspicion to which the Calcutta conspiracy gave rise is gradually diminishing. As to the mark of royal clemency and grace, he asks is this clemency to be shown to political offenders also? If the sentences of Mr. Tilak and other political offenders were remitted or reduced it would produce an excellent effect.

As to the distinctions of race he quotes the following passage from the King-Emperor's: message. "Steps are being continually taken towards obliterating distinctions of race as a test for access to posts of public authority and power" and observes "is not this a distinct admission that 'distinctions of race' were observed 'as the test for access to posts of public authority and power?' No wonder, for the greatest Viceroy but one of India has admitted, though not in so many words, that the great Queen's Proclamation has been and is bound to be a dead letter. If the other Viceroys as also the Secretaries of State were as outspoken as Lord Curzon, the occupation of the Indian National Congress would be gone and the difficulties of the Administration in justifying their professions in the light of their 'practices' would be no more. It is no good blinding ourselves to the fact that race distinctions cannot be obliterated in India. India seems to be a country peculiarly suited to the growth and development of such a spirit. In all ages and in all times the soil of Hindustan has never been free from 'distinctions of race' and religion. The arrogance and insolence of the present-day white Brahmans of India is nothing compared to that of the Aryan invaders of India when they first settled in the Punjab. And the terms 'natives' and 'niggers' are milk and honey compared to the 'das' and 'dasyu' of old. The aboriginal tribes of India, in the dark past and at the present day, did not and do not receive much better treatment than what is meted out to those Indo-Aryans themselves in Southern Africa at the present moment."

NASIM-I-AGRA, 31st October 1908.

The question of the day.

12. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 31st October, strongly condemns the doctrine of violence preached and practised by some of the Bengali enthusiasts and remarks:—

"It is useless, nay, dangerous to exasperate the Government especially when we see that we are unfit for any sort of a struggle at present. Our every effort should be directed towards bettering the economic condition of our country and unless this is done it is simply waste of time to agitate for reforms. The next thing with which we should occupy ourselves just now is the question of union between Hindus and Muhammadans. All leaders of public opinion should co-operate in making sectarian differences and caste prejudices impossible."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 1st November 1908.

The unrest among the youths of India.

13. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 1st November, has the following under the marginally noted heading:—

"Mrs. Besant's eloquent and well-reasoned address on Friday at the Mayo Hall is in reality an earnest and sympathetic attempt to deal with the problem of Indian unrest as manifested among the youths of the country. Her own life is a conspicuous and striking example of a splendid struggle for the freedom of human thought and her sympathy with all aspirations for liberty is assured. The passionate yearning for liberty that fills the hearts of the younger generation in India is recognized by Mrs. Besant as a logical and legitimate outcome of the education that was introduced by Macaulay. Nor is that all. The seismic disturbance that is swaying the minds of young people in India is a phase of a continental disturbance. The song of liberty is being chanted throughout Asia, even as the shouting of Bande Mataram greeted the close of Mrs. Besant's speech. Her contention that parents and teachers have it in their power to guide the enthusiasm of young minds into wholesome channels is true to a certain extent, but to a certain extent only. Fathers may be careless or indifferent in watching the growth of their sons, and teachers may leave the greater part of their duty unfulfilled, but what power can prevent the young intelligent mind from realizing the anomalies of the administration and the disqualifications under which a subject people have to live? Mrs. Besant gave a striking illustration of the absence of wisdom and sympathy displayed by the rulers of the country by referring to the Cawnpore memorial of the Mutiny. The memorial to the victims of Nana Saheb is appropriate, but why was no memorial raised to those who fought for the British and risked their own lives to save the lives of English women and children? Is it admitted that India is held by the swords of Indians? The evils that we elderly people always thought could be removed in course of time by the growth of a better understanding between the rulers and the ruled have become intolerable in the eyes of the younger generation. When Mrs. Besant said that she hoped the day would come when Indians would take a leading part not only in the affairs of their own country but in the councils of the empire there appeared a broad smile of unbelief on the faces of the young men present. The ill-treatment of Indians in South Africa was attributed by Mrs. Besant to the colonists not being ready for self-government. What about Canada and Australia? The Asiatic question in those colonies is not so acute because the Asiatic population is not large, but the rancour is just as great and the sentiments equally bitter. Our own view is that it is not in the power of parents and teachers to allay the present unrest; the Government alone can do it. Whether the Government will do so or not is another matter. So far everything is being done to add intensity to the unrest and increase the difficulties of the administration. Whether a fresh leaf will be turned in the near future rests entirely with the Government."

Progress and unrest.

14. Under the heading "Progress and Unrest", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 5th November, says: "it has become quite a fashion nowadays for the heads of provinces to lecture on the benefits of the British raj and on the mischievous teachings of some irresponsible men who mislead the youth of the country. On the other hand, on the part of the people, we see a mania for holding in nearly every town, large or small, loyalty meetings to proclaim to the world at large from house-tops that with the exception of a few fanatics, who can be counted on the fingers of one hand. the Indian population is loyal to the Government and is contented and prosperous.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 5th November 1908.

Let us see for ourselves how far these two kinds of preachers are right. Take first the heads of provinces. The popular Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces some time ago went through the provinces on a lecturing tour, so to say, and exposed the seditious actions of a few anarchists who in the name of patriotism were doing a deal of harm to their country. He was all sympathy and politeness on those occasions, and showed an example to his subordinates to be polite to the people of the country by himself shaking hands with each member of the audience who were invited for the occasion.

We must admit that 50 years' rule directly under the Crown has not only given us peace but has also opened our eyes to the manifold improvements and inventions that Europe has been making, and it is absolutely idle to blame the Government for raising money in England, where it can be had at the lowest interest, for railways in India or for not having given education how to manufacture rolling stock. The desideratum is that capitalists do not come forward to invest in such speculations and that Government cannot go on doing everything for the people; the people also must do something for themselves.

The English came to India with the set purpose of trade, and though by the act of Providence they are masters of the country, yet the ingrained idea is still there, i.e. that they should make money out of India by means of commerce or any other legitimate means which they may be able to devise."

As regards other industries, the editor says, "they were adroitly and ingeniously crushed in India during the time of the East India Company. Nobody can dispute that point, and it is no good crying over spilt milk. We know that when the interests of Manchester clash with those of India, the Government in England is sure to pass some measure by which the Indian mills may not have any advantage over theirs, and the only remedy in our hands is to refuse to purchase foreign goods so far as they can be replaced by home-made ones. This is pure and simple swadeshism. We must also bear in mind that England is not the only country that sends to our shore manufactured goods, but Germany and Austria as well are flooding our markets with their goods.

So in helping our swadeshi goods we have not only to reckon England as our rival but much more so Germany. In our opinion the latter is a more formidable rival. Now to meet these obstacles in our industrial progress we have to create a feeling in the minds of all our people, high and low, to help their own industries so far as lies in their power. Absolute boycotting of foreign goods is impossible; and to speak of boycotting only Manchester goods for political reasons is not commendable. It only shows a revengeful spirit. If we give preference to our home-made goods both objects can be realized without making much fuss and without showing any animus against one particular country. As regards our industrial improvement we must all be grateful to our present Lieutenant Governor who has been doing all that lies in his power to help local industries.

The next point is our getting more berths in the higher grades of Government appointments, but we must remember that all over the world the cry is "What shall we do with our boys?"

The securing of more appointments for Indians naturally means an equal amount of loss to the English, but as time passes a larger percentage will be given to persons residing in the country.

The next most important problem that appears unsolvable is the ever-increasing expenditure in the army and the English Government being distrustful of others cannot possibly, at least for the present, think of reducing the number of the British garrison. Some people may say that sedition is due to the heedlessness of John Bull to Indian grievances, and it may be so. So the only thing we should do is to cultivate peace and friendship amongst ourselves and try intently to improve our own industries in every branch and to help them so far as lies in our individual power."

UNION GAZETTE, 28th October 1908.

What the Indians ought to do.

15. A correspondent from the United States of America contributes the following article under the marginally noted heading to the Union Gazette (Bareilly), of the 28th October :—

"Indian newspapers instead of constantly criticizing Government officials and complaining against their measures should take upon themselves the task of teaching their imprudent and short-sighted countrymen what they should do to regenerate their dying nation.

Our capitalists should go over to the independent Republics in South America and establish themselves there as a commercial and industrial nation.

Peru, Chilly, Argentine and Brazil offer particular attractions in this respect. Besides, the people there very much resemble us in complexion; inter-marriages, therefore, are very possible.

Mexico, Panama and other States also offer us scope. But we should bear in mind that ignorant coolies are not wanted here, nor do they require men of the conservative class. Only liberal and enterprising men like the Japanese need come over and settle here."

ADVOCATE, 5th November 1908.

The Darbar at Bareilly.

16. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 5th November, referring to the divisional Darbar at Bareilly, says "the speech delivered by His Honour the Lieutenant Governor will be read with deep interest all over the two divisions, particularly so as it dealt with topics which were uppermost in the people's mind. Nothing brings the people and the rulers more into touch than communicativeness between the two. Sir John Hewett dealt with the requirements of the people as they found expression in diverse ways."

The remedies suggested by His Honour by the establishment of a hostel at Allahabad, the editor says, will go a long way to remove the wants of hill students and he hopes that the Maharaja of Tehri will take the initiative in the matter.

As to coolie utar—he remarks that if the wishes of His Honour were put into effect by officers concerned with impressing labour and if during the busy time of harvest five men were not pressed for work where one would be sufficient, and if this were done not only for officials on duty but also in the case of sight-seers and travellers as well, much of the sting of the present system would be removed, and in course of time large contractors would be found willing to come forward to act as suppliers of labour and pack animals wherever required. The announcement that the people of Kumaun will have a District and a Sessions Judge will give much satisfaction to the people and it is hoped that it will be followed by the complete separation of the civil and criminal administration now vested in one officer.

II.—Afghanistan and Trans-Frontier.

17. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th October, referring to a recent raid by a band of frontier tribesmen on a rich Hindu of Peshawar, says that the Government should either take special measures for the protection of its subjects on the frontier or should exempt them from the operations of the Arms Act so that they may keep arms in self-defence, otherwise British peace has no significance for them.

19. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 1st November, referring to the prosecution of the Bande Mataram (Calcutta), remarks :—

The Bande Mataram and sedition cases.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 1st November 1908.

"In these Government prosecutions the most unsatisfactory feature is that the element of uncertainty is entirely absent and it is the easiest thing in the world to foretell the result of a trial. If a newspaper is prosecuted for sedition, sedition it is and a conviction follows in due course. As we have more than once pointed out the same legal advisers are prone to error in their opinions in other cases but they are infallible in political cases. That is why public approval to the results of these trials is becoming so rare."

20. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 1st November, notes with satisfaction the proposal of the Punjab Chief Court that a sum of money should be set apart for engaging counsel to defend destitute persons charged with capital crimes, and remarks :—

Defence of the distitute.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 1st November 1908.

"We believe that a fund like this is essentially needed, and that if instituted it will very much enhance the prestige of British justice. But we have been so often disappointed in our expectations and ideals that we may perhaps be excused if we venture to note that we trust that such a fund will be really available to all poor people without any qualification of colour and that the Judges will in all cases distribute their patronage with an even hand. In this connection we beg to ask whether it would not be practicable for young gentlemen practising law in these provinces to create a brotherhood in every district just to see that in cases of serious offences no man should go without help of the profession for establishing his innocence. It would not really be difficult to find out whether or not a man is really needy. It is of course true that any movement of the kind suggested is liable to meet with opposition from those who are said to be the guardians of our life and property. Yet we think the idea is noble and that there may be found young Indian gentlemen who have learnt to put the relief of suffering before any considerations of personal gain and convenience."

Police reform.

21. The Samrat (Kalakankar), of the 20th August (received on the 31st October), suggests, with a view to the reforming of police administration, that police officials should be punished when cases filed by them are proved to be got up, just as an ordinary person is prosecuted when he brings a false and malicious charge against another and cannot satisfactorily establish it by evidence.

22. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 1st November, has the following comments on the complaint made by the Vedic Magazine (Punjab), regarding the shadowing of an emissary of the Gurukul, Hardwar to Delhi by the detective police :—

"Extracts from the Vedic Magazine and Gurukul Samachar about police activity on the detective line will be read with interest. We say there can be no greater blunder than prying into such non-political movements as the Gurukul. The presence of detectives creates bitterness of feelings and intensifies discontent. By all means suspects should be watched, but what is the good of watching the movements of harmless men whom nobody, unless he is insane, can suspect of carrying bombs in their pockets. Fancy an elderly Bengali gentleman, accompanied by three ladies, two servants and some children with two cartloads of luggage, asked at a railway station the place from where he had come and where he was likely to go. All Bengalis are not bomb-throwers and the police should have sufficient intelligence to know that any member of the anarchist gang is not likely to travel in the Punjab or the United Provinces with his family and heavy luggage."

Municipal authorities and malaria.

24. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 24th October, complains of the want of proper supervision on the part of the municipal authorities of the shops selling native drugs, vegetables, ghi and milk. The adulteration of articles of food, remarks the editor, is one of the chief causes of the malaria which is working so much havoc just now in these provinces.

RAHBAR, 28th October 1908.

The Octroi Committee.

25. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th October, has the following :—

"Government has appointed a committee to consider whether municipalities should be retained or abolished. The reason why they now hesitate to water the sapling which was planted by Lord Ripon is that the policy which His Lordship wanted to follow has been given up. If it is decided to abolish the municipalities (?) some other tax will then be imposed. Be this as it may, the people cannot be satisfied until their representatives are given a free hand in spending the revenue collected from the country. It is however quite a different matter when

'The tyrant smites his subject down,
Nor lets his victims moan or groan.' "

26. The Mufid-i-Ám (Agra), of the 1st November, notes with satisfaction the contemplated abolition of octroi duties, but thinks that it would be more advisable to deal at first with direct taxation, such as water-rates, &c., which are more obnoxious to the people than octroi taxes. The editor thinks that the imposition of a tax on persons entering the municipal limits by rail may be safely given a trial.

27. The Vyápári and Kárígar (Benares), of the 1st November, considers the imposition of one anna per head on pilgrims coming to Benares unjust, inasmuch as pilgrims are also taxed when they pay octroi on articles bought in Benares. The editor further expresses his surprise at Government's according its sanction to the imposition, considering that this will be looked upon by the people as an interference with their religion, a point that Government has probably overlooked.

28. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 1st November, complains that the local students in the Sanskrit College, Benares, who have been hitherto exempt from the payment of fees have been made to pay fees for various examinations. This, the editor thinks, is calculated to discourage the study of Sanskrit instead of fostering it and should be discontinued.

29. In a note on "Indian Students", the editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), in the issue of the 3rd November, recommends the introduction of the time-honoured and excellent system of sound religious training which should begin, not in school, but at home, as one of the remedies for the evil that prevails at present among Indian students. He says "to expect the Government of any country to take this solemn duty off the hands of parents and to transfer it to schoolmasters is not only a great mistake but entails a problem beset with grave difficulties. How can the British Government, for instance, impart religious instruction of any kind to schoolboys? Its schools are full of Hindus of various denominations, Buddhists, Parsis, Muhammadans, Christians, &c. It is practically impossible for the Government to devise any scheme of religious education that would please the adherents of so many different creeds."

30. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 1st November, has the following comments on the recent famine resolution of the United Provinces Government: –

ADVOCATE, 1st November 1908.

The Famine resolution.

"Sir John Prescott Hewett's review of the measures taken for the relief of distress on account of the famine just over forms the subject of a voluminous resolution, dated the 14th October 1908. The story of the organization, progress, termination and results of relief operations carried out in the famine area during 1907-8 is one that may justly be described as a serious campaign against an invisible but very powerful enemy whose blow is as unerring as blighting. And such an enemy was practically maimed and disabled and so rendered unfit for doing any harm by the very readiness of the Government to meet all its insidious moves; the preparations of the Lieutenant Governor were generally ahead of the requirements throughout the prevalence of the distress. This fact was proved by the absence of aimless wandering and migrations in large bodies, less rise in crimes, comparatively good public health and no great increase in the death rate. The best evidence of the success of Sir John Hewett's measures lies in the rapidity with which the country resumed its normal condition and we are assured that the prospects of recuperation for the area affected are most hopeful. Nothing is indeed more satisfactory than this assurance.

A calamity of such dimensions might well unman the strongest nerves in any person. But Sir John Hewett rose equal to the occasion and faced the problem with a determination to find a solution for it."

The condition of the peasants.

32. A correspondent of the Hindustani (Lucknow), writing in the issue of the 4th November, remarks that the condition of the zamindars and of the peasants is equally deplorable nowadays. With the failure of rain last year both classes have been reduced to a state of utter helplessness and this year, too, they are not able to reap what little they could produce, owing to malaria, which is so prevalent in the villages. In addition to all this the payment of the revenue is constantly confronting them like a nightmare, and poor fellows! they do not know how to survive their many troubles. May God and the Government take mercy upon them.

Grievances of the subordinates of the office of the Examiner of Public Works Accounts, United Provinces.

33. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 1st November, has the following :—

"We have received a long letter from the subordinates of the Public Works Accounts office, Allahabad, containing many complaints against Mr. Swetenham, the present Examiner. We know that there is a deal of dissatisfaction in the Examiner's Office and we are told that many clerks found it so difficult to work under Mr. Swetenham, that they retired prematurely and some of them went on long leave to take the earliest opportunity to retire. This has led the office work to run into arrears. The list of the grievances sent to us is long, the language in which they are couched shows how the subordinates feel bitterly. We . . . . . hope that an inquiry will forthwith be instituted. Our correspondent writes :—

'The subordinates pray that an inquiry should be made into their grievances. Let us hope this will be done and the just grievances of hard-worked subordinates removed. The stories of hard treatment accorded to poorer employés in Government offices soon reach the mass of the people and create bitterness, which it should be the concern of every good officer to see entirely removed.'"

Gambling.

35. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 3rd November, notes with satisfaction the prompt action of the Magistrate of Cawnpore in arresting several respectable persons of the place while engaged in gambling, among whom were many "city fathers."

Educated persons should help the Government and its officials in the suppression of gambling, as it is condemned by all religions, and persons who assure the officials that it has become a part of religion are deceiving and should be seriously dealt with by God.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 5th November 1908.

The Cawnpore gambling case.

36. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 5th November, makes the following observations on the Cawnpore gambling case :—

"This case, of which only vague accounts have appeared in the press, was to be heard by the Joint Magistrate of Cawnpore on the 3rd instant. A large number of persons, including municipal commissioners, honorary magistrates and others, are accused of gambling and keeping a gambling house without a license. All attempts at a compromise have failed, and those who prayed to be allowed to appear by pleaders have been called upon to plead guilty. In reality the matter was nothing more serious than the usual Dewali gambling and a number of respectable people will be punished without cause. Gambling during the Dewali is permitted everywhere. If the accused in the Cawnpore case are guilty, what about the clubs at which gambling goes on night after night throughout the year?"

37. The Surma-i-Rozgar (Agra), of the 24th October, after presenting a comparative statement of the goods imported and exported into and out of India during the years 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906 and 1907, comes to the conclusion that the export has increased considerably, but the increase represents only raw products which subsequently come back to the country in the shape of manufactured goods. This consequently means ultimate loss to the country.

SURMA-I-ROZGAR, 24th October 1908.

The Trade figures of 1907.

The editor therefore exhorts his countrymen to invest their capital in starting mills and factories where they can most advantageously utilize the raw products which they at present send to foreign countries.

38. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 24th October, remarks that Hindus have been accused of accepting illegal gratifications more frequently than Muhammadans. This, says the editor, is an additional reason why Muhammadans should be admitted into every department of the Government on a larger scale.

39. The editor of the Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), writing in the issue of the 24th October, remarks that the number of persons attending charitable dispensaries would be much increased if only compounders and assistant surgeons could afford to be more polite to their patients. They are usually careless and irritable, and their conduct deserves the serious attention of the Government.

40. The editor of the Surma-i-Rozgar (Agra), writing in the issue of the 24th October, thanks the Government for the various measures adopted to relieve the sufferings of the poor due to famine and malaria in the United Provinces. The editor also notes with gratification the favourable attitude of Sir John Hewett towards the swadeshi movement.

41. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th October, notes that it is rumoured that the District Magistrate of Fatehgarh does not allow the establishment of any press in his district. A press was sent for by a number of persons a short time ago, but the Magistrate on hearing of this sent for these persons and the result of his interview with them was that the press was never set up.

42. In a note on the causes of Indian poverty, the editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), in the issue of the 30th October, says that the lamentably extravagant expenditure of even the poorest classes on the occasion of marriages and funerals is one of the causes of the prevailing poverty among the "working" or lower classes in India, for the simple reason that they borrow money from professional money-lenders at a most exorbitant rate of interest. In this connection he observes that "the Government is also to blame for allowing money-lenders to extort such exorbitant rates of interest, and legislation permitting only reasonable rates of interest is urgently needed. What is a reasonable rate of interest may be a matter for discussion; but 12 per cent. per annum should not be exceeded.

HINDOSTHAN, 30th October 1908.

Causes of Indian poverty.

Intimately connected with this question is the newly-introduced system of co-operative credit societies. We note that the Lucknow branch of one of these societies is offering 8 per cent. per annum to any one who will invest his money with them. As the object of co-operative credit societies in India is to help the Indian agriculturist when he is in financial difficulties and to save him from the clutches of the money-lender, every patriotic Indian should actively assist these excellent societies by advancing them money or by any other means in his power."

43. One Ram Lal, writing to the Jain Gazette (Deoband), of the 1st November, remarks that most of the articles of foreign manufacture are impure as they contain ingredients that, if known, could not but wound the religious susceptibilities of Indians. He urges that Indians should therefore give up using or dealing in foreign goods and consume home-made articles as a means of protecting their religion and keeping money in the country.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 1st November 1908.

Is an honest newspaper possible ?

44. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 1st November, has the following under the marginally noted heading :—

" Political education in this country is just beginning. Schools and colleges and other ordinary institutions for public education eschew politics as dangerous to public morality. But if Indians are to exist as a nation, if Indians are to rise in the scale of being and to restore to their country to any extent its former glory in arts, manufactures, literature, philosophy and morality, political education cannot be tabooed. Success in politics raises prestige; success in politics is reflected as success in every other way in every other department of national existence. A nation politically dead, is dead also in every other respect. In this country people have not learnt as yet to read the newspaper for what they expect to find in it. The saying is still true here that the newspaper-reading public is largely of newspaper creation. The most important function of a newspaper in this country therefore is the political education of the people, the creation of an honest and sturdy public opinion on matters of vital public interest. A glance at the ethics of our present-day journalism, at its endless abuse, its premium on dishonesty, and its hopeless inefficiency in respect of the denial of a fair hearing to an opposite party which in effect is tantamount to a denial of bare justice will disclose what we really mean. An incessant effort to promulgate one's own ideas without a fair regard to what another person has got to say in an opposite way may be good policy, but we cannot call it honest. Everything is fair in love and war has its limitations. It is true that the policy and behaviour of the Anglo-Indian bureaucracy are more than often exasperating, and harsh and unnecessarily so. Yet there may be the element of right in them, and the knowledge that our adversaries are wrong is no defence for our being unjust. But all these considerations make the editor's task more peculiarly difficult. The question therefore arises how is the editor to conduct himself. Will he tell the truth ? Is it necessary for him to tell the truth ? Is it possible for him to tell the truth ? Our people as well as our rulers certainly want to be told the truth, and God knows they never needed it so much. But can a newspaper in these days tell the public the plain, unvarnished and unflattering truth and exist or pay its way ? The executive authorities may find it necessary either to gag it or to put it altogether out of existence and the readers may also, on the other side, grow petulant and cease to subscribe for it. Some fiend of an editor would warn him not to tell the truth in every case. Tell the truth, but tell the truth that is palatable. You had rather not tell the truth that is unpalatable. This may be sound policy, or good diplomacy, but certainly not sturdy honesty. A politic newspaper would therefore be one thing and the honest newspaper its diametrically opposite. Truth under certain circumstances is very unpleasant and a section of the British people are very sensitive to criticism. It asks for criticism, but really wants and expects a compliment. It is a very unpopular thing to say, but it certainly is, at least superficially, a good editorial policy to ascribe all our blessings to England's sending her sons out to rule over us. And if any editor, for any consideration, cannot do this, he must content himself with paying general compliments. He would do well to employ all his energies to avoid friction. But that would again scarcely be honesty. It is therefore plain that what we would call an honest newspaper must also be independent. It must be rich in two other qualities, that is to say, it must be popular (not, of course, in the sense of pandering to the taste of the mob) and authoritative. It must not be a voice crying in the wilderness, nor one smothered under a blanket of self-conscious rectitude or choked with childish spite and petulance. It must make itself widely heard. It must speak as one with authority, putting certain axiomatic principles of politics, economics and morals as assumed and sealed before it for its guidance. 'Our constitution provides for three distinct functions of government,—legislative, judicial and executive, and it is the duty of what is correctly called, in England, the fourth state of the realm, to provide the fourth necessity, healthy criticism for all three.' A newspaper can only watch where corrupt legislation can be defeated, and it must be satisfied when it has pointed this out. It can also, as one of the most valuable checks, give the fullest publicity to judicial vagaries or arbitrary acts of executive officers. But the information must be correct and reliable and the motive of action the good to public morality and not the satisfaction of spite or private grudge."

Ministerial establishments of Civil Courts.

45. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 3rd November, draws the attention of the Government towards the deplorable condition of the clerks in the Civil Courts. Very few of them, says the editor, can aspire to a salary of Rs. 50 even at the close of a very long service. The prices of foodstuffs have considerably increased during the last decade as also have the wages of artizans and other workmen. But clerks have still to subsist on miserable pittances. The Government has taken into consideration the grievances of the Simla clerks and the telegraphists and it is high time, says the editor, that the grievances of these clerks should also be looked into.

MASHRIQ, 3rd November 1908.

Naib tahsildars.

46. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 3rd November, complains that the naib tahsildars in the United Provinces are extremely underpaid. As revenue and judicial officers they have to live very decently and consequently they find it very difficult to make both ends meet on a salary of Rs. 50 or Rs. 60 a month. The scale of their pay was fixed a long time ago when things were very cheap and the standard of life was not so high. The editor thinks that the initial salary of a naib tahsildar should be Rs. 100.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 3rd November 1908.

Sub-Registrars.

47. A correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 4th November, makes the following suggestions for improving the status of sub-registrars :—

HINDUSTANI, 4th November 1908.

"(1) That sub-registrars should be vested with the powers of an honorary munsif and they should be considered gazetted officers as is the case in the Punjab and Bengal.

(2) That they should again be authorized to nominate clerks from their offices to officiate for them during their absence on leave.

(3) That they should be given authority to grant casual leave to their subordinates on occasions of emergency.

(4) That the sub-registrars concerned should be consulted in the matter of the appointment of clerks.

(5) That as sub-registrars are in no way inferior to tahsildars in point of social status, they should therefore not be required to furnish securities.

(6) That the power to inspect registration offices should be taken away from tahsildars, as there are already too many inspecting officers.

(7) That the most important suggestion is the one concerning the peons. Sub-registrars should have their own peons instead of tahsil chaprasis.

(8) That registration offices should be provided with pankhas, pankha coolies, clocks, table cloths, office boxes and other such furniture of daily use.

The Bengal and North-Western Railway bridge at Allahabad.

48. The Citizen (Allahabad), of the 1st November, has the following from a correspondent:—

CITIZEN, 1st November 1908.

"A single bridge is going to be constructed over the Ganges at Allahabad for the B. and N.-W. Railway trains, which will run from Allahabad to Benares. The public would be immensely benefited and a substantial advantage would also accrue to the Government if the bridge to be constructed be a double one, viz. having rails above and a roadway for passengers and carts below. It is a warm rumour that the Government is going to lay out a large sum for a pakka Road from Phapamau to Sarai Enayat (Allahabad) obviously to afford facility to regimental troops (with artillery) in their parade en route the Grand Trunk Road. Now a double bridge would sufficiently meet this object of the Government and the construction of the aforesaid pakka road would no longer be a desideratum. Moreover, the necessity of constructing yearly a boat bridge over the Ganges from Daraganj to Jhusi and a road along the Ganges kachhar (alluvial tract) for travellers and cart traffic would also be done away with. Such a bridge would also be of great utility to revenue officers with their furniture while they are on their tours of inspection to trans-Gangetic parganas of the Allahabad district.

From Jhusi and its neighbouring villages, myriads of dairymen and day labourers come to Allahabad and after making their daily earnings go back home again. The boat bridge over the Ganges between Jhusi and Daraganj which exists from November to June very often suffers dislocation in its parts and these poor persons have to wait long while the bridge is being rectified. The same happens to be the case during the rainy season when winds blow adversely and detain the boats conveying them over the swollen Ganges. All this results in the deprivation of their daily earnings and wages. To them, as also to European gentlemen who go out a-shooting from Allahabad to Sarai Enayat and its vicinity, the existence of a double bridge would prove a veritable boon. Besides, the climate of the site across the Ganges on the other side of Daraganj is very salubrious and a double bridge would tempt many a person to take a drive to regale themselves, especially at the fine Jhusi dharamsala gardens of Lalas Kishorilal and brothers. It is hoped the authorities concerned will think over the matter and also the fact that both the Jumna and Phapamau bridges are of double superstructure, although the roads lying beyond them are not so much frequented as the Grand Trunk Road at Daraganj and Jhusi, where the B. and N.-W. Railway bridge is going to be constructed."

49. The Awáza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 1st November, severely condemns the Hon'ble Tikka Saheb's proposal for legalizing marriages between Sikhs and non-Sikhs (?) which proposal, he thinks, is put forward in the interests of the European wives of the Maharajas of Kapurthala and Jhind. He is afraid that if such marriages are recognized all the Native States will pass to the descendants of foreign women.

1. Al Bashír (Etawah), of the 3rd November, notes with regret the mischievous attempts of Austria to interfere with the granting of reforms by the Turkish Government, and remarks that Germany too who hitherto has posed as a friend of Turkey, has sided with Austria with a view to perpetuating an act which has scandalized the whole of Europe. The editor, however, hopes that England will continue to be a sincere friend and ally of Turkey, and thus regain the influence which she lost owing to the prejudiced and short-sighted policy of Mr. Gladstone.

AL BASHIR, 3rd November 1908.

Turkey, Austria and England.

2. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 5th November, referring to the determination of the Turks to boycott Austrian-made caps, remarks that this movement will not stop even if Austria gives up the contested territories. Bengal too, the writer notes, had recourse to boycott as a protest against the partition, but he thinks it unlikely that, if the partition be withdrawn, the movement will be given up. The editor expresses the opinion that, though the methods of the Bengalis are being imitated in Afghanistan, Persia and in Turkey, substantial benefit is possible only if the whole nation takes the movement seriously to heart and invests its capital in starting factories under trained and experienced supervision in which way national progress and advancement may be expected.

OUDH AKHBAR, 5th November 1908.

Boycott in Turkey.

He anticipates complications because selfishness and prejudice on the part of those affected by the swadeshi movement will result in their putting all sorts of obstacles in its way which, nevertheless, will fail to check the movement. He inquires whether the Muhammadans of India, who have imitated the Turks in using Turkish caps, will give them up now that the Turks have boycotted them?

3. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 14th November, referring to the rumoured encroachment of Russia on Persia, remarks that this should not come as a surprise to those who have been watching the trend of events in Persia and the growing estrangement between the Shah and his subjects a little closely. There is yet time, says the editor, to save the situation, and all well-wishers of Persia hope that the Shah will now realize the necessity of granting a free parliament to the Persians.

OUDH AKHBAR, 14th November 1908.

Russia and Persia.

The editor, adverting to the movement for industrial development in different countries, observes that this is destined to transform the political life of Asia as it has already done in Europe, on the ground that commercial supremacy is essential to political predominance.

(b)—Home.

4. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 5th November, while commenting on the King's message, remarks that, though Government is not itself responsible for the frequent occurrences of famines, nor for the ravages of plague, yet it is within its power to make the people better fitted to resist their onslaughts by the diffusion of education and by increasing the material prosperity of the people.

OUDH AKHBAR, 5th November 1908.

The King's message.

He asks that the promised reforms be announced soon as the people have waited patiently and as their expectations have been revived by the gracious promise of the King-Emperor.

5. Reviewing the King's message, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 6th November, says that it shows that His Majesty the King-Emperor has the same feeling of affection and mercy and the same solicitude for their good as the late Queen Victoria had towards her Indian subjects, and that the knowledge of this fact will gratify them highly and make them grateful to His Majesty. The editor, however, notes that the Proclamation Day and the message did not produce so much enthusiasm as they ought to have done, and ascribes this in main to the indifference of the authorities

ABHYUDAYA, 6th November 1908.

The King's message.

towards the celebration of the occasion, and also because the message lacks the tone and the feeling of generosity which pervade the old Proclamation. He notes that some sentiments are missing which might have been included in the message, and that some matter at the close of the message had better not have found entry, or at least have been worded differently, but he remarks that for this His Majesty cannot be blamed and that the responsibility for it rests on those ministers who framed the message.

He further observes that, though much progress has been made in the last fifty years, yet much remains to be done to ameliorate the condition of the masses, and expresses the hope that in the proposed reforms steps will be taken to equalize the position of Indians and Europeans in every respect and to fulfil more literally the promises made in the Proclamation of the late Queen Victoria.

MUSAFIR, 8th November 1908.

The King's message.

6. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 8th November, holds that the Proclamation, although purporting to emanate from His Majesty the King-Emperor, is really a product of Lord Morley's mind. Here was an opportunity, remarks the editor, of winning the peoples' heart, which was not availed of, and the result is a feeling of general disappointment.

ADVOCATE, 8th November 1908.

The King's message.

7. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 8th November, has the following:—

"The people of India from the time when the announcement was made that His Imperial Majesty the King-Emperor was going to address a message to his loyal subjects, waited with anxious interest for its deliverance. The words which have fallen from the lips of their Sovereign have been read with feelings of gratitude and affection. The people know the interest which their Sovereign and members of the Royal family feel in their welfare and the reiteration of that feeling of affection for the people could not but evoke a feeling of gratitude.

The language used in the message does not bear comparison with that of the great Proclamation of Queen Victoria. It does not touch the core of the heart, nor does it appeal to popular sentiments. As to the contents it must be admitted that one does not find in it any new thing. It contains a forecast of what is to come in the future, but makes no definite pronouncement to make the 2nd November of 1908 as memorable in the annals of India as is the 1st day of November in 1858. It is true, as the Statesman points out, the circumstances in which the present royal message has been sent to us are quite different from those which preceded the issue of Queen Victoria's Proclamation and nothing very striking could be said; but we must say that it was possible to have touched the feeling and sentiment of the Oriental mind. The significance of the document will increase with the publication of the details of the reform scheme. Who knows that while Queen Victoria's Proclamation laid open the doors of the services to the sons of the soil without consideration of caste and creed, King Edward's Proclamation may open the doors of the Government of the country to the people.

As pointed out by the Indian Daily News for the first time, the principle of development in a democratic direction has been placed in a State document, and the introduction of representative institutions, which we have been tired of hearing even from some responsible officers of the Government as unsuited to the soil of India, promised and assured to us. If the royal wishes are carried out by His Majesty's officers, then the draft of Lord Morley will be historic and looked upon as the Magna Charta of popular rights, as much as is the draft of Lord Derby which had conveyed the motherly feelings of a Queen towards her people whose destinies it had pleased Providence to place in her hands."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 8th November 1908.

The King's message.

8. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 8th November, inquires what is amiss with the King-Emperor's message.

"It seems to have fallen very flat on the country: the chorus of disappointment is general, while the scathing criticism of the Pioneer has come as a great surprise. That paper assumes Lord Morley to be the real author of the message, and treats it as a travesty of a parliamentary speech. It would be a poor compliment to Lord Morley's literary powers if he were the real writer of this document, for it contrasts very unfavourably with the stately cadence of the Queen's Proclamation of 1858 and its fine literary style. Of the King's personal sentiments and his affectionate solicitude for the people of India we all have ample assurance, but it is disappointing to find that His Majesty cannot even anticipate his Minister in announcing the reforms under consideration. The grant of amnesty to political prisoners would have been a wise measure, but it has not been taken, and the release of a number of other prisoners will not produce any remarkable effect. In these circumstances, a feeling of disappointment is unavoidable for the King-Emperor's message to the Indian people asked them to look forward for the rosy dawn of a new era. In temperament the Indians are the best of optimists and to 'let the dead past bury its dead' does not for them require any very special resolution. We therefore very fondly hoped that since Justice has been amply vindicated, Mercy will now have its sway and the ghost of 'unrest' will be laid by appeasing Sentiment, although of a subject people. There is nothing in the message which could lead any one to apprehend that the remission of sentences therein referred to did not mean the liberation of some of the 'political' prisoners in the land. Indeed, if any section of the Indian people can lay a claim to any consideration, it is these 'political' prisoners whose actions, misguided though they may be, have contributed to foster the 'unrest' which has evoked this Sovereign pronouncement. Yet this general expectation has not been realized."

He then refers to the release of Babu Durga Mohan Sen, editor of the Barisal Hitaishi in Eastern Bengal and that of the Brahman student named Karve of the Sassoon Hospital, who was recently sentenced by the Sessions Judge of Poona under the new Explosives Act, and remarks as follows :—" In our part of the country the atmosphere has not yet cleared. We expected that some mercy will be shown to the half-witted Mukerji of Aligarh and that the editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla will be allowed the grace of the Royal clemency. But we have been greeted by the sad news that on Tuesday last the Government Advocate had to file a complaint in the Court of the District Magistrate, Allahabad, charging Babu Ram Hari, editor, printer and publisher of the Swarajya, with sedition in respect of two articles entitled, respectively, 'Bomb and Boycott' and 'The Tyrant,' and a political ode which had appeared in that paper. This will probably close the gates of mercy to Shanti Narayan, the late editor of the paper, who is already in jail.

Another part of the message asks us to contain ourselves with patience in regard to the proposed reforms. In this respect also have our hopes been deferred. Several forecasts of what shape these reforms may take have already appeared in the press and people are discussing them on every side. Expectation has been intense on all sides for an official pronouncement. But now Reuter tells us that Lord Morley is unable to make his statement on the 17th instant as previously announced. Nothing can be known, it appears, before the 12th of December, for further reference to India has become necessary. Is it to find out how the Royal Message has been received? Well, to us Indians this disappointment is simply one of a series."

9. The Jadd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 9th November, while commenting on the King's message, remarks that it would be highly improper on the part of any person to criticise it, but one cannot refrain from saying that the message would have been more welcome if an amnesty had been granted to all political offenders who had exceeded the bounds of law in a fit of temporary frenzy brought on by years of patient suffering. The editor further says that the message is mainly addressed to the educated classes, and there is nothing said about the toiling, suffering millions to whom the least alleviation of their sufferings would have been welcome.

The King's message.

JADD-O-JEHAD, 9th November 1908.

10. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 10th November, referring to the proclamation recently issued by His Majesty the King-Emperor, remarks that it will have a far-reaching effect in allaying popular discontent and in reassuring the public mind. The editor expresses his gratification at the promises of reforms, and prays for the permanence of British rule in India.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 5th November 1908.

The Darbar at Bareilly.

11. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 5th November, has the following :—

"It is a matter of extreme gratification that by the royal grace of the British Government we were favoured, through the regular channel, with a ticket to attend the magnificent Darbar held at Bareilly. We received the ticket with the honour and respect due to it and thanked the Government for its kindness. With the exception of the editor of the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), no other newspaper editor was afforded an opportunity to be present. But unfortunately we fell ill on the auspicious occasion and could not attend the Darbar. However, we are deeply grateful for the graciousness of the Government, and acknowledge that the district authorities watch over the services of every individual, appreciate them and reward them."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 12th November 1908.

His Honour at Bareilly.

13. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 12th November, has the following :—

"The Lieutenant Governor's speech at the Darbar at Bareilly on the 2nd instant deserves serious study by the public. There is a blending of a ring of sincerity with a tinge of sorrow at purposes misapprehended in His Honour's utterances which has made them more than ordinarily attractive. Above all the speech is bristling with facts and evidence of an honest effort made to meet every question squarely. Whether the reply given to the people of Kumaun in respect to their prayer for a high grade college at Almora has satisfied them, we cannot say. But the reasons advanced by His Honour for declining to open such a college there are sufficiently convincing and strong. There is another reason which might have been added, and it is that our Kumaun friends cannot fairly ask every thing given to them at their homes. They have a tendency to grow exclusive in their fastness and ought to come out more amongst us and in a larger number every year. An ardent desire for higher education only has hitherto been bringing them to the plains. We are glad that the Government has been thinking favourably of their prayer for bringing Kumaun under the North-Western Provinces High Court in civil matters also. We support this prayer for reasons noted in these columns not long ago. We cannot, however, understand why His Honour should have asked our friends to establish a hostel at Allahabad. Will not Bareilly be the best place? The climatic difference will not be so marked there and it will be nearer home to the students. Moreover, the gloomy picture of the future of the college there, as given by His Honour should, we believe, be a further reason why Bareilly should receive most of the support that Kumaun can give. For students in opulent circumstances Allahabad will be, as it now is, always available."

FITNA, 11th November 1908.

Attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser.

14. The Fitna (Gorakhpur), of the 11th November, while referring to the dastardly attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser, remarks that this incident is the first of its kind, at least so far as educated Indians are concerned. This, the editor says, is a bad omen which foreshadows much disaster to the country. He attributes all blame to the Calcutta Police for having neglected, in spite of their knowledge of the feelings of the Bengalis, to take sufficient precautions on such an occasion. The editor, in conclusion, congratulates Sir Andrew Fraser and the Maharaja of Burdwan on their miraculous escape.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 12th November 1908.

Attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser.

15. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), while commenting on the attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser in the issue of the 12th November, remarks :—

"Nevertheless, matters have come to such a pass that at every public function and every public meeting at which high officials may be present an assassin armed with a bomb or a loaded revolver may be lurking. This state of things is intolerable. Cold-blooded murder is so foreign to the nature of the Bengali that the appearance of homicidal fanaticism among them appears incredible. What, however, if the poison were to spread to other provinces? The precautions that have hitherto been taken are penal rather than preventive, but mere punishment has not put an end to the terrorist movement. Loyal demonstrations have been equally useless. The revolutionary spirit has pervaded the new generation throughout the country. What is wanted is to convince young men that mere murder never leads to independence and it is not by assassination that the destiny of India will be fulfilled. The fervid expressions of horror and indignation have not stayed the arm of the terrorist, or made him desist from his fell purpose. Rather let us ask, has any effective appeal been made to the intellect and patriotism of young Indians to dissociate themselves from all organizations of crime and murder?"

Attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser.

16. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 13th November, condemns most emphatically the dastardly attempt on Sir Andrew Fraser, and remarks that such abominable practices are not only contrary to the religion of Indians but are also injurious to the peaceful regeneration of the country. Indians can never achieve their object by the employment of brute force. They should mainly depend upon their moral and religious instincts, and should practice self-sacrifice in doing good to their countrymen rather than take the lives of foreigners.

ABHYUDAYA, 13th November 1908.

Indian unity.

17. The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for November, contains an article on Indian unity from the pen of Mr. Mujib-ur Rahman, editor of the Mussalman (Calcutta). He remarks that the political and economic salvation of India depends on the co-operation and united efforts of the different communities inhabiting the country, while he recognizes the immense differences in the beliefs, traditions and temperaments of the various communities, and their mutual antipathies which render united action well-nigh impossible. He expresses satisfaction at the laudable efforts made by a few zealous persons to promote cordiality between the Hindus and Musalmans, but deplores that their efforts are counteracted by the growing tension between the two races, and proceeds to enumerate several causes of the growing aloofness between them, confining his observations to Bengal.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, November 1908.

Indian Musalmans and the Congress.

18. Mr. C. D. Nayar of the Mysore Mail, in an article on the educational and political aspirations of the Indian Musalmans in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for November, after eulogizing the work done by the Muhammadan Educational Conference, laments the systematic opposition of the Musalmans to the Indian National Congress, and urges them to support it, as it is now purged of its extremist elements. He lays particular stress on the fact that they are Indians first and Musalmans afterwards, and so must join in a movement which, he maintains, is for the good of all the people of India.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, November 1908.

Hindus and Musalmans.

19. A correspondent of the Aligarh Institute Gazette, writing in the issue of the 11th November, remarks that there is a vast difference between the conditions obtaining in Turkey and those in India, seeing that, though Turkey is peopled by various races, they are nearly of the same character and temperament and their gradual fusion is possible, while the large Moslem majority will be able to keep in check all troublesome minorities. In India the case is entirely different, there are two communities whose influence is nearly balanced, but the Hindus far outnumber the Musalmans. Under these circumstances it is necessary that a third power should rule over them to maintain the balance of power. The extension of local self-government in a country like India would not be desirable in the interests of justice and orderly development unless the interests of the minority, i.e. the Musalmans, are safeguarded. The Government must at all costs maintain its majority and allot to the Hindus and Musalmans an equal number of seats on all representative bodies, to prevent friction.

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, November 1908.

Indian National Congress.

20. The Jadd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 2nd November, remarks that now when it is almost certain that the Congress will be held in Madras this year, it is quite time for district committees to elect their delegates for the coming session. But there are certain districts which possess no district committees at all. It would be better, therefore, suggests the editor, if Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru of Allahabad and other leaders of the province go about touring in such districts and exhort the people to form their district committees at an early date.

JADD-O-JEHAD, 2nd November 1908.

AL BASHIR, 3rd November 1908.

"Causes of the unrest during the year 1907-8."

21. In continuation of his article headed "Causes of the Unrest During the Year 1907-8" (vide Selections No. 44, current, paragraph 10), the editor of Al Bashír (Etawah), writing in the issue of the 3rd November, proceeds to prove that Bahadur Shah did not actively oppose the barbarous conduct of the mutineers, simply because he was afraid of losing his own life. To this end, the editor quotes at length from a book entitled "Maharba-i-Azim" and argues that Bahadur Shah was merely a puppet in the hands of the rebels, whose actions he could not oppose without endangering his own safety.

SAMRAT, 5th September 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

22. The Samrát (Kalakankar), of the 5th September (received on the 14th November), expresses regret at the indifference of the Imperial Government in the matter of the ill-treatment of its Indian subjects in the Transvaal, which the editor characterizes as a standing reproach to the British sense of justice. He, however, hopes that the just British Government will take such steps as will put an end to the ill-treatment of Indians in the colonies, and thereby strengthen their feelings of gratitute and loyalty to it.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 5th November 1908.

Students and politics.

23. Mr. Hamid Ali Khan, Barrister-at-Law, of Lucknow, in a letter to the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 5th November, while discussing the question whether students in colleges should be allowed to discuss political questions or not, remarks that as a result of the liberal education imparted to them, if they be not allowed to express freely their opinions on current events, they will do it sooner or later and in a more boisterous fashion, whereas if they are allowed the privilege, their superiors may be able to correct any erroneous views they may have. The cultivation of healthy and wholesome political opinions among the students must, he says, be a most important duty of the teachers.

CAWNPORE GAZETTE, 8th November 1908.

The wave of liberty.

24. The Cawnpore Gazette, of the 8th November, has the following:—

"Times are fast changing. The age of slavery is past, and the eyes of the people have been opened by the new light. The hitherto-slumbering world has awakened. Liberty has become a universal craze and every country, every nation, and every individual is struggling for it. The wave has spread from one end of the earth to the other. Turkey has attained freedom, which has given universal satisfaction to its people, and Bulgaria, acting in the same spirit, has declared itself independent of Turkey. The time has come when liberty would reign supreme in the world and it shall do so. The whole world is in a state of revolution and it is well nigh impossible to arrest the onward rush of this divine wave (of liberty)."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 8th November 1908.

India and Anglo-India.

25. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 8th November, has the following:—"The Indian mind fails to understand some of the peculiarities and idiosyncracies of the Anglo-Indians. Loyal no doubt the Anglo-Indians are to the British Government, as it is to their interest to be loyal, but their loyalty, at least to the Throne, is of a peculiar kind. The King-Emperor's Proclamation for instance, the new charter of the rights and liberties of Indians, is characterized by an Anglo-Indian paper as being 'thin, spiritless and superfluous'; expressions which the most seditious of Indian papers have not used. In fact the aims and aspirations of educated and enlightened India are based on this great charter. The reverence and respect with which these proclamations are held are well known. Whereas the want of reverence and the scant courtesy in the attitude of the Anglo-Indians towards these proclamations are as well known.

According to the account left on record by the late Sir William Russel, the late Queen's Proclamation was 'cold and spiritless.'

Now may we—we who are in season and out of season suspected of sedition—ask whether such expressions are quite respectful to the Throne? Invariably in every case in which Indians have been sent to jail for seditious writings and seditious speeches, the complaint has always been against bureauracy and never against the person of the Sovereign. In fact it would seem as if Anglo-India can commit no wrong—can commit no sedition.

As an instance the editor refers to the paragraph that appeared about the approver's murder in an Anglo-Indian paper and remarks that an Indian paper in Calcutta is in trouble for writing a few articles in a similar view on the same subject. He says it is not for us to say that lip-loyalty may prevent people from, and self-interest may stand in their way of, giving expression to their feelings, but there is apparently nothing to prevent people from drawing their own inferences."

The Maharaja of Benares and the swadeshi movement.

26. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 8th November, severely criticises the letter of the Maharaja of Benares on the subject of swadeshi and boycott. The editor says that, if the Maharaja is so much opposed to boycott, he should have devoted his hoarded wealth to revive the dying industries of Benares and make it once more a great commercial centre.

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 8th November 1908.

In conclusion, the editor says that the Maharaja could have secured territorial rights (in his Family Domains) without trampling on the political aspirations of the middle classes.

The Arya Samaj and Government.

27. The Arya Mitra (Agra), of the 8th November, reports that at Arya Samaj meetings at Ganeshganj (Lucknow), Kairana (district Muzaffarnagar), Mawana and other places a translation of His Honour's speech delivered at Agra was read and Arya Samajists were exhorted to help the Government in stamping out anarchy and sedition from the country.

ARYA MITRA, 8th November 1908.

The Midnapur case.

28. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 12th November, has the following:—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 12th November 1908.

"When it was announced that the Advocate General had been placed in charge of the Midnapur case the end of the whole affair was in sight. Although a formidable prosecuting counsel, Mr. Sinha, has the reputation of being one of the fairest, and, when he saw that the police informer had completely turned, he did not lose much time in arriving at a decision. All the accused, except three, have been discharged on his application. Counsel for the Raja of Narajole protested that the prosecution had been started on an astonishing foundation of evidence of a man admittedly a drunken debauchee. That is the usual description of the average police informer: he comes from the scum of society, a man who spends his time between the jail and the police office, or is picked up from the gutter. And yet there is no man in the country who may not be deprived of his liberty and charged with the most serious offence on the statement of such an informer. The Raja of Narajole is among the wealthiest zamindars of Bengal, but he received the worst treatment of all the prisoners at Midnapur. While some others were let out on bail the Raja was guarded in his own house like a dangerous criminal. What must be the feelings of all these innocent men who were falsely implicated in an imaginary conspiracy? What are we to think of Mr. Weston and the other local officials? What, again, will the public think of the Judges of the High Court who refused to admit the prisoners to bail, though there was no evidence against them? The Midnapur case is an admirable illustration of how law-abiding people may be driven to disloyalty and active enmity."

Political crimes in Bengal.

29. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 12th November, severely condemns the attempt on the life of Sir A. Fraser and the murder of Inspector Nando Lall Bannerjee, and believes that a large and influential body of anarchists is responsible for these dastardly crimes. The editor proceeds to discuss the most feasible method of exterminating these criminals, and opines that it can be done by winning over the people to the side of the Government, so that the anarchists may be left without any support and thus be brought to justice. At the present crisis, he says, there will be a cry for repressive measures, but it would be more politic and statesmanlike on the part of the Government to consult the leaders of Indian opinion, and to concert measures to remove the tension of feeling between the two communities. Lord Morley, by postponing his reforms, is doing infinite injury to the country, as in the interests of peace they ought to be announced at once.

ADVOCATE, 12th November 1908.

In conclusion, the editor says :—

"We trust that these happily unsuccessful attempts on the life of the head of the Government of a large province will awaken them to their true sense of duty in the interests of the millions whose personal safety and honour are at stake."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 12th November 1908.

Indians abroad.

30. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 12th November, while referring to the intention of the Canadian authorities to expatriate British Indians in British Columbia to British Honduras, remarks :—

"And if the British Indians abroad cannot be helped in their troubles by the Imperial Government, it were perhaps best for all parties concerned to send the people back to their respective homes. In India we would welcome these labourers and mill-hands from British Columbia or, for the matter of that, from every other place where Indians have gone away to seek a livelihood. What with a steadily increasing demand for skilled hands for mills at the different industrial centres, and what with the growing scarcity of labourers for agricultural operations, a serious situation is developing in the country. Sturdy, honest and experienced Indians, who are fighting for principles and are seeking happiness realized only in dreams, would do well perhaps to come back to their native country at this juncture."

Feudatory Chiefs.

31. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th November, in a scathing criticism of the matrimonial alliances between Indian Chiefs and European ladies, remarks that this tendency on the part of Indian Chiefs is to be deprecated for all reasons, as leading to nothing but injury to their states. The editor notes with regret that Indian Chiefs are fast becoming mere pleasure-seekers, and holds out to them the glorious example of British officers who cannot find time to devote to their legitimate pleasures.

The Arya Samaj in Jodhpur.

32. The Árya Mitra (Agra), of the 8th November, says that the Secretary to the Arya Samaj, Jodhpur, received privately verbal orders from the Darbar through the police to remove the signboards from the Arya Lodge and the Arya Girls' School which are situated on the road by which His Excellency the Viceroy was to pass on the 1st November on his visit to Jodhpur, on pain of legal steps being taken against him in the event of non-compliance.

The editor remarks that he is not prepared to believe that such a step could be taken at the instance of His Excellency, but that it must have been done by the Darbar to parade its extreme loyalty in its own way.

He says that if the Jodhpur State really looks upon Arya Samajists in the light of robbers and dacoits, it will do well to order them to clear wholesale from its territories, and asks why, if this is not a fact, the Arya Samaj should be so humiliated. In conclusion he remarks that it is on account of such vagaries under native rule that the Arya Samaj is opposed to the idle dreams of swaraj, and impresses the necessity of first deserving and then desiring to realize that dream.

MUSAFIR, 31st October 1908.

Pandit Daulat Ram in jail at Jhansi.

33. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 31st October, publishes an article in which the writer notes with regret the lack of moral courage among the Arya Samajists of Jhansi, who thought it positively dangerous to stand sureties for Pandit Daulat Ram simply because the District Magistrate was opposed to it. Arrangement was however made, continues the writer, to furnish sureties from Agra, but the District Magistrate of Jhansi imposed conditions which made the sureties unacceptable so the Pandit is still in jail.

The writer then goes on to criticise certain portions of the judgment of the Magistrate, which, he says, is a remarkable example of the ignorance of local customs. The Magistrate apparently seems to think that it is a crime for an Arya Samajist, who is not a member of the local samaj, to deliver a speech in that samaj. Gross ignorance indeed! but the Magistrate has however done us a favour, the writer remarks, in expounding this new view of social propriety. The Pandit too should be thankful that such a crime has been dealt with so lightly.

As to his having no ostensible means of livelihood, the writer asks if it is not sufficient to say that Pandit Daulat Ram was supported by the generous public in lieu of the services he rendered to a charitable educational institution at Jhansi? But surely arguments are of no avail with our learned Magistrate —the acme of wisdom and commonsense.

Continuing the same article in the issue of the 8th November, the writer remarks that the learned Magistrate is inclined to think that to preach for or against any religion is also sedition, for he has said that those remarks are likewise objectionable which were directed against the Hindu religion. Strange conclusions these, especially when the Hindus themselves have never raised a voice in protest! If all the District Magistrates in the country were of the same way of thinking, there would be a regular havoc then.

The writer, in concluding, appeals to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor to exercise his discretion and to show mercy to the Pandit whose children are suffering owing to his being the only earning member of the family.

Political trials.

34. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th November, referring to the withdrawal of the case against the accused in the Midnapur conspiracy case, asks the Government if it is going to grant them any compensation for the troubles and anxieties they were put to in consequence of the institution of the case and remarks that, if not, he says, this will furnish a substantial cause for unrest.

RAHBAR, 7th November 1908.

Corporal Cullen's case.

35. Referring to the verdict of temporary insanity passed by the jury in the case of Corporal Cullen, who was accused of murdering a cart driver, the Musáfir (Agra), of the 8th November, remarks that one instance of justice administered in this way is calculated to excite feelings of hatred and sedition more than the vapourings of a thousand seditious newspapers.

MUSAFIR, November 1908.

Saiyid Fazl-ul Hasan.

36. The editor of the Mashriq (Gorakhpur), in the issue of the 10th November, remarks that Saiyid Fazl-ul Hasan had written to Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya to offer an apology on his behalf. This note was handed over to Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru who was appearing for the accused in the High Court. But owing to the unavoidable absence of Dr Sapru, the apology could not be tendered on the day when the case came up before the High Court. Considering these facts, the editor observes, the Government should exercise its prerogative and pardon the repentant offender.

37. Referring to the complaint published by the Gurukul Samachar regarding the shadowing of a Gurukul deputation by detectives, the Anand (Lucknow), in the combined issue for the 5th and 12th November, expresses surprise that detectives should be employed to watch the movements of preachers of religion and inquires why, if such a course is for any reason indispensable, capable detectives are not employed who, while successfully carrying out their duties, would in no way disclose their identity.

38. A correspondent writing to the Nasim-i-Agra (Agra), of the 7th November, complains that the Municipality of Agra has authorized its officials to collect water taxes in spite of the fact that appeals against the assessment are still pending disposal. This, remarks the writer, is quite unjustifiable and should be stopped. If the municipality is in want of funds it should curtail its expenses and retrench.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 8th November 1908.

The Sanitary Conference.

39. The following is an extract from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 8th November :—

"The question of regulating the construction and the re-construction of houses by private owners and of framing bye-laws to improve house construction has also been very fully discussed, and has given rise to the only serious difference of opinion between the Indian and other members of the Conference, not on a matter of principle but of administration. The majority of the Conference proposed that section 87 of the Municipalities Act should be amended so as to give the municipal authorities greater power and control over those who have houses to construct or re-construct. The dissenting members, consisting of Messrs. Sundar Lal, Ganga Prasad, Muhammad Ali Muhammad, Abdul Majid, Sri Ram, Pandit Madan Mohan and Munshi Madho Lal, have written in their note of dissent that while they fully approve of the principle of leaving the regulation of buildings in municipal areas in the hands of competent municipal authorities, they think that the time has not yet arrived for its wholesale and immediate application to all municipalities, which the proposed amendment involves. We are inclined to think that the dissenting members are more likely to be in the right than the majority because, being house owners themselves, they know exactly where the shoe pinches."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 12th November 1908.

Hackney carriages at Allahabad.

40. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 12th November, has the following :—

"One of the most knotty problems it seems that is exercising the minds of the municipal authorities at Allahabad is the licensing of hackney carriages. The period of licensing is some time in October-November. And the sufferings of the public during this period know no bounds. The thika carriages are called in about this time so that the licenses may be renewed. But some technical difficulties are always raised and the giving of licenses is postponed day after day. The poor thika ghariwalas cannot ply for passengers unless and until the licenses are renewed, and the result is that for days, and sometimes for weeks, the public suffer, for very few carriages are available. The public is as much interested as the municipality in having smart thika turnouts. But the zeal of the municipality in this direction makes the public suffer. If the condition of the hackney carriages and their ponies be bad—and that they are bad nobody will deny—surely a heroic effort on a single occasion is not likely to improve matters. Slowly and gradually the improvement must be made and it will take years to attain the result. We have to look to the interests of the public, and it is well known how much annoyance and inconvenience is caused to the public by the delay in granting the licenses. The grievance of the ghariwalas is that at the slightest pretext, the petty jack-in-office gives a lot of trouble. It is said that the ponies are out of condition. Surely nobody can expect that the thika ponies should be sleek and fat. One has to remember the famine conditions that prevail in this part of the country and that gram, grass and every kind of fodder is so dear. When poor people find it so difficult to have two square meals a day how can one expect that the thika ponies will be in very good condition? And then, why not grant provisional licenses, i.e. grant licenses on the understanding that within two or three months the condition of the horses must be made better? Then if you do not grant licenses for, say, a month, then the means of earning livelihood being stopped the ghariwalas cannot feed and groom their horses. We beg to draw the attention of the authorities to this matter, for if the ekkawalas and ghariwalas combine and desist from plying for a few days, the public will suffer very much more than either the ghariwalas themselves or the municipality."

41. A correspondent in the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 13th November, invites the attention of the local municipal board to the cruel way in which dogs are promiscuously destroyed in the streets and bye-lanes of Allahabad, and expresses a hope that arrangements will be made to take rabid dogs outside the limits of the city where they may be killed in sequestered places.

(e)—Education.

42. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 8th November, while referring to the transfer of the Husainabad High School to the Educational department, remarks:—

ADVOCATE, 8th November 1908.

The Husainabad High School.

"Now that the Government has taken charge of the school, we would suggest that the school should be brought closer to the city. The want of a good high school for boys of Chauk, Saadatganj and Daulatganj is keenly felt, and this can be met by removing the school to a more central place. The school building, like the boarding-house, can be handed over to the Medical College and a new building constructed between Akbari Darwaza and the Kashmiri Muhalla; enough land for a school, with a decent compound, can be secured by purchase of some old dilapidated houses."

43. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 11th November, reproduces the suggestions of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 8th November, regarding the Husainabad High School.

HINDUSTANI, 11th November 1908.

44. The Anand (Lucknow), in the combined issue for the 5th and 12th November, suggests that since the Husainabad Trustees have handed over the Husainabad High School to the Educational department, Government would do well to remove it to the Chauk, as being a more suitable and convenient place.

ANAND, 5th and 12th November 1908.

45. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 8th November, while referring to the immense advance in education made by the negroes in America, in spite of the opposition of the white population, remarks :—

ADVOCATE, 8th November 1908.

Education in India and America.

"If education be the panacea for all ills, let us make some differentiation in the respective duties of the State and the people in the matter, so that there may be no overlapping on the one hand, and steady as also speedy progress in education of different kinds. Let the Government found model institutions to show the standard to be reached for every branch of education, by those managed by the people, but the point must be driven home to the Government that in this matter its primary duty is to see that every child is given elementary education and some among them high education, and a few complete University education. The people must largely go in for the spread of high and varied education—general, technical and industrial—so that in time the commerce and industries of the country may be largely captained by our educated people and no less financed by Indian capital. Among the people themselves the necessity must be admitted of advancing towards nation-building by making the so-called lower classes march alongside the higher. That educated Indians are fettered even now is because the masses are not at their backs. Let them take such constructive work in hand that the poor and the needy will look to them for help and guidance in distress and not elsewhere. Then, and then alone, the welding of all the castes and races in India into a powerful nation will come within the range of practical politics."

46. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 11th November, reproduces the article from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 8th November, entitled "Education in India and America."

Education in India and America.

47. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 8th November, says that the association founded last year under the presidency of Mrs. Besant to help by friendly counsel and social introduction students from India on their first arrival

INDIAN PEOPLE, 8th November 1908

Indian students in England.

in Great Britain has been doing some good work. "Extreme solicitude is in evidence on all sides for the well-being of Indian students residing in England. But there is one fact worthy of note that not much was heard of all these good wishes before the question of 'unrest' arose in India. Indian students in England are out of the reach of a Carlyle circular. The establishment of these clubs and associations may be thought to be one of the ways of keeping the students together, of keeping them out of the reach of socialistic influences, of holding them under a sort of tutelage. The example of political life in England, of democratic and socialistic movements there, the aspects of freedom in life, manners, actions and thoughts cannot but have their effect on the Indian students residing there. The fact that the actions of such students were not much in evidence formerly can only mean that there was not much opportunity of exhibition as there is now. The students there are not blind or deaf and they are highly intelligent. Their 'unrest' appears to be a result of natural causes. We do not, however, wish to confuse the actions of these students as have the political tinge with certain other acts which have only moral and social aspects. Absence of social and moral restraints are certainly apt to produce dire results, and for this we would welcome any social committee arranging for week-end visits or an opportunity of showing English home life. We are afraid very few will be found in recent years to have acted like that. We say that Anglo-Indian manners are not Anglo-Saxon manners. And most of our Indian friends returning from England have noted the difference with regret. Mrs. Besant the other day at the Mayo Hall, Allahabad, assured us that Englishmen here do not desire to associate with Indians returning from England because while out there the Indians learn the manners of only the English roughs, as they only see the seamy side of English society there. We are unable to be in accord with such a high authority. To us the other theory seems more reasonable. Our Anglo-Indian friends will not grant any sort of equality—social or political—to those men who have returned from England. The absence of oriental humility irritates them. Freedom of manners does not always mean that the man is a rough--but to the ruling class the assumption of this freedom is apt to appear as impertinence."

HINDUSTANI, 11th November 1908.

Appointment of headmasters of vernacular schools.

48. A correspondent writing to the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 11th November, complains that the claims of the newly-trained teachers for appointment as headmasters of vernacular schools are overlooked in favour of old ones.

ABHYUDAYA, 13th November 1908.

The Sanskrit College, Benares.

49. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 13th November, contains a letter from a student of the Sanskrit College, in which he complains of the recent abnormal increase in the fees for admission to the various Sanskrit examinations, and asks the Principal and other authorities of the college to redress this grievance of the Sanskrit students. The editor, in inviting the attention of the Government and the Director of Public Instruction to the letter, remarks that the increase in the fees will be a heavy blow to the study of Sanskrit, inasmuch as those who go in for it are generally very poor and cannot afford to pay the enhanced fees. He expresses the hope that the Syndicate and Government will be pleased to see their way to cancel the increase in the fees.

ADVOCATE, 8th November 1908.

The extension of canal irrigation.

50. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 8th November, has the following:—

"The Sarda Canal project, as now amended by the Government, will not benefit the province of Oudh. This owing to the strong opposition of the Oudh talukdars. One does not know what would have been the verdict of the tenantry had there been means to know the views of the dumb millions. Can we express a hope that if not the land at least some rivers in Oudh may be fed by the surplus water of the Sarda. The river Gomti, which serves four or five districts of the two provinces, is in danger of being dried up in the near future and may cease to serve as a water way, unless steps are taken to bring more water into it or to make arrangements for the storage of rain water. Actual water famine may be avoided for some years to come, but the practically stagnant water of this river which supplies the wants of several villages and towns and two large cities is likely to prove injurious to the health of the people."

The Ghaziuddin Haidar Canal.

51. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 12th November, has the following:— ADVOCATE, 12th November 1908.

"Some time ago an engineer was placed on special duty in connection with the Ghaziuddin Haidar Canal. We are glad to note that the bed of the canal has been improved from the Government House to the river. We trust similar improvement will be carried on in the canal as far as it is within municipal limits. The Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, which is throwing much of its sullage water into the canal, can be asked to co-operate in the work, and join in their own and in the interests of the Cantonment to keep the canal clean from at least Aishbag to the limits of the Government House. As at present, the canal is a source of nuisance and a danger to public health of the city, especially of the railway staff."

Famine and the Government.

52. Referring to the history of the famine recently published in the United Provinces Government Gazette, the Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 10th November, pays a warm tribute to the Government and the famine officers for their bravely-conducted compaign against the ravages of famine. The editor hopes that the services of the officers who have done so much to relieve the sufferings of the poor will be amply rewarded by the Government. MASHRIQ, 10th November 1908.

Subordinate executive officers.

53. Referring to the constant friction between the subordinate executive officers and the people in the country, the Jadd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 2nd November, remarks that these matters are of grave importance and should not be summarily treated by the district officers, who ought personally to inquire into each particular case and decide who is to blame. JADD-O-JEHAD, 2nd November 1908.

Coolie utar* in Kumaun.

54. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 13th November, while adverting to the reference made by Sir John Hewett to the system of coolie utar in Kumaun in his Bareilly Darbar speech, remarks that if it be a fact that hill men gladly do transport work in order to earn some extra money, they themselves would come down for the purpose and that there is no necessity for summoning them by force. But the fact is that the system is a source of great inconvenience and trouble to the hill men and they are very much dissatisfied with it. But the so-called leaders of the place did not lay the plain truth before His Honour, either on account of flattery or selfishness, or for fear of the local authorities. The Government should in such a condition believe in the words of the educated classes who are the real leaders of the people and who are not deterred from telling the truth in the interests of their clients. ABHYUDAYA, 13th November 1908.

The swadeshi movement.

55. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 5th November, remarks that revolutionary ideas should by all means be suppressed, but due regard should at the same time be paid to the aspirations of the Indian people—aspirations that have been fostered by a liberal system of English education. "While dissociating ourselves thoroughly from the fierce and vindictive movement of boycott, we lend our unqualified support," says the editor, "to the purely economic swadeshi movement." OUDH AKHBAR, 5th November 1908.

56. The Samrát (Kalakankar), of the 5th September (received on the 14th November), contains a poem on foreign sugar by one Vachnésh Mishra in which the usual allegations about the impurity and unwholesomeness of foreign sugar are made. SAMRAT, 5th September 1908.

The Hindi language.

57. The Samrát (Kalakankar), of the 5th September (received on the 14th November), says that, Hindi being the mother-tongue of Hindus, they should encourage its use in preference to that of English as being more adapted to their wants and necessities, SAMRAT, 5th September 1908.

RAHBAR, 7th November 1908.

Craze for Government service.

59. A correspondent writing to the Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th November, makes the following observations :—

"The cause of the present degraded condition of Indians, degraded morally, physically and mentally, is the desire to remain as slaves—a desire which is responsible for the social, political and economic degeneration of India also. Wake up in time, therefore, ye leaders of India, and remove this desire from the minds of your children, for until this desire is removed there is no hope of prosperity for India. Wise philosophers and sober statesmen have proved that progress is impossible when one is enchained in the fetters of slavery. Remove these chains and send your children abroad, so that they may come back well versed in arts and sciences, start factories and thus be instruments in the hands of Providence for the regeneration of India.

Up to 1813 India could hold her own against any country so far as arts and industries were concerned, but this desire for serfdom has brought about a condition undreamt of in the history of the world. Now our industries can be revived only when every child of the country is inspired with a desire to see that every market in a village is flooded over with swadeshi things. We are thankful to Lord Curzon who, when he failed to awaken a consciousness of duty in the minds of our countrymen even by exhibiting the products of Indian arts and industries on the occasion of the Delhi Darbar, resorted to a much more successful method of bringing them to their senses, which was the partition of Bengal. But for this measure on the part of His Excellency Indians would have remained in the same dormant state in which they were before. In spite of the fact that only 5 per cent. of the Indian population have taken any interest in it, the swadeshi movement has created a veritable panic amongst the labourers and capitalists of the countries which used to drain our wealth from our country."

The writer here quotes a comparative statement showing the import and export of goods during the years 1905, 1906 and 1907, and remarks that the figures are eloquent of the fact that a more determined effort in this direction is sure to bring about a thorough revolution in the economic conditions of India.

One of the impediments in the way of the swadeshi movement, continues the writer, is the ignorance of our factory proprietors and shopkeepers, who, taking advantage of the feeling that is abroad just now, have raised the prices of swadeshi goods. Indians of light and leading should explain to these persons that their's is a false notion, and that if they will stick to it they will suffer in the long run. Swadeshi industries cannot thrive unless these people give up their selfishness and avarice. And when these industries have revived, people will themselves give up this craze for servitude and take to commerce more and more.

MASHRIQ, 10th November 1908.

Need for a registration office at Ghosi.

60. A correspondent writing to the Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 10th November, urges the necessity of transferring the registration office from tahsil Sagri to Ghosi (district Azamgarh).

The writer also suggests the advisability of investing some subordinate executive officer or zamindar with the duties of a sub-registrar also, in case it is decided to maintain a registration office at both of the abovenamed tahsils.

61. Union between Hindus and Muhammadans.

63. The Hindi Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 11th November, says that India cannot attain its full measure of progress unless its two chief communities—Hindus and Muhammadans—combine together and mix freely with one another. They have common interests and they should therefore work in unison for their attainment with unswerving loyalty to Government. HINDI HINDOSTHAN, 11th November 1908.

Trouble in Behar.

64. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 12th November, has the following:— INDIAN PEOPLE, 12th November 1908.

"Distressing news comes from Behar. For some days past trouble has been brewing in the Bettiah sub-division about the cultivation of indigo. The allegation is that cultivators are being forced to sow indigo seeds by some landowners and factory owners. The Bengalee has sent a special reporter and if we are to believe him the situation is really very serious. There has been rather a rough fight between the two parties. Many wounded raiyats are coming from the villages in Bettiah sub-division for getting themselves admitted to the Muzaffarpore and other hospitals. The disturbance, it is said, is caused in a great measure by the prevailing scarcity, the agriculturists wishing to grow crops, which will serve them as food, and give them a bigger profit than indigo. A planting correspondent writing to a contemporary admits that 'the situation is serious.' Telegrams have been sent to the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal but no reply has been received. The raiyats, it is said, are despairing of protection from the authorities. An independent and impartial inquiry is urgently needed, and we trust that the Government will not waste time in taking the matter in hand. Side by side with the Government inquiry some educated men of Behar might very well go into the matter, study the question on the spot, and help the administration with their advice and support. Recently the Bengalis have set a brilliant example in the matter of unofficial inquiries, and we trust the people of Behar will not be slow in following that commendable example. The indigo troubles in Bengal are still fresh in the minds of elderly people, especially Bengalis. We earnestly hope that history is not going to repeat itself in this case in Behar."

Orphans at Gonda.

65. The following letter appears in the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 12th November:— ADVOCATE, 12th November 1908.

"SIR,—I have just been to Gonda, where I was surprised to find about eighty Hindu children in the custody of Christian Missions at their orphanage there, particularly when there is already in existence a sister institution of the Hindu community ever ready to welcome them, irrespective of their status in society, with open arms. I believe, we as Hindus, have every right to claim charge of the children of our community and can reasonably ask the Government of these Provinces, which has always observed the greatest regard for the religious sentiments of the people, to ask the mission people to hand over one and all to the Hindu community to be taken care of at their orphanage, and save them from conversion at a time when they cannot have the least idea of the beauties of Christianity.—A VISITOR TO GONDA."

Grievances of postal employees.

66. Al Bashîr (Etawah), of the 3rd November, calls the attention of the authorities to the following grievances of the postal employés:— AL BASHIR, 3rd November 1908.

"(1) The system of granting commission on the sale of postage stamps has been abolished thus entailing much hardship upon the already very ill-paid servants of the Postal department.

(2) In the same way the commission, which was formerly granted to the postmasters on British postal orders, has been discontinued and no compensation allowed to them on this score.

(3) Houses provided by the Government are utilized by postmasters alone and the poor clerks are required to make their own arrangements.

(4) The work of the Postal department is every day increasing with the spread of education and commerce; but there is no corresponding increase either in the postal staff or in the salaries of the postal employés."

The Government, adds the editor in conclusion, should see that the grievances set forth above are redressed before the employés resort to a strike.

ARYA MITRA, 8th November 1908.

67. The Arya Mitra (Agra), of the 8th November, takes objection to the Magistrate of Jhansi calling a portion of the eleventh chapter of the Satyarth Prakash objectionable in his judgment in the case King-Emperor versus Daulat Ram recently decided at Jhansi, and tries to prove that the Magistrate has put a wrong construction upon the passage which, read with the context, contains no attack at all upon foreigners.

The Satyarth Prakash.

The editor in conclusion urges Arya Samajists to do their best to have the objectionable remarks cancelled, as otherwise it will be detrimental to their religion in the future.

1. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 8th November, while referring to the opposition of Nawab Mushtaq Husain to the Pan-Islamic Conference proposed to be held at Mecca, remarks that there is little fear that such a conference will assume a political aspect. It will strengthen the bond of union between the Moslems of different nationalities, and may give impetus to the revival of learning in Arabia.

A Pan-Islamic Conference at Mecca.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 8th November 1908.

2. Al Bashír (Etawah), of the 10th November, expresses its heart-felt satisfaction at the attitude of the English press towards the British Government, with regard to Turkish affairs, and remarks that the position of those Indian Musalmans who used to pour forth their feelings against Turkey in the columns of newspapers in season and out of season, must be very awkward indeed at the present moment. Consistency demands that they should accord their sympathy to Austria and Germany now.

AL BASHIR, 10th November 1908.

3. The Aligarh Institute Gazette, of the 18th November, while referring to the moral support given by England to Turkey during the present crisis, remarks that this conclusively proves that the English are not opposed to Islamic interests, and are prepared to be the champions of liberty in all parts of the world.

ALIGARH INSTITUTE GAZETTE, 18th November 1908.

4. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 18th November, remarks that the Anglo-Russian Convention has begun to show its effects now. Russia has taken advantage of the internal troubles in Persia and is said to be thinking of encroaching upon Tabrez and Azerbaijan. Though the conduct of the Shah himself is responsible for this foreign intervention, an intervention which may lead to serious complications in the near future, still the conduct of Russia is no less reprehensible for taking a political advantage of a purely commercial agreement. The editor notes that these are the ways of Western nations, and no one can blame them for it. He expresses the hope that the Shah may even now realize the ruinous folly of the course of action he is pursuing, and that he may secure the good will of the people by granting a free parliament.

England, Russia and Persia.

OUDH AKHBAR, 18th November 1908.

The editor further remarks that England, no doubt, has preserved her integrity as yet, so far as the Convention is Concerned, but he apprehends that the alliance with Russia may affect her previous policy.

5. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 11th November, declares that the King's message seems to be but an introduction to the political reforms about which Lord Morley was to make a statement on the 16th November. Had the message not been published, the editor adds, there would not have been so much disappointment among the Indians. Referring to the postponement to the 12th December of Lord Morley's statement about the reforms, he doubts whether this change has not been made, in view of the departure of Mr. Gokhale and other Indians to India before the 12th December, so that they may have no chance to lay bare its inner meaning, if there be any, before the British public.

6. The editor of the Riyáz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), writing in the issue of the 12th November, remarks that the gracious message of His Majesty the King-Emperor has been received with feelings of gratification all over the country. He hopes that the reforms foreshadowed in the message will be carried out in a liberal spirit, so that even the bitterest enemies of the Government may become its sincere admirers.

7. The following is an extract from the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 14th October, with reference to the scourge of drought and plague in His Majesty the King-Emperor's Proclamation :—

The King's message and drought and plague.

HINDOSTHAN, 14th October 1908.

"No secret of empire can certainly avert the scourge of drought and plague, but experienced administrators, the Proclamation says, have done all that skill and devotion are capable of doing to mitigate those dire calamities of nature. This may be true to a certain extent, but these experienced administrators have totally failed to avert the calamities which it behove them to do. India in our youth very seldom used to have any drought or famine, but now, since the various jungles and old fastnesses have been cleared and reclaimed, and thus the trees which attract rain have been cut down, we suffer from a scarcity of rain. This calamity the experienced administrators have not been able to avert, though by means of taqavi and remissions they might mitigate the calamities that might recur next year."

8. While deprecating the adverse criticisms of the Bengali press on the King's message, the Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 14th November, remarks that the message has been received with feelings of universal satisfaction and gratification by Muhammadans all over the country. They hope, says the editor, that the promises foreshadowed in the message will all be fulfilled sooner or later.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 11th November 1908.

Attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser.

9. Referring to the recent attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser, the Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 11th November, expresses the opinion that there may be some misguided Indians who will praise the spirit of the would-be murderer, and will point to such abominable murderous attempts as signs of the regeneration of the nation, but those who profess the true Vedic religion will look with horror and detestation upon such practices. The editor adds that the crime is all the more enhanced in view of Sir Andrew Fraser's good and sympathetic treatment of Indians, and that this dastardly act would never have been committed had all Indians, from one end of the country to the other expressed their deep sense of abhorence and indignation at the murder of two innocent European women. He says that the Moderates and Extremists will condemn this act from self-interest, but the condemnation by the Arya Samaj proceeds from a higher motive. It has to look upon the matter from a religious standpoint and religion does not sanction murders and conspiracies. In conclusion, he advocates that the Arya Samaj should not only condemn such diabolical crimes, but that it should also endeavour to bring misguided persons to paths of rectitude and virtue.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 12th November 1908.

Attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser.

10. The Riyáz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 12th November, while referring to the dastardly attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser, remarks that the anarchist section of the Bengali population has not as yet realized the seriousness of its offences, and it would be no wonder if fresh outrages take place in the near future. In the midst of these gloomy prospects it is however reassuring to find, says the editor, that the masses and the educated classes on the whole are on the side of law and order.

ZUL QARNAIN, 14th November 1908.

Attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser.

11. The Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 14th November, referring to the attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser, remarks that the Bengalis have been encouraged to resort to these excesses owing to the policy of leniency and forgiveness adopted by the British Government. The editor says that unless exceptional measures are adopted to prevent murder and violence, this state of affairs will continue. He remarks that the loyal section of the Indian population, the Muhammadans especially, will be only too glad to lend their ungrudging support to Government in stamping out anarchy and sedition from the country.

MUSAFIR, 15th November 1908.

Attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser.

12. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 15th November, referring to the recent attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser, remarks that every Hindu should look upon such an act as the most heinous crime ever attempted, for the Hindu religion does not recognize any sin greater than murder, especially under such circumstances as this.

ARYA MITRA, 16th November 1908.

Attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser.

13. The Árya Mitra (Agra), of the 16th November, condemns the recent attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser, and remarks that such practices are not only contrary to the spirit of Hinduism but are also detrimental to the orderly progress of the country.

14. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 14th November, while referring to the attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser and the murder of Inspector N. L. Banarji, remarks:— RAHBAR, 14th November 1908.

Alleged reason for political crimes in Bengal.

"Has Government tried to find out the root-cause of all these troubles? The would-be assassin stated in the court that he wanted to leave an example for the people of Bengal. Can Government be an example for the people of Bengal in the dispensation of impartial justice? Can anyone be an Extremist, if he is satisfied with the policy of Government? Can he dare expect sympathy from any one who is satisfied with the policy of Government? Never. What Government has failed to achieve by exemplary punishments it can do by administering justice impartially, and by reforming the present condition of its officials. Kanai Lall Datt was sentenced to death by Government, but his funeral was attended by a large number of people who lustily cried out "Victory to Kanai Lall." Cannot this fact lead some thoughtless people in India to believe that Kanai Lall Dutt died for their welfare, and can it be improper? Such an impression can be removed only when the people are led to believe that 'justice and the officials of the Government are co-relative terms.' "

15. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 16th November, while severely condemning the murderous attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser, remarks that it is not a case of individual dissatisfaction, but that it clearly points out that there is no love between the English and a certain section of the people, although the majority of them are certainly loyal. The editor thinks that the perpetrators of such crimes may be trying to intimidate the officers of the Government, and hopes that both the parties will exercise due discretion in the matter. OUDH AKHBAR, 16th November 1908.

Alleged reason for political crimes in Bengal.

16. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 15th November, has an article entitled "The Black Hole of Komatie", in which it refers to a letter so headed by Mr. Polak in the Rand Daily Mail, describing the treatment of a party of Indians on their railway journey between Delagoa Bay and Johannesburg having particular reference to their detrainment and detention at Komatie Poort. 18. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 15th November, contains an article about the Midnapur case, in which, while admitting that the Bengali agitators actively boycotted the British administration, the writer ascribes the institution of an absurd charge and its inevitable breakdown to the want of sympathy and touch between Mr. Weston and the people of his district. 20. In continuation of his article entitled "Causes of the Unrest in India During the Years 1907-8" (vide Selections No. 46, current, paragraph 21), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), writing in the issue of the 10th November, remarks that sometime before the Mutiny broke out rumours were current to the effect that the British Government was about to pass away from India. Those that gave currency to these rumours, says the editor, were Hindus, as is evident from the diary of Mr. Reid. "The only rational conclusion that can be drawn from the facts before us therefore is that it is Hindus alone who indulged in the splendid vision of securing their lost supremacy once more. As to Muhammadans, their position was such and their condition so down-trodden that they had ceased to aspire for anything high or noble. This is borne out by the fact that a prediction was abroad to the effect that the existence of Muhammadans was in peril. Subsequent events justify us in saying that both these forecasts, the one relating to the supremacy of the Hindus and the other to the downfall of the Musalmans, AL BASHIR, 10th November 1908.

Causes of the unrest in India during the years 1907-8.

have turned out to be true, though in a slightly different sense, for the Hindus have succeeded in practically monopolizing all the departments of the Government and Muhammadans have consequently been overlooked. Though the Hindus could not get swaraj in the strict sense of the word, still to all intents and purposes they got all that they required, and this success of their's is at the bottom of the present-day unrest."

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 11th November 1908.

The introduction into India of seditious literature.

21. Referring to a note in the Pioneer as to the entry of seditious literature into India from France and as to the inability of the Indian Post Office to intercept it, the Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 11th November, remarks that considering that letters of Members of Parliament, like Mr. Keir Hardie, and of such loyal subjects as Mr. Gokhale were opened by the Indian Post Office, it is improbable that it would not have intercepted packets containing seditious literature, had it known of the nature of their contents. The editor further observes that the British Government has nothing to fear from such literature, but that what constitutes a real danger are the violent articles of the Conservative Anglo-Indian newspapers and the reprehensible practices of its own detectives.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 19th November 1908.

Daily Telegraph* and its views about pardah women.

22. Under the heading "Alarmism Run Mad", the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 19th November, has the following :—

"It is not necessary to consider seriously the insane vapourings of the Daily Telegraph on the present situation in India, but it is impossible to ignore them altogether. If the mad suggestions of the London paper were actually adopted the extent of the subsequent danger would be incalculable. Whatever may be the state of things in Calcutta or Bengal there is no general revolutionary movement in India, or any organized attempt to overthrow British rule. The outrageous statement that pardah women are the most dangerous antagonists of the Government has, we are glad to note, been traversed by even the Pioneer. No Government in its senses will believe such a theory, or attempt to violate the sanctity of the pardah. The worst enemies of the Government are men who imbibe revolutionary tendencies in Europe and are away from home influences. The womanhood of India takes no part in politics and is untouched by the libels of gutter scribes."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 19th November 1908.

Alleged attempt to assassinate Sarat Chandra Das.

23. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 19th November, takes the Pioneer to task for not issuing a correction of the story that they received from the Englishman of an attempt to assassinate Sarat Chandra Das, which he says was unfounded.

RAHBAR, 14th November 1908.

The proposed reforms.

24. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 14th November, while referring to the inordinate delay in the announcement of reforms, remarks that such delay will not make the reforms more welcome, but it is the due consideration of the political situation in the country which can make it so. The addition of an Indian member to the Legislative Council will not conciliate the people, as they have become exasperated by Government's systematic disregard of their feelings and opinions. Until Government is prepared to satisfy popular aspirations, there is little hope that the discontent will die out.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 16th November 1908.

The proposed reforms.

25. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 16th November, while referring to the rumours about the announcement of the proposed reforms, remarks that, in view of the diversity of interests between the different communities of India, it is impossible that representative Government will take root in India. The editor further says that if Government worshippers of the type of the Maharaja of Benares and Haji Ismail Khan be elected to be members of the Council they will never dare to differ from the Government, and so the interests of the people will surely suffer.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 28th October 1908.

The Arya Samaj and Government.

26. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 28th October (received on the 18th November), while referring to the strict surveillance and espionage to which the Arya Samajists and their meetings are still subjected in the Punjab, asks if other religious institutions also are treated in the same way. If not, the editor expresses the opinion that the policy of religious neutrality professed by the Government is simply a farce.

"The doings and preachings of the Arya Samaj are all straightforward and above board, and the logic of its moral persuasions is so convincing that the police officers and detectives who are appointed to watch its proceedings, instead of finding anything objectionable in them, have been heard openly declaring themselves to be affected by its precepts and examples. In the face of these facts the ill-treatment of Arya Samajists becomes unaccountable, especially when we bear in mind the fact that the head of the Government of our provinces is a man so just and so wise as Sir John Hewett.

As yet we have refrained from entering into this controversy, but things are assuming such alarming shapes now that it is impossible to keep quiet. We have been given to understand that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor has appointed a high European police officer to go about interviewing Arya Samajists of light and learning and to ascertain their views on the questions of the day. We have also come to know that His Honour is about to invite a deputation of the Arya Samajists which, it is given out, he will introduce before His Excellency the Viceroy also. Now, before any such step is taken, we would beg to point out the futility of such deputations. The memory is still fresh in our mind of the scant courtesy with which the Punjab deputation was treated by the then Lieutenant Governor of that province. In order to be of any use the proposed deputation should not, therefore, be invited until efforts have been made to secure good-will on either side. With this purpose in view we suggest that the Government should draw out a list of the grounds on which the Arya Samajists have been treated as suspects, and the Arya Samajists on their part should submit in detail an account of the ill-treatments they have been subjected to, because of their being so suspected. A clear exposition of these facts would explain all misunderstandings, and would pave the way for future good-will and co-operation. The deputation, if it is invited after all this is done, would surely be a boon both to the rulers and the ruled.

However, since all this is still a far-off question, we give below accounts of such occurrences as go to show that the Arya Samajists have not lost patience, in spite of the most trying circumstances in which they have been placed:—

1. The President of the Arya Samaj of a certain place in Jodhpur, was fined Rs. 11 for having assumed the title of Singh. This was considered to be a criminal action in view of the fact that he was a Mali. In the same state the Arya Samajists have been privately warned through the police to take away the signboards from some of their buildings situated on the road through which the Viceroy was to pass on the 1st November, on pain of steps being taken against them if they failed to do so.

2. An Arya Samajist preacher was recently arrested in Jhansi for having indulged in an exposition of a passage from Satyarth Prakash, alleged to be seditious.

3. A few days ago a Christian Raja of Tajpur, named Shyam Singh, collected together a large number of persons, discoursed to them on the relation between the Government and the Arya Samaj, and in the end exhorted his hearers to disassociate themselves from the Samaj.

4. The last portion of the judgment in the case of Hoti Lal betrays an assumption that the whole body of Arya Samaj is disloyal, simply because Hoti Lal was, in his early days, helped and maintained by an Arya Samajist. It is rumoured, further, that the police secured the evidence of Arya Samajists against Hoti Lal by coercion, and that they have misrepresented to the authorities the attitude and opinion of Kunwar Hukum Singh.

5. Detectives sometimes come to us with a view to secure information from us in indirect ways. Only the other day a man, who it afterwards transpired was sent by a Police Inspector, came to us and asked for the names of the priests who perform the hawan ceremony and of the teachers. Now, since there are no priests specified to perform hawan ceremonies, he was easily detected and sent away—a sadder but a wiser man. It is detectives of this stamp who disgrace the Government and bring it into contempt.

6. We have been told that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor has been constantly inquiring of his visitors about the Arya Samaj, and that on one occasion he said that there are certain secret places at gurukuls which the Arya Samajists do not show to any one. We do not believe this to be true. But surely those who give currency to such rumours are not the well-wishers of the Empire.

We can go on multiplying such instances, but for the present we conclude with an appeal to Arya Samajists to convene a representative gathering to consider steps to be taken in this connection in future.

In continuation of the above, the editor, writing in the issue of the 4th November, remarks as follows:—

"Pandit Daulat Ram has been prosecuted under section 107. If the conviction be held justifiable many religious preachers, not only Arya Samajists, but Hindus, Muhammadans and Christians also, are liable to prosecution.

But no! the Arya Samajists have been especially represented as disloyals, and this is why this special treatment has been meted out to them. We give below a few more instances of such ill-treatment:—

1. The Jat Maha Sabha has received a complaint that the Jat soldiers of a particular regiment who profess the Arya Samajist creed and in consequence wear the sacred thread have been required to cease wearing the thread on pain of expulsion. The officer in command has not as yet replied to the letter of protest sent by the Sabha.

2. We were shown the diaries of certain Arya ziladars during our tour in the Punjab in which the fact of their being Arya Samajists was specially mentioned. Why this specific mentioning of the creed in the case of Arya Samajists alone? The Jats of different villages were told by Deputy Commissioners to turn out Arya Samajists and they were assured that no complaint against them would be heard.

4. An Arya Samajist ziladar has written to us saying that he was asked by the Deputy Commissioner to sever his connection from that political body and enemy of the Empire—the Arya Samaj! The ziladar refused to do so and he was consequently prosecuted but got off unpunished.

5. The President of the Indore Cantonment Arya Samaj resigned his post of a clerk in the office of the Inspector General of Police simply because he could not accept the alternative of renouncing his creed."

In the end the editor makes a long appeal to His Excellency the Viceroy, and requests him not to lend ear to the exaggerated reports of the police, and of the Muhammadans who are specially opposed to the Samaj. He also requests Arya Samajists to convene a special meeting of the Paropkarni Sabha to consider measures to be adopted for creating a better understanding between Arya Samajists and Government. They should also try to secure the presence of Colonel Sir Pratap Singh and of Sir Nahar Singh, for the presence of men who are trusted by Government would make reconciliation a much more easy affair. The editor in the last place requests his district magistrate to visit the site of the gurukul himself, and ascertain anything he may want to know first hand. For, he says, it is hearsay alone which has done so much mischief so far as the reputation of the Samaj is concerned.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 8th November 1908.

Unity between Hindus and Muhammadans.

27. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 8th November, says that there is little chance of union between the Hindus and Musalmans so long as Hindi papers can find no better occupation than heaping vituperation on Moslem religious leaders, and opposing the slightest recognition of merit among the Musalmans by Government, as was the case in their opposition to the appointment of Mr. Shah Din to the Punjab Chief Court. He notes that notwithstanding this they hope for a rapprochement with the Musalmans, and with this end in view at the last Id in Calcutta some Hindus fêted the Musalmans and made many conciliatory speeches, and one speaker even went so far as to declare that the use of beef was sanctioned by the Vedas.

MUSAFIR, 15th November 1908.

Suggestions for stamping out anarchism from India.

28. While recounting the various steps taken to suppress anarchy and disorder in the land, the editor of the Musáfir (Agra), writing in the issue of the 15th November, remarks that in spite of these repressive measures the anarchists have created quite a panic in the land. He inquires whether it is really impossible to stamp out anarchism from the country, and replies in the negative. He proceeds to explain that it is quite an easy question if only Government acts on the principle of co-operation—co-operation between the rulers and the ruled. He urges that no false notion of prestige should come in its way, that Government should mix on a footing of equality with its subjects, seek their advice, act up to it, and then see if anarchism still remains in the land. The editor finally counsels Government to devise means to prevent the disastrous consequences of this mischievous movement in India.

29. The Rájput (Agra), of the 15th November, enumerates in detail the various blessings conferred by the British Government upon Indians, and urges them to be loyal to it, in grateful acknowledgment of the benefits received.

RAJPUT, 15th November 1908.

30. A correspondent writing to the Riyáz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 16th November, deprecates the growing tendency among the educated classes to waste their energy in harassing the Government by unprofitable agitation, which has culminated in anarchism. He remarks that the forbearance of Government has been surely tried during the last two years, and expresses the apprehension that, if the agitators persist in their indiscretion they may lose the rights and privileges which were conferred upon India by the late Queen in her Proclamation of 1858. In conclusion, he advises them to turn their attention to the development of their national arts and industries, in which enterprise they would have the unstinted support and co-operation of Government.

Government and the educated classes.

31. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 17th November, commends His Honour's speech at Bareilly to the attention of its readers, and asks them to act immediately upon the excellent advice it contains. The editor expresses the opinion that there is great need of capitalists to finance the nascent industries of the country, and that if they make efforts they may be assured that Government will help them.

33. The Musáfir (Agra), in the issue of the 15th November, while referring to the second prosecution of the Swarajya, the Urdu weekly of Allahabad, deprecates the tone of the paper, which, he says, had grown more violent since the incarceration of Shanti Narayan, its former editor. Ever since its first prosecution the paper has been in the hands of inexperienced youths which accounts to some extent for the undesirable tone of its writings. The editor advises its future conductors to be more circumspect and prudent, and remarks that Government too should not disturb the peace of the province by frequent prosecutions of this nature. The policy of repression, he concludes by saying, is of doubtful utility, as is evident from what has happened in Bengal and Bombay, and he hopes that the Lieutenant Governor of our provinces will be a bit more careful about accepting the exaggerated reports of the detective police.

34. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 16th November, complains that Babu Ram, the editor of the Swarajya, who was charged with sedition, was brought handcuffed into the Court, which procedure, he maintains, is contrary to Lord Morley's instructions on the subject.

35. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 14th November, while referring to the acquittal of the two accused in the Ghaziabad accident case, remarks that if they were not responsible for the accident, some one else must be. He notes that the Magistrate, in his judgment, has placed the whole blame on the railway administration, and that, if he was justified in doing so, the railway is bound to pay damages to the people who have suffered in the accident.

The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 14th November, while referring to the proposal made by the Punjab Chief Court to establish a fund to pay for legal advice for poor persons charged with offences punishable with death, advises the extension of this concession to persons charged with less important crimes, so that the police should then be more chary of challaning innocent persons.

38. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 19th November, complains that in criminal cases the accused is often discharged on the ground of the prosecutor or his representative having failed to put in an appearance at the right time. Such is also the case, continues the editor, in civil suits, where a decree is granted in favour of the plaintiff, if the defendant does not turn up immediately in response to the call of the court chaprasi. The editor suggests that the court should wait till the end of the day appointed for the hearing of the case, before it dismisses the suit finally.

42. The editor of the Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), in a strongly worded article in the issue of the 16th November, on the financial condition of the Benares Municipality, complains that, notwithstanding its being saddled with an outstanding debt of about Rs. 1,11,000, it still persists in paying Rs. 900 a month to an engineer, who is not its whole-time servant, and who gets the work done through a subordinate engineer, and is himself in no way responsible to the Board. The total cost of the municipal works constructed under his supervision does not amount to more than Rs. 20,000 in a year, an expenditure which in the past was looked after by an overseer getting a salary of Rs. 100 only. The editor also notes that the municipality has a paid secretary who gets Rs. 400 or Rs. 450 per mensem, and expresses the hope that the Lieutenant Governor will personally look into the affairs of the municipality.

The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 16th November, complains that there is no adequate provision for the teaching of Arabic at the Bareilly College, which is the only institution for higher education in Rohilkhand, which contains a large number of Musalmans. 47. "The address which was delivered by His Honour the Chancellor of the Allahabad University on Saturday last", says the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 19th November, "would undoubtedly evoke feelings of appreciation from all parts of these provinces, and will be considered as a pronouncement containing an instructive survey of the work done by our University and setting forth an ideal which, if followed, would increase its usefulness." The editor then proceeds to review in detail the various points raised by His Honour in his address. He notes with satisfaction the announcement made by His Honour that in future seven appointments as Deputy Collectors would be conferred upon graduates every year instead of three; and the proposal for the addition of the faculties of Medicine, Engineering and Agriculture.

The Convocation address.

ADVOCATE, 19th November 1908.

While referring to His Honour's remarks on secondary education, he says that it would be better to extend the buildings and to strengthen the tutorial staffs of schools, which have become overcrowded with students, than to limit their number, as the students who are sent away would have to go, in many cases, without any education. The editor also takes exception to the withdrawal of recognition from the Matriculation Examination as a test for Government service, and is of opinion that it would be discouraging higher education and will result in making the University a department of the Government.

Adverting to His Honour's vigorous defence of the students of these provinces against the unmerited slur cast on their character by Sir B. Fuller, he remarks that it will be appreciated by students all over the province, and that it will be an incentive to the preservation of a high tone of morality in the future. The editor, in conclusion, draws the attention of the students to the remarks made by His Honour regarding their participation in politics, and asks them to take a merely academic interest in political affairs during their scholastic career.

48. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 19th November, after expressing general approval of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor's speech at the Convocation, has the following passage :—

The Convocation address.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 19th November 1908.

"Not the least interesting and significant part of Sir John's speech is that which seeks to vindicate Indian students against the libellous attack of a countryman of his. The allusion in the speech was almost transparent. Whom could

INDIA OFFICE LIBRARY & RECORDS

Sir John Hewett have had in view but Sir Bampfylde Fuller who stooped so low as to cast aspersions upon the morality of Indian students without any reservations, in the hospitable pages of an English periodical of great repute? We were the first in these provinces to enter a protest against such false and irritating accusations by a man, whose credit for statesmanship, prudence, and impartiality had become exhausted in India and who cannot hope to restore it by playing the rôle of a libellor of our youth in England. It is therefore particularly gratifying that the responsible head of an Indian province and an Indian University has come forward to refute the charge laid by the ex-Governor of East Bengal and Assam, and that Mr. Justice Aikman, whose experience of India now is greater than that of only one or two civilians in the country, and Mr. delaFosse, the Director of Public Instruction in these provinces, have publicly associated themselves with Sir John Hewett in giving the lie direct to the unfounded libel upon Indian students. There are black sheep in every fold, as Sir John observed, but to say of the Indian students in general that they are an immoral lot is nothing short of an outrage upon truth. Will Sir Bampfylde have the grace, we had almost said the courage, to withdraw his charge now? Will the great journal which published his libel repair the wrong that it has done? They should in all decency, but whether they will is another matter."

The editor expressed approval of the views of His Honour as to the part students should take in politics, and urged the latter to take the advice to heart.

51. The Almora Akhbár, of the 31st October (received on the 16th November), notes with gratification that during His Honour Sir John Hewett's recent tour in the hills no inconveniences attendant upon the system of coolie utar were felt, owing to the people who supplied fodder, and fuel, &c., being fully and promptly paid and to the coolies not being detained for more than twenty-four hours, and remarks that if the subordinate officers were to follow this example of the head of the province, much of the unpleasantness of the utar system would be reduced.

1. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 23rd November, while referring to the speech of the Prime Minister on the occasion of the dinner at Guildhall, remarks that the only difficulty in the way of an Anglo-Turkish alliance is the difference in the system of government obtaining in the two countries. The editor expresses the hope that now that despotism has given way to a constitutional form of government in the Ottoman Empire, national and religious differences will not stand in the way of a reunion. He is aware that there are some, no doubt, who are always considering policy and expediency and who have no faith in the good intentions of European Powers, but he notes that from the point of view of expediency also it is desirable that England should on no account lose this opportunity of securing the good-will of the Turks and through them of the Musalmans all over its Empire. An Anglo-Turkish alliance may involve serious obligations in the future, and it may be necessary to revise the Berlin treaty to meet the new conditions, but in spite of this he maintains that the most advantageous policy for England to pursue is to consistantly support Turkey in maintaining its supremacy in Bosnia and in other contested territories. He advocates that England should also change its policy towards Egypt.

OUDH AKHBAR, 23rd November 1908.

Turkey and England.

The editor concludes by saying that if England give its whole-hearted support to Turkey and moreover recognize the independence of the Khedive of Egypt, its own position will be strengthened and there will be no danger to its Empire in Egypt either from within or from without.

2. The Swarajya (Allahabad), published the following account in the issue of the 17th October, regarding the partition-day celebrations at Allahabad :—

SWARAJYA, 17th October 1908.

Partition-day celebrations at Allahabad.

Partition of Bengal.

"Yesterday, the 16th of the current month, was the day of the partition of Bengal. This was the day when the Government, in defiance to the opinion (lit. disregarding the opinion) of millions of Indians, partitioned Bengal to exhibit its spirit of haughtiness and intolerance (Akkarkhani). This was the day when the nationalist movement was created, and when vows of swadeshi and boycott were taken most enthusiastically. Therefore every year celebrations are held in memory of it. From early morning many men, among whom the Bengalis had the proud privilege of being in the majority, put on the garb of mourning, observed fast, and remained throughout the day barefooted and bareheaded. To commemorate the day (of the partition) a meeting was held in the evening at 4-30 p.m. at Balua Ghat on the banks of mother Jumna.

Proceedings.

Lala Ram Din Vaish, Manager, Deshi Kar-bar Company, Limited, proposed Shriman Pandit Balkrishna Bhatji, whose (auspicious) name should be repeated in the morning, and who is a valuable contributor to Hindi literature, as president of the meeting. Srijut A. P. Ghazipuri having seconded the motion, Bhatji accepted the offer with many thanks, and then some boys opened the proceedings with the Bande Mataram song in Bengali. After this the Bande Mataram song in Sanskrit was sung when the audience remained standing and listened with rapt attention. After this, some other young men entertained the audience with the song 'Sare Jahan se Achha Hindustan Hamara' ('Our India is the best of all the world').

Lecture.

After the song was over Bhatji introduced Babu Sundar Lal to the audience, and the latter then began a masterly speech which we cannot reproduce in full owing to the short space at our disposal. Nevertheless, we will express his views in a few brief words.

He said : "We were all very joyous on the Dasehra day. We walked about in our new clothes. But to-day we are dejected. We are in our mourning dress, barefooted and bareheaded. What is the cause of it? On that day (the Dasehra day) Raja Ramchandraji conquered Ceylon, and we celebrate that day to express our feelings of joy. To-day is the day of our defeat, this being the day when a tyrannous Government afflicted the hearts of all Indians by partitioning Bengal. On this very day Indians realized their true worth and felt the necessity of standing on their feet."

Continuing he said: "The former was the victory of our forefathers. In accordance with the proverbial fable 'My father was a king, but how does it affect thee?' It is a matter to be ashamed of that. instead of keeping it (India) in our possession, we have lost our own liberty, and put on the collar of serfdom round our neck. This defeat of ours is the index of the amount of courage we possess." Afterwards. when discussing the necessity for students taking part in such meetings, he said:—

"Take the history of any nation, Italy, France, Austria or America, everywhere it is young men only who have done the work. Look to England itself. Here, too, it is young men alone who have taken the greatest part. There is no reason, therefore, why our students and young men should not take part in such meetings." "Blessed are those" he continued, "who may be expelled from schools on account of the Risley circular, for it is such men alone who will better the condition of the country (cheers) and who are willing to sacrifice body, mind and wealth. Members of the Legislative Council will not regenerate the country. Wealthy men will not take part in it (the movement). Big Babus and vakils will do nothing, nor will those men do anything who use coats, pants, neckties and collars and wear long hair on their heads, and dress as dandees. This work will be accomplished by langot bands, men who are inspired with the spirit of the ascetic, men who do not get depressed by calamities, who are not afraid of troubles, and care nothing for pleasure and luxury."

After inculcating lessons from the lives of Swami Dayanand, Shankracharya, and Mahatma Budha, he described the greatness of India, and said: "When all European countries and other parts of the world also were peopled by barbarians, India was a civilized country. This was the country which taught civilization to all others and which gave to the world the science of numbers and that of philosophy. This country was the religious instructor, &c., &c." He also said: "That Hercules, the pride of Europe, who is so much respected and venerated by Europe, was no other than Balram, the worthy son of mother India. All historians are agreed that after the Mahabharat was over, Balramji left India and went over to settle there (in Europe), and on account of his strength of body and mind he was worshipped by the people there as a god."

The pledge of boycott. After this, in a few brief words he explained the necessity of boycott, and asked every one to renew the pledge of boycott. The vow which was administered to everyone and which was repeated by all, ran as follows:—

"In commemoration of the partition of Bengal we, all children of India, in the interest of our motherland and of our countrymen, take this vow on the sacred banks of the Jumna, with a pure heart, with firm determination and with God as our witness, that henceforth forward, in the name of our mother and for her gratification, we shall not use foreign articles so far as possible as long as we live. (So help us God)—Bande Mataram."

After this a Bengali gentleman made an effective speech in his mother-tongue and pleased the audience. At the close of the meeting Bhatji delivered a short but suitable speech and laid before the audience, in a very excellent way, the evils resulting from the partition of Bengal.

The procession. The meeting came to a close with loud shouts of Bande Mataram, and preparations for a procession were then taken in hand. Bhatji, Ghazipuri, and Babu Sundar Lal headed the procession. Behind them two young men carried a lifesize photograph of Lala Lajpat Rai, the lion of Punjab. The whole audience, which numbered more than 500, then formed themselves in rows of six. In the first row there were Bengalis singing national songs and after ten rows came some young men singing Hindi songs. The procession resounded with cries of "Bande Mataram", "Victory to Tilak Maharaj", "Victory to Lala Lajpat Rai", "Victory to Sivaji", "Victory to Srijut Khudi Ram Bose" and "Victory to other patriots and nation-worshippers." As they marched along they sang national songs with great enthusiasm. The procession stopped for five minutes in front of the Bharti Bhawan Library and cries of victory to the above-named persons were loudly raised. All of us then proceeded direct and stopped again in front of the Swarajya office, and silence prevailed when Babu Sundar Lal stood and said a few words in praise of Srijut Shanti Narayan, the pride of the nation and the late editor of the Swarajya. At the close of his speech cries of "Victory to Shantiji" were raised, and thus ended the procession which, on reaching the heart of the city, had swelled to much more than one thousand."

Partition of Bengal and the present unrest.

3. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 19th November, referring to the present political unrest and the violent methods of agitation adopted by the reform seekers, remarks that while this seems to be the result of the Congress movement, which has been going on for the last 25 years, what gave it the most undesirable impetus was the partition of Bengal. The editor remarks that while the partition of Bengal is considered by many to be a genuine grievance, he considers that it is only being made use of as an excuse by mischievous persons to secure their own ends.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 19th November 1908.

Causes of the unrest in India during the years 1907-8.

4. In continuation of his article entitled "Causes of the Unrest in India During the Years 1907-8" (vide Selections No. 47, current, paragraph 20), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), writing in the issue of the 17th November, remarks that the Mutiny of 1857 was chiefly caused by the wicked machinations of the Hindus, who did not hesitate to use all sorts of misrepresentations to win over the sympathies of Muhammadans to their side. In proof of his contention the editor quotes lengthy passages from Malleson's book on the Indian Mutiny, particularly those suggesting that false rumours were set afloat in order to mislead Muhammadans, as for instance the proclamation issued by Nana Rao on the 6th July 1857.

The editor in conclusion expresses his satisfaction at the attitude of the Muhammadans towards the Congress movement, and remarks that if Sir Saiyid Ahmad had not sounded a note of warning some twenty years before, the result would have been that all blame would have fallen upon Muhammadans and they would have been made scape-goats by the Hindus in this case also.

AL BASHIR, 17th November 1908.

The situation in Bengal.

5. From this sudden departure of His Excellency from Lucknow to Calcutta, says the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 22nd November, it is apparent that some measures are about to be taken to cope with the outbreak of crime in Bengal. "The situation has become grave indeed and one does not know whether we are at the beginning of a grave crisis in the history of Bengal or at the end of it. Any steps taken by the Government to suppress crime and stamp out the seed of anarchism, which to-day is causing anxiety to the State, and which, if allowed to go on, will bring society into chaos and disorder, will have the support of all peace-loving people of the country. No mercy is to be shown to men who allow their feelings of revenge to madden them so much as to make them blind to the consequences of shedding innocent blood. But we know there are dangers in panic, and we hope Lord Minto will not be affected by the feeling of irritation, which has been created in the Anglo-Indian mind by the misdeeds of certain men in Bengal who, let us hope and trust, yet form but a microscopic minority. Before any deportations from Bengal take place as is suggested by the Englishman, or before an ordinance is passed by the Executive Council suspending the present courts of judicature, and creating a new tribunal instead, we do hope that at least a few of the most loyal and devoted Indians resident in Calcutta will be taken into the confidence of the Government. Repressive measures, whether they succeed in stamping out the unrest or not, are bound to be adopted; but they will lose their sternness if, before their adoption, popular sympathy in some form is gained for them, and if legislation or ordinance is not the result of the consultation of only such high officers of State as get little opportunity to be in touch with the real situation in Bengal. The threat that the innocent will have to suffer along with the guilty will not deter the really guilty from doing misdeeds. Hence whatever may be done to suppress the crime, the good name of British justice should be protected, and the subordinate police should not be given a free hand in the suppression of crime. Whatever Lord Minto does to deal with the outbreak of crime in the new form, let this be done with firmness, and with a resolution not to do anything which is likely to lead the people to believe that a few instances of political crimes, horrible in their nature no doubt, have caused panic to the mighty Government, and that it is ready to sanction proceedings which are likely to interfere as much with the liberty of the innocent as with that of the guilty. This will have a disastrous effect, and we do not consider him to be a true friend of the Government, who at this moment eggs it on to have recourse to extraordinary measures, against the traditions of the British Government."

ADVOCATE, 22nd November 1908.

He exhorts the leaders of Bengali society to see that, in their own interest, and in the interest of Bengalis spread all over India, to prevent their young men from getting out of hand. The lads, who are so anxious to give their blood for the country, should be impressed with the advice that the way in which they desire to give their lives cannot but bring disaster to the motherland, and will hinder for a long time to come that course of material advancement for which their elders are so anxious. He remarks that, though the partition was surely an evil measure, it should not induce madness among those who are opposed to it. As it has not been undone nor amended, they should now resign themselves to the inevitable with the consolation that they have done their best to undo it.

The Bengal anarchists.

7. The editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), while referring to the measures proposed for dealing with the anarchists and their instigators and the seditious newspapers of Bengal, that are to be considered and passed at the special meeting of the Viceroy's Executive Council to be held on the 26th instant, makes the following observations in the issue of the 25th November :—" We have to choose between police rule, or it may be military rule, and Government by terror. Between the two no sane person will hesitate for a moment. An emergency has arisen, and it must be met by special measures. These measures should not be kept on the statute book a moment longer than is absolutely necessary; but if, on the other hand, it seems to the Government, as it seems to most other people, that the ordinary law has failed to furnish the protection which the public requires, no hesitation should be displayed in resorting to stronger protective measures. Next to the immediate discovery and arrest of the perpetrators of these foul deeds, it is important that they should be speedily brought to trial, that the trial should not be spun out—though of course it should not, on the other hand, be hurried through with indecent haste—and that there should be no appeal from its result. It is a drastic remedy, but the only alternative appears to be the persistence of a propaganda of murder which makes no distinction as regards position or nationality."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 26th November 1908.

Lawyers and Anarchism.

8. In an article on the subject of "Lawyers and Anarchism", the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 26th November, discusses the position of lawyers in India.

The writer lays great stress on the prominent part taken by lawyers in all civilized countries, where, he says, they have a monopoly of political power. He expresses a desire for this consummation in India, and the opinion that it must ultimately come.

"No state," he remarks, "can thrive where lawyers do not get their proper position . . . . . Reforms here are bestowed as gifts, they are not the direct results of national growth and expansion of ideas, for that would predicate the existence of a national entity which in India at the present moment does not exist.

Indian opinion as such has always been a negligible quantity; and we may not be far wrong in stating that the policy of the Government has more been determined by the lucubrations of Anglo-Indian journalists than by any desire to consult its own weal and for those who are denominated 'natives.' If, instead of trying to adopt methods the application and result of which have always been questioned and questionable, some responsible people had made some attempt to give to Anglo-Indian journalism a more sober and gentlemanly tone, much of the cause of the present friction would have disappeared.

. . . . . Constructive statesmanship of the Anglo-Saxons has been played out all over the world, it seems, and India is no exception."

9. Under the heading "The Making of the Statesmen", the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 26th November, has an article discussing and ridiculing the letter of the Maharaja of Benares to the Times. The editor denies the Maharaja's right to discuss the situation in India from the point of view of an independent Native Chief.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 26th November 1908.

10. The editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), in the issue of the 26th November, approves of the suggestions made by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, the Calcutta Trades' Association, and the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association regarding the trial of the anarchists in Bengal. He refers to the behaviour of certain Indian students in England at a recent meeting held in London, presided over by Lord Ampthill, and remarks that "the only conclusion to be drawn from this disgraceful state of affairs is the absolute necessity for the adoption of stringent measures by the Government, not only for the suppression of anarchists and other dangerous criminals, especially in Bengal, but also for the enforcement of strict discipline and moral principles in all schools and colleges in India, whether they be Government institutions or not. The so-called 'National' colleges and schools of Bengal are generally hotbeds or nurseries of sedition, and they ought either to be speedily suppressed or put under the strictest Government supervision. By taking steps such as we suggest the Government will strike at the root of the anarchist movement in India."

The present crisis.

HINDOSTHAN, 26th November 1908.

11. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 27th November, says that anarchism will be stamped out from the country only when the causes which have given rise to it are removed. The editor remarks that it is unjust to blame the leaders of the people for its growth when the Government has been enacting measures in utter disregard of public opinion since the partition of Bengal, and moreover when their voice can have no weight with those who are bent upon violence, even at the risk of their own lives. He observes that the new and exceptional measures which the Anglo-Indian papers and associations are urging the Government to adopt for the suppression of anarchism will lead to harmful results, since, as the Indian Social Reformer says, special laws and special courts mean in plain English indiscriminate arrests and punishments, and since in summary trials innocents are likely to suffer equally with the guilty. He remarks that it is needless to say that the rule under which innocent people are punished cannot last long and expresses agreement with his contemporary of the Indian Social Reformer that coercion by Government will be followed by increased violence on the part of the anarchists which may lead to never-ending disorder in the country.

Proposed repressive measures for stamping out anarchism from India.

ABHYUDAYA, 27th November 1908.

12. Referring to the agitation among women in England and to their efforts in demanding their rights and privileges, the Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 27th November, agrees with the remarks of a contemporary that Indians are also human beings having similar feelings and sentiments to those of the women in England. The editor observes that there is a contrast in the treatment of such disorders in the two countries, and that such distinctions make Indians discontented and indignant.

OUDH AKHBAR, 27th November 1908.

13. In continuation of his article (vide paragraph 76, Selections No. 47, current), the editor of the Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), in the issue of the 18th November, asks Sir John Hewett to issue a proclamation recognizing it as his primary principle that no person shall be declared disloyal or placed beyond the pale of humanity, simply because he is an Arya Samajist; and also that His Honour will personally consider the case of Daulat Ram, thereby fulfilling the last words of his highminded address at the Bareilly Darbar.

14. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 18th November, condemning the disfigurement of Queen Victoria's statue at Nagpur, remarks that this act is nothing short of a diabolical outrage, considering that every Indian looks upon the late Queen with the profoundest feeling of reverence and respect. The editor urges all Indians to express their sense of abhorrence at the deed in the strongest terms, and that they should endeavour to secure the punishment of the culprits.

Lord Northbrook.

15. Referring to the leader in the Pioneer of the 18th instant on Mr. Bernard Mallet's Memoirs of Lord Northbrook's viceroyalty, the editor of the Citizen (Allahabad), in the issue of the 22nd November, quotes a few extracts from it and observes that "it is thirty-two years since Lord Northbrook resigned, and the question of position in relation to Parliament and the India Office of the head of the Government of India is still unsolved."

He notes that, but for the ignoring of Lord Northbrook's warning thirty-two years ago, which was prophetic, the unrest now raging in Bengal would never have taken place.

The treatment of Indians in the Transvaal.

17. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 24th November, reproduces the account given by Mr. Polak in the Rand Daily Mail of the ill-treatment to which a party of Indians were subjected at Komatie Poort, during their railway journey between Delagoa Bay and Barberton, and remarks that it is distressing to contemplate that, while such occurrences are taking place, Lord Morley and Lord Minto should still be engaged in correspondence with the Transvaal Government on the subject. Had such incidents taken place in Turkey, continues the editor, the fleets of European powers would have at once appeared on the shores of that country, and, had a Christian been a victim of such hardships, all the inhabitants of the Transvaal to a child would have been hanged. He expresses regret that there is no one to redress the grievances of the oppressed Indians.

OUDH AKHBAR, 25th November 1908.

Punishment of political offenders.

18. While pointing out that the prosecution of political offenders has entirely failed to suppress seditious agitation in India, the editor of the Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), in the issue of the 25th November, remarks that mere repressive measures can be of no avail in restoring peace and order in the country.

He observes that such measures always have a degrading effect on the moral sentiments of a nation, and especially of Indians who are of a heterogeneous nationality. In India what one party takes to be right, the other comes forward to condemn as wrong, and so it appears that the quarrel is between the different sections of the Indian community and not between the Indians and the Government.

He suggests that, as mere repression can be of no good, wise measures should be adopted to rule India without the slightest distinction of caste, creed or colour, as has been lately proclaimed by His Majesty the King-Emperor.

He further adds that he does not mean to condemn the punishing of political offenders, but that they should be punished in a way that the punishment might have some wholesome and deterrent effect on the people.

He condemns the way in which the Rawalpindi case was handled, on the ground that, instead of producing any salutary effect on the people it only resulted in exciting feelings of indignation.

He further remarks that, although it is true that Indians are mostly influenced by sectarian feelings, still they have recognized the value of unification into one nation, with a view to the progress of the country.

The writer complains that political cases are as a rule decided by European Judges and that sometimes the same officer who institutes the case is allowed to hear it also.

In conclusion, he condemns the custom of tutoring witnesses in such cases, which custom, he considers, was made clear by the retraction of his statement by Rakhal Chandra, the Crown witness in the Midnapur case.

Defects in the Law in India.

21. The Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 27th November, says that "there is hardly anything in the British administration of India that is more puzzling to all loyal and intelligent Indians than the extraordinary and complicated system of legal procedure in dealing with murderers and other dangerous criminals in this country."

The editor then quotes certain observations on the subject from the Punjab Times, and remarks that India is not the only country where great defect in the law exists, but similar and even greater facilities for criminals to escape from the tender hands of justice exist in nearly all the countries of Europe and America. He advises the Government to adopt much stronger and speedier methods for the suppression of anarchists and their instigators, the seditious newspapers of Bengal and other parts of India, together with the equally mischievous brood of disloyal agitators who travel about from place to place sowing the poisonous seeds of sedition and anarchy.

23. The Arya Mitra (Agra), of the 24th November, contains the following letter from Pandit Bhagwan Din, President, Arya Pratindhi Sabha, United Provinces, to the President, Arya Samaj, Jhansi:—

"Since the publication of the judgment in re King-Emperor versus Daulat Ram, I have been in receipt of resolutions expressing indignation of the Arya Samajes at the judgment of Mr. Smith, and I have, therefore, deputed Pandit Vishnu Datta of Benares to have a special power of attorney executed in his name and then to take up the case to High Court. This man, Vishnu Datta, will be going to Jhansi for this purpose. Please help him to the best of your abilities and oblige. In the interest of the Arya Samajes we must take spirit, and, treading in the path of truth and justice and loyalty to our Government, we must not fear the high-handedness of any officer. I am sure and certain that the Government of Sir John Hewett will not allow injustice to be done to any loyal subject of His Gracious Majesty the King-Emperor, so please take heart and be up."

CITIZEN, 26th November 1908.

24. In a note dated Lahore, the 17th November, criticising the findings of the District Magistrate of Jhansi in the case of Daulat Ram, Arya Samaj preacher, the Citizen (Allahabad), of the 26th November, has the following :—

The case of Daulat Ram.

"Most curious of all is the injunction that the accused be not permitted to call sureties from his native town of Agra, but be required to produce them from amongst the people of Jhansi, to which place he is a stranger, and whose townfolk were already trembling with fear of local authorities. Sureties not being forthcoming, he was sentenced to one year's hard labour."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 26th November 1908.

25. In an article discussing capital punishment in India, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 26th November, suggests that "in order to keep pace with the onward march of time, and to prevent the slightest possibility of there being any failure of justice, it is desirable that all capital cases should only be tried by the highest tribunal in the land, the High Court, and that such sentences should be confirmed by a still higher tribunal in England."

Capital punishment in India.

The writer, while allowing that delay and expense will result, makes the following observations :—

"The delay in criminal cases, which is rather common in India, and which is so exasperating to the man in the lockup, is really due to the incompetency of the police. Houses are no doubt searched and honest and law-abiding men are inconvenienced, but the wrong-doers are very seldom caught. To minimise such delay it is not so much the forging of new weapons that is necessary as the competency of the men who have to wield such weapons."

The editor says that money should further be found to make primary education free and compulsory in this country as is the case in all civilized countries, and he suggests that the way to deal with the difficulty of an enormous increase in the students of zila schools is not to restrict the number of admissions into those schools but to divide each class into two sections, and to enlarge school buildings and increase the tutorial staff. Forced labour in India.

38. Referring to His Honour's observations in the Bareilly Darbar speech on the system of forced labour, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 22nd November, remarks that the worst of it is that neither is the payment prompt, much less sufficient, nor are only the required number of hands impressed. In any case it will be long before one can hope to see this practice abolished. "It is to be met with everywhere in large towns as much as in rural tracts; as much when the Governments, Imperial and Provincial, move down to their summer capitals as when officials are in camp on tour for ceremonial visits or inspection duty. Employers of labour have not unoften to come into collision with the underlings of the Revenue department, such as tahsil peons and jamadars, when these pounce upon whatever menials come in sight and take them away for the work of the Sirkar."

"It is needless," he says, "to detail the different forms of begar practiced. The head and front of the accusation is that whether men or animals are impressed, or supply of provisions enforced, reasonable wages or prices, as the case may be, are not forthcoming. Those thus injured do not and cannot be expected to stop to inquire who is responsible for the reduction in their legitimate demands.

Along with the most important problems affecting India, this peculiarly objectionable form of forced labour, as is in existence here, is the subject of a controversy in the British press, and it is hoped that in this championing of the cause of the ignorant but oppressed poor of India, the British public will discover one of the many causes that have brought about the present unrest, which is no mere educated Indian's dream, born of a perfervid imagination, but is rooted in the system of administration that obtains and has gone deep down into the masses."

The editor remarks that it is said that a fund for this purpose has not been started, because owing to famine His Honour the Lieutenant Governor was unable to extend his patronage to it, but he contends that, if this be a fact, then every hope of national progress and advancement, so far as Musalmans are concerned, may be abandoned. He expresses regret at the lack of sense of duty among the Muhammadans in not coming forward to subscribe for such a purpose until Government give them a lead.

Malaria and village sanitation.

41. A correspondent, writing in the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 22nd November, says that the severe and widespread ravages of malaria, which has almost proved as disastrous as the famine, have much retarded agricultural operations. The question of the ryot's physical health is much more important, for on it depends the production of the foodstuff for all the world, and the raw produce for the country's and the world's manufacture. The writer makes the following suggestions in connection with village sanitation, which, if carried out, he hopes will go a great deal to mitigate the sufferings of the poor Indian ryots :—

Construction of pakka wells from which pure water can be had; medical help by the appointment of travelling doctors, having knowledge of veterinary science also; free distribution of medicines; employment of extra compounders in every town dispensary, whose duty should be to tour in villages; improvement of village habitations; and lastly education of the villagers in sanitation and hygiene.

The Nagpur Exhibition and the Swadeshi movement

42. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 23rd November, remarks that the Nagpur Exhibition must serve as an eye-opener to those who think that co-operation between Europeans and Indians in the matter of the economic regeneration of India is impossible. In view of the practical sympathy of the Lieutenant Governor of our provinces with the swadeshi movement, of course not the fierce and vindictive boycott movement of Bengal, but the honest, peaceful and patriotic movement for reviving indigenous arts and industries, no sane person can hold that Englishmen are opposed to it. On the contrary, says the editor, we believe that there is much room for peaceful work if only we remember to be polite and moderate in all that we say and demand.

OUDH AKHBAR, 23rd November 1908.

Usurious Kabulis in India.

43. Certain persons, writing in the Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 25th November, point out the hardships and difficulties of poor people caused by the high-handedness of Kabuli traders in India. They say that these Kabulis adopt every means to extort high rates of interest from the poor villagers. The editor remarks that it is high time that steps be taken to put a stop to this form of usury, as the British Government has agreed to allow Kabulis to carry on certain trades only in India.

HINDUSTANI, 25th November 1908.

Muhammadans and fez-caps.

44. The Sahifa (Bijnor), of the 26th November, reports that two companies have been floated in Egypt for manufacturing fez-caps and that another trading company has been started in Constantinople, with a view to transact business with Muhammadan merchants in general and with the Muhammadan merchants of India in particular.

SAHIFA, 26th November 1908.

The address of this company is :

"MESSRS. MAHMOOD FAIQ AND COMPANY,
7, BAGHCHA QAPPU YALDAZ KHAN,
CONSTANTINOPLE."

The editor expresses agreement with the opinion of Munshi Mahbub Alam, the editor of the Paisa Akhbár (Lahore), that Indians should not depend upon Germany, Italy or any other foreign country, for the supply of articles manufactured there, and that a factory for the manufacture of fez-caps should be started in India with a capital of one lakh. Munshi Mahbub Alam is ready to appeal to the nation for starting a company, if his suggestions are approved.

Boycott of foreign sugar and salt.

45. One Badri Nath Sharma of Mirzapur, writing to the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), in the issue of the 27th November, makes the usual allegations about the impurity and unwholesomeness of foreign sugar and of Liverpool salt, and exhorts all Indians to refrain from using them if they want to preserve their religion.

The Moradabad City Sub-Post Office.

46. The Mukhbir-i-Alam (Moradabad), of the 24th November, suggests the desirability of the Moradabad City Sub-Post being raised to the status of a delivery office, as has been done in the case of the Aligarh City Sub-Post Office, in the interests of the trading community and of the general public.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 18th November 1908.

The Aligarh Vaidic Ashram.

47. One Khaman Singh Varma, Superintendent of the Vaidic Ashram, Aligarh, reports in the Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 18th November, that this institution had to be closed in October last, since the headmaster of the Zila High School had prohibited students reading in his school from staying there, and that, on representation to him, it was found that he had done so under orders from the District Magistrate who refused to keep open this institution even under the supervision of a trustworthy teacher of that school. The reason, says the correspondent, for placing the Vaidic Ashram under a ban seems to be that Hoti Lal had stayed there while in Aligarh, and had tried to excite its boarders against the Government in collusion with its late Superintendent, Ram Sarup.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 19th November 1908.

The Muhammadans and Austrian-made fez-caps.

48. With reference to his article regarding the boycott of Turkish caps manufactured in Austria and Italy (vide Selections No. 47, current, paragraph 61), the editor of the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), writing in the issue of the 19th November, appeals once more to the Musalmans of India to give up using goods manufactured in countries inimically disposed towards Turkey, and to adopt the use of goods prepared in countries that are in alliance with the Ottoman Empire. The editor in this connection specially recommends the use of English goods, on the ground that England has all along displayed a friendly attitude towards the Sultan. This may mean some sacrifice on the part of the purchasers, but surely no one who possesses the least sense of gratefulness, remarks the editor, will grudge it.

ADVOCATE, 22nd November 1908.

Chapter XI of the Satyarth Prakash.

49. Babu Sita Ram, B.A., Vakil, and President of the Arya Samaj, writes from Lakhimpur under date the 22nd November 1908, to the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 22nd November, a long letter in which he criticises the decision of the District Magistrate of Jhansi in the case of King-Emperor versus Daulat Ram charged under section 109, Criminal Procedure Code, which, in his opinion, is of more than an ordinary interest to the members of the Arya Samaj. As to the merits of the case he has nothing to say, except that a careful perusal of the judgment and of section 109, Criminal Procedure Code, will make it clear to every reader that the order of the District Magistrate is hardly sustainable under that section. The writer takes exception to the remarks which the District Magistrate made in connection with the eleventh chapter of the Satyarth Prakash, and expresses the opinion that Mr. J. C. Smith's observations were quite unjustifiable, and that he unconsciously gave serious offence to the members of the Arya Samaj by making a distorted use of a passage which is quite proper in its place. He then gives a translation of the entire passage, in which the so-called objectionable sentence occurs, and remarks that by no stretch of imagination can such a meaning be placed upon the sentence as was given to it, by the District Magistrate. The sentence is simply the statement of historical facts as to the position of the Arya Rajas in the ancient time, and of the subsequent degradation of their descendants owing to the defects in their character enunciated in the earlier portion of the same passage. He says that "the allegiance of native sepoys to the British rule should not depend upon the ignorance of the past history of their country, because, if it should depend upon that only, it is of a very unsubstantial nature. We Indians strongly believe that it is the fairness of British justice that has been keeping India loyal to the throne."

He hopes that His Honour will not allow such irrelevant and offending remarks in the judgment to pass unnoticed. The editor also makes the following observations in a separate note:—

"The conviction of Daulat Ram, an Arya Samaj Updeshak, has taken the people by surprise. He has not been convicted of sedition, but of being a man without any ostensible means of livelihood. Surely in this country of ascetics and men who yet know the value of work for work's sake, conviction of a man like Daulat Ram will create indignation. There is no sedition in the passage quoted by Mr. Smith, as has been ably proved by Babu Sita Ram in his letter, to which we draw the attention of the High Court. It is paying no compliment to the loyalty of Indian soldiers to say that discourses like those of Daulat Ram are likely to create disaffection in them."

ARYA MITRA, 24th November 1908.

Chapter XI of the Satyarth Prakash.

50. The Arya Mitra (Agra), of the 24th November, reports that, at the Arya Samaj meetings at Lakhimpur, Amroha and Manpura, resolutions to the following effect were passed :—

"That the Arya Samaj expresses sorrow at the unfavourable remarks passed by the District Magistrate of Jhansi upon a passage of the eleventh chapter of the Satyarth Prakash in the course of his judgment in the case of King-Emperor versus Daulat Ram.

That the District Magistrate's remarks are based upon a misconception, and are calculated to hurt the feelings of the Arya Samajists.

That neither the eleventh chapter nor any other chapter of the Satyarth Prakash is objectionable.

And that there is no passage in the whole book which, taken with the context, could be said to be objectionable."

Re-arrest of Charu Chandra Roy.

1. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, referring to the re-arrest of Charu Chandra Roy, remarks that the Government is determined to "send to hell" all the accused in the Alipur bomb case by exerting all the means in its power. SWARAJYA, 21st November 1908.

The cremation of Satyendra Nath Bose.

2. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, while referring to the statement of the Alipur Jail authorities that corpses of criminals sentenced to death in England are not handed over to their relatives but are buried in the jail, remarks that this may be true, but that in England people of good families are not dragged to the gallows. The editor, in a subsequent note, deprecates Satyendra Nath's attempts to appeal to the Privy Council, urging that a man, when he has committed a crime, should not weep like a woman, although it is a great sin to kill a fellow-being. SWARAJYA, 21st November 1908.

Untrustworthiness of police reports as illustrated by the Midnapur case.

3. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 21st November, while referring to the acquittal of a large number of the accused in the Midnapur case, advises District Officers to keep their eyes wide open and not to depend entirely on the untrustworthy reports of the police. The editor further advises them to associate with the popular leaders so that they may have more opportunity to know fully their thoughts and feelings. RAHBAR, 21st November 1908.

Poems advocating swadeshi and swaraj.

4. The following is a translation of an effusion on the political situation in India appearing in the Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November :— SWARAJYA, 21st November 1908.

By Sher Singh, Shamim, of Gaura:

"Our unavailing sighs have as yet been ineffective.
The King is not, as yet, aware of our (deplorable) condition.
We have no knowledge of what is in store for us.
We are being plundered, but we do not realize it.
People in India have become enamoured of swadeshi products.
Foreign-made articles can find no market here.
Foreigners are exploiting the wealth of the country
(While) the Indians are becoming beggars and penniless.
We cannot be daunted or unmanned by the misfortunes which befall (a nation) demanding its rights.
(Our) backs have become bowed by the weight of oppression, O ! Shamim,
But still we do not see the glances of mercy (are not treated mercifully)."

By Fariyad :

"We shall not rest content, till we have got swaraj,
A man who does not aspire to it, cannot be called a man.
We do not care for our lives, if we are to gain freedom.
We are not afraid that the enemy will deprive us of our lives.
The man who is ignorant of the condition of his country Lives in the grave, although (he moves) in the world."

By Chakhta :

"We have been reduced to slavery, there is no doubt about it,
We do not see any means of salvation before us (in our power).
Foreigners may go through the history of the nation (?)
But all that we can see is that our beloved has no waist (?),
Our household goods have been sacrificed in pursuance of a foreigner's policy.
We are being exploited, but we have no knowledge of it.
Even hunger does not relieve us of our troubles;
O ! what should we do ?
Owing to weakness we cannot even undertake a journey."

By Khaksár :

" A man devoid of the passion of patriotism is not a human being, and
He cannot be called a product of the garden of India.
If you are endowed with life, then sacrifice your lives for the country.
Die if you cannot help (your country).
How long will you trample on us by your oppression,
O ! tyrants, have you not the fear of God ?
(See) how we, too, shall sacrifice our lives for India.
If you have no fear, we too are dauntless.
But here (?) the case is quite different.
They are not concerned with anything but money and gold.
O! Indians, without (pushing forward) the swadeshi and the boycott movements.
You will not get even the hundredth part of the rights you demand.
May his face burn who forgets swadeshi for a minute, or does not repeat it day and night.
Our dwelling-houses have been taken away from us.
The house tax means that the houses do not belong to us.
In short, Khaksár, the times are very wonderful.
We are being exploited, but we have no knowledge of it."

By Bedil :

" A man who has not in view the interests of his nation
He is no better than a dog—he is not a human being.
Why do you not favour the swadeshi movement ?
It is a profitable transaction, but you do not know it.
Think twice before treading the road to martyrdom.
This headache cannot be cured without chopping off the head.
Sighs (it is said) reach the highest heavens,
But they cannot pass through the threshold of the tyrants.
Why should Indians put up with disgrace; they are men,
Have they not got a heart and a liver within their bodies?
Your want of kindness is more than apparent,
Why do you not say plainly you have not at heart the interests of Indians.
Howsoever the foreigners may identify themselves with us, still they are foreigners all the same.
Never think that a single individual of them is not perfidious.
Till yesterday we used to fear that Indians have no hearts, but now we find that they have no livers."

By Pandit Sita Ram, Hashar, editor of the Swarajya :

" It is not our intention to enter upon hostilities ;
But what should we do, these tyrants do not keep quiet.
Men who are not deterred from working oppression,
They have neither the fear of God nor of the Day of Judgment.
We say this openly : we have neither fear nor alarm :
'Either we shall be no more to-day, or the head of the enemy.'
Now it is the rupture of the spleen, and next there is the plea of insanity.
Morning has not yet dawned on the night of oppression.
Either you should perish or array yourself in the field of battle.
There is no effective remedy besides this.
In a year, Sir, you are at your wit's end,
You may expect something more ; if you are not satisfied
You may imprison us or torture us,
Or hang us (but) we have no objection (to that).
You send a man to jail for speaking the truth,
Is this not sheer unreasonableness on your part ?
No one has at heart the interests of the Indians,
To whom should we complain ? There is no just person.

Hundreds have come here and have been ruined,
It is not very easy to live in such a house.
They are dying of starvation, but still they say shamelessly :
'The swadeshi has yet borne no fruit.'
We are the breakers of the lines, we shall array ourselves (for battle),
Have we not a heart and a liver in our bodies?
It is the fellows who say "ji huzur" who may be timorous;
But we shall remain dauntless even if you hang us.
We do not care a bit about the rival, O! Hashar,
If these men have no fear of the Day of Judgment."

Causes of the unrest in India during the years 1907-8.

5. In continuation of his article entitled "Causes of the Unrest in India During the Years 1907-8" (vide Selections No. 48, current, paragraph 4), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), writing in the issue of the 24th November, refutes the arguments advanced by the Advocate General who prosecuted Bahadur Shah before a military tribunal immediately after the Mutiny. The editor confines himself to that portion of the Advocate General's argument which holds Muhammadans responsible for the Mutiny, not on grounds of religious scruples but with the hope of regaining their lost political supremacy.

AL BASHIR, 24th November 1908.

Suppression of anarchism in Bengal.

6. The Anand (Lucknow), of the 26th November, says that since the anarchists in Bengal are enemies of Government and of society alike, both Europeans and Indians should take measures to exterminate them. The editor remarks that they seem to have no definite object, and that they indulge in bloodshed for its own sake; for, had their aim been the attainment of political rights, they would have been satisfied by the King-Emperor's gracious message on the occasion of the Proclamation Jubilee, in which His Majesty recognizes the necessity of representative form of Government being extended to India. He notes that the repressive measures which the Government has under consideration will be to the detriment of the entire Indian people, and therefore the well-wishers of the country would do well to uphold the cause of law and order and to co-operate with the Government in suppressing anarchism.

ANAND, 26th November 1908.

Government and the anarchists.

7. The Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 28th November, says that "not only all loyal subjects of His Majesty the King-Emperor, but every human being, except the crazy anarchists themselves, will gladly welcome the promulgation of severe and effective measures to restore tranquillity to this unfortunate country which suffers so much already from oft-recurring famines, plague, and other deadly epidemics."

"What earthly use or benefit" asks the editor," can there be in assassinating Government officials and other peaceful residents in India, none but the most criminal and bloodthirsty lunatics can answer. The madness and stupidity of the anarchist movement in India are apparent to all except raving lunatics and desperate criminals, including the crazy anarchists themselves.

The dastardly attempt on the life of a kind and sympathetic ruler, coupled with the cowardly murder of Sub-Inspector Banarji, have resulted in creating a stronger revulsion than ever from the sinister and contemptible policy of violence, and from all those forms of agitation which have stirred up in Bengal a homicidal mania wholly alien to the natural disposition of the people. The anarchist propaganda, however, has evidently spread deeper and wider than anyone supposed. The law will perform its part in ridding society of the forces of disorder, but the only means of effecting their thorough eradication is the determination of all right-thinking men to restore discipline among the young, and to set themselves inflexibly against all that makes for morbid discontent and violence."

HINDOSTHAN, 28th November 1908.

Suggestions for pacifying Bengal.

8. The Riyaz-i-Faiz (Pilibhit), of the 28th November, while referring to the various measures adopted by the Government for the pacification of Bengal and their failure, remarks that the only way in which it could be done would be to proclaim an amnesty to all political offenders and to annul the partition of Bengal, by which the confidence of the Bengalis in the Government will be restored.

RIYAZ-I-FAIZ, 28th November 1908.

ABHYUDAYA, 20th November 1908.

The Anglo-Indian press and the situation in Bengal.

9. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 20th November (received on the 28th idem), while in no way minimising the dangerous nature of the recent acts of anarchism, says that they should not cause the Government to lose its balance of mind, for panic would not help it in suppressing such crimes. It is but in the fitness of things and very necessary that the wrong-doers should be severely dealt with under the law, but at the same time it is equally necessary that means should be devised to prevent such crimes altogether. The editor notes that the repressive measures which have been taken for sometime past have produced their effect, and the result has been, what was apprehended by the leaders of the country and the Indian press, that by these measures the discontent will be only driven underground to assume a more serious form. He remarks that, although experience has proved that rigorous measures did not help in remedying the evil, and on the contrary they have made it assume a more horrible form, still the Anglo-Indian papers are exciting the Government to take yet more rigorous measures. If the Government, he adds, will act upon their unwholesome advice, it will undoubtedly lead to deplorable results. He therefore warns the Government against listening to the counsels of the Anglo-Indian press, and advises it to follow those of the Indian leaders who urge the removal of the causes of the evil as the surest means of stamping it out.

ABHYUDAYA, 20th November 1908.

The present political situation in India.

10. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 20th November (received on the 28th idem), says:—"At the present time in India there is going on a great struggle between the bureaucracy and the people, and it will continue until the latter gain their end, which is the attainment of self-government within the Empire. It is for the good of both the parties that this struggle should be a peaceful one, but this is impossible unless either party takes measures to make it so. In this connection it is incumbent on the Government that its one sole aim should be the securing of the contentment and happiness of the people by administering the country according to their wishes. In this lies the power of the Government, and it is the disregard of the public opinion that has created its present difficulties. The Government, moreover, should not take the desire of the people for liberty to be sedition, but should look upon it in the light of a pious and praiseworthy sentiment, and it should allow them to adopt all those constitutional methods which are calculated to fit them for the attainment of liberty.

As to the duties of the people, they should bend all their energy on social reform, and should at the same time carry on agitation on constitutional lines for the grant of their political rights. The leaders should foster the growing spirit of nationalism in the country and direct it into righteous and useful channels for the good of their countrymen. In short the following measures should be taken in each and every district:—

(1) propagation of swadeshism and of the sentiment of nationalism, encouragement of indigenous arts and industries and the cultivation of land on improved scientific lines;
(2) dissemination of education by means of conferences, lectures and pamphlets;
(3) establishment of arbitration courts;
(4) promulgation of general and technical education on national lines;
(5) the taking of measures for the improvement of sanitation and public health;
(6) practice of domestic economy and the adoption of social reforms; and
(7) cultivation of unity and righteousness among the people."

ANAND, 3rd December 1908.

The present political situation in India.

11. The Anand (Lucknow), of the 3rd December, says that the present unrest in India cannot be removed unless the system of Government obtaining in the country is considerably reformed. The editor observes that on account of their ignorance of the sentiments of the Indians the rulers often commit very serious blunders which go to create unrest in the country. Moreover, they commit the mistake of taking the aristocracy of the country to be the representatives of the masses, whereas in reality it is the middle class which is and can be their representatives in all matters concerning their welfare. In conclusion, he says, that the views of the rulers as to the efficacy of repressive measures in suppressing political unrest are incorrect, as they are increasing it all the more, and he advises conciliatory and merciful treatment of Indians as the surest means of pacifying them and of securing their unswerving loyalty to the British Crown.

The present political situation in India.

12. Discussing the situation in India, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 3rd December, remarks that the portion of the official communique to the effect that relations between Whitehall and Calcutta are on a very satisfactory basis was hardly necessary. Such differences are usually of rare occurrence and in time of trouble in India are non-existent. There is at present no possible comparison between the troublesome times of the Mutiny and the recent period of excitement caused by the appearance of political crime in India. And yet in some respects the two periods are to some extent similar. In 1857 there was no general rising against British rule. The same has been the case latterly. The present troubles cannot be considered a revolution nor could the Mutiny be so considered. The masses were then as unaffected as they are now, and the ruling princes rallied in a body round the paramount power. Bengalis, however, at the present day, are viewed with suspicion as a body. This was not the case fifty years ago. As a people the Bengalis, the editor maintains, are just what they were in the dark days of the Mutiny, and are as indignant as the rest of India at the terrorist movement. But now who will discriminate between the terrorist and the law-abiding as far as they are concerned? Sir Andrew Fraser did so in an eminent degree and Sir John Prescott Hewett has shown his willingness to do the same by the noble way in which he refuted the calumny of a high official on the whole student community. The assurance, the editor remarks, may be freely given that all India is content to accept British rule, and that if ever that rule is shaken the people of India will not be to blame.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 3rd December 1908.

Indian students and political crimes.

13. The editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), in the issue of the 3rd December, under the heading "Education in India", says that "there cannot be any doubt in the mind of any thoughtful, intelligent person that there are two causes for the disgraceful behaviour of so many Indian students during the last three years. One is that it is the inevitable result of a purely secular education, and this result has not been confined to India. Many men educated in Europe by teachers of high intellectual attainments are seen to conduct themselves in a most ungentlemanly manner, and some of the most dangerous anarchists and agitators in India have been educated in England and have actually passed the Civil Service and other really difficult examinations in England.

The other cause for the disgraceful crimes so frequently attempted and committed by Indian students was very clearly pointed out by Mr. Jacob in his appeal for mercy to Mr. Justice Stephen on behalf of Jotendra Nath Chaudhari. This is indeed the chief cause of the present outbreak of crime among the youths of Bengal, and is nothing less than the deadly poison squirted out by Bengali papers such as the Yugantar, Sandhya, &c., which ought to have been suppressed long ago. That such papers were not suppressed at the beginning of their existence is indeed a marvel and a mystery to all loyal subjects of the Government."

HINDOSTHAN, 3rd December 1908.

Necessity for the political emancipation of India.

14. For the political emancipation of India, says the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 4th December, it is extremely essential that the people should be animated with an irrepressible desire for its attainment. This desire should be of so intense a nature that the people in its satisfaction should never turn from encountering any misfortune and making any self-sacrifice whatsoever. Its intensity should be commensurate to the difficulty of the task to be accomplished. It should be of so engrossing a character as to leave no room for any other feelings such as fear, greed, selfishness.

As to how this intense passion should be infused into the minds of the people, it is absolutely necessary that they should compare their present condition with their past glory, or with the condition of the civilized countries of the present day, and that will inspire patriotism in their hearts and a desire to serve their country at the sacrifice of everything, body, mind and wealth. It is the lack of self-respect and of physical and intellectual powers which is responsible for the present degradation of Indians, and it is the cultivation of these qualities by Indians that will make them fit for the attainment of political emancipation, which means the complete right of the people to administer their country through their representatives. The people are not possessed of political emancipation under the rule of a King of their own country, if he does not govern according to the wishes of the people, but it will be real political emancipation even under a foreign Sovereign if the administration is carried on in accordance with their wishes. Although a few Indians consider that such a political emancipation is impossible in India under a foreign rule, yet the bulk of the people believe in its attainment, and the possession of the right of self-government within the British Empire by Canada and other colonies warrant that they are correct in their belief.

ABHYUDAYA, 4th December 1908.

SWARAJYA, 21st November 1908.

Review of its first year's existence by the Swarajya.

15. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, publishes in its editorial a review of its work during the first year of its existence. The services rendered by it to the cause of Indian regeneration during this short period, "cannot be easily forgotten by any one," and, although it received but scant support from the general public, yet its workers remained faithful to their self-imposed labour of love, thereby securing the desired end. They had to sacrifice at the altar of "Mother India" two of their most zealous workers, Shanti Narayan and Babu Ram Hari, who proved themselves objects of hatred to the British Government. But, notwithstanding all these prosecutions, the faithful hands of its devoted workers will continue to conduct it on the same independent lines. It will expose with the same truth and vehemence the tyrannous deeds of the officials, and support swadeshi, boycott and national education with the same warmth.

MUSAFIR, 30th November 1908.

Prosecution of the Swarajya and its effects.

16. While pointing out that the editorial chair of the Swarajya (Allahabad), has again been occupied by a third editor, Pandit Sita Ram Hashar, the editor of the Musáfir (Agra), in the issue of the 30th November, remarks that the Government will probably be at a loss to understand how the Swarajya could keep up its existence and its fearless tone after seeing the sad fate of two of its former editors.

He says that the reason is not far to seek. It is the obvious consequence of the repressive policy of Government, which is injurious to the rulers and the ruled alike, and advises both to hit upon a compromise.

SWARAJYA, 21st November 1908.

Repressive measures to check sedition in Bengal.

17. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, deprecates the advice given by the Empire to the Government to adopt repressive measures in order to suppress sedition in Bengal, and says that such a policy has been vigorously followed for a long time and has not succeeded, as is evident from the respect paid to the corpse of Kanai Lal Dutt.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 1st December 1908.

Repressive measures to check sedition in Bengal.

18. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 1st December, publishes a vigorous defence of the repressive measures adopted by Government to suppress anarchism, remarking that Government has been driven to have recourse to them by the misdeeds of the Bengali anarchists.

ABHYUDAYA, 4th December 1908.

Repressive measures to check sedition in Bengal.

19. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 4th December, says that all people in India are exercised at the present serious situation in India, but that the measures, which the Anglo-Indian papers and associations urge the Government to adopt for the repression of crime and anarchy in the country are quite the reverse of what the Indian press and the Indian leaders consider to be the best means for their suppression. The Anglo-Indians advocate such measures as might strike terror into the hearts of the people, while the Indian opinion is in favour of those which might bring about tranquillity and good feeling in the country, and indeed the present circumstances are such as assure the superiority of a pacifying policy over that of repression in producing beneficial results.

ABHYUDAYA, 4th December 1908.

Repressive measures to check sedition in Bengal.

20. Notwithstanding the writings in the Anglo-Indian papers and the representations from Anglo-Indian Associations on the need for the adoption of exceptional repressive measures, the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 4th December, fails to understand the necessity and the utility of such measures to the Government, considering that it is not so much the punishment of offenders as their detection which is so embarrassing to the Government. The editor asks whether the proposed measures will be effective in the matter of detection of crime, and if not, he doubts whether summary trials, which by their very nature afford no protection to the innocent, are necessary, when it is known that the existing law is fully adequate for the punishment of the guilty. He remarks that no one can take any objection to the extermination of anarchists, who are like a contaminating member of society that must needs be cut off, but that the application of the proposed measures will also affect that portion of society which is sound and whole, which is calculated to aggravate the disease and make its treatment almost hopeless. The Government should certainly stamp out anarchist conspiracies, but at the same time it should make such reforms as may remove the discontent of which they are the outward symptoms.

ADVOCATE, 29th November 1908.

The British press on the King's Proclamation.

21. In a leading article entitled "Ideal or Charter", the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 29th November, refers to various articles on the condition of India that appeared in the English press on the eve of the King-Emperor's Proclamation. In particular he quotes at length from contributions by Mr. Nevinson and Mr. Ratcliffe. He then goes on to discuss the means of remedying the present situation. He notes that personal as the British Government is in India the success or failure of any remedy adopted is more a question of personality than of system. Curiously elastic is the method of administration in India that admits of the introduction of a scheme of local self-government by a Lord Ripon and its practical revocation by a Lord Curzon. The serious situation that has arisen is more acute now than was the case fifty years ago. Then some discontented princes and a few sepoys revolted, but now the classes feel the indignity of political slavery, unrest prevails and the masses groan under increasing poverty. So Lord Minto grasps the helm when the ship of State has drifted amongst shoals and quicksands. At a former crisis in the history of British India the Queen approved of and adopted conciliatory measures as proposed by her minister in India, with the result that harmony soon prevailed and the clemency of the Great Queen was enshrined in the hearts of a grateful people. The editor hopes in conclusion that any measures now adopted and any laws passed will be merely a case of history repeating itself to secure the peace and contentment of India and give a further proof of the justice of British rule.

OUDH AKHBAR, 1st December 1908.

The King's message.

22. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 1st December, while referring to the reception accorded to the King's message by the people of India, remarks that the number of the disaffected few who regard it as "thin and spiritless" is very small. On the other hand, the number of those men who regard it as a solemn confirmation of the promises made in the past is very large. The editor notes with satisfaction the many promises which have been redeemed by the Government in the past, and the glorious future of the country under its benign influence in the future. In conclusion he has a word of advice for the disaffected. He asks them to utilize their energies in developing the industrial resources of the country and not to fritter them away in thoughtless and aimless agitation, which is calculated only to retard the progress of their country.

ABHYUDAYA, 20th November 1908.

The Indian National Congress.

23. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 20th November (received on the 28th idem), contains an article on the Congress in which the editor expresses his full confidence in the ability of the Congress to obtain the political rights of the Indians by means of constitutional methods. He remarks that the opinion of the Congress will carry more weight with the British public and thereby constrain the British Government to grant substantial and important concessions to the Indians, if only it becomes a truly representative assembly, all communities of India joining it without exception.

He emphasizes the importance of the forthcoming session of the Congress in view of the proposed reforms being soon announced by Lord Morley, and urges all classes of Indians to lend it their unqualified support in order to make it a success.

AL BASHIR, 24th November 1908.

Muhammadans and the Indian National Congress.

24. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 24th November, referring to the decision of some of the Muhammadans of Behar to join the Indian National Congress, on the ground that it is purged of its Extremist element now, remarks that this change in the attitude of Muhammadans towards this political body is due to the discouraging reply of His Excellency the Governor of Bombay to the deputation that waited upon him sometime ago. The editor, however, is of opinion that Moderates are almost as dangerous as the Extremists and should be avoided consequently. In one sense Extremists are less to be feared than Moderates. For, while the former make no secret of their professions, the latter consistently practise a policy of duplicity. Further, he remarks that Sir Saiyid's policy leaves no room to doubt that association with both is equally detrimental to the interests of the Muhammadans. Consistency and the desire for self-preservation therefore demand that Muhammadans should maintain their policy of complete isolation from Hindus in the matter of political agitation.

ADVOCATE, 26th November 1908.

Sir Pherozshah Mehta on the Congress.

25. Commenting on Sir Pherozshah Mehta's letter to the Hon'ble Mr. Bhupendra Nath Bose, dated the 12th November, in which the writer expresses his views regarding the proposed Congress compromise, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 26th November, remarks that Sir Pherozshah Mehta gives eloquent expression to the feelings of the majority of the delegates of the Surat Conference who assembled after the breaking up of the session to devise means to carry on the political war. Many people, the editor notes, object to the constitution framed for the Congress by fifty persons who met in committee at Allahabad last Easter. To appoint a committee to draw up rules for the guidance of the members of Congress and then to refuse to be bound by these rules he considers ridiculous in the extreme. A constitution was framed and all those interested in the Congress must now abide by it. Provincial committees might be formed and their resolutions referred to an all-India committee for approval, but political progress is impossible unless the different provinces accept the rulings of the central committee.

HINDUSTANI. 2nd December 1908.

Sir Pherozshah Mehta on the Congress.

26. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 2nd December, publishes a translation of Sir Pherozshah Mehta's letter addressed to the Hon'ble Bhupendra Nath Bose and reproduces the observations made by the editor in the issue of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 29th November.

ABHYUDAYA, 20th November 1908.

Mr. Gandhi and the Transvaal Government.

27. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 20th November (received on the 28th idem), publishes a poem in which the writer eulogizes Mr. Gandhi for his bold stand against the ill-treatment of Indians by the Transvaal Government.

SWARAJYA, 21st November 1908.

The teachings of the Bhagwat Gita.

28. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, while commenting on a passage in the Bhagwat Gita in which Krishna severely reproves Arjuna for feeling the qualms of conscience in waging war against the elders of his own family, remarks :—

"Manliness is an essential attribute of manhood. It is the motive force which prevents man from shirking difficulties and keeps him to his post in the field of battle. When a country is in the throes of revolution, when its people are ready to throw off the bonds of slavery and breathe once more as free men, the faint-hearted, caring only for their personal safety, do not seize the opportunity at this critical moment and thereby plunge their country in the slough of despair.

Five thousand years ago the preacher of revolution (Krishna) uttered these memorable words to arouse the cooling courage of the redoubtable Arjuna, and although the times and conditions have past by they still hold good. The 'avatar of revolution' (Krishna), addresses them not only to Arjuna, but to all those persons who are callous to the public good, and are bent solely on self-aggrandizement. Persons who betray the cause of their people will be condemned by God to everlasting damnation."

The editor then proceeds to show that such persons will not only incur Divine punishment, but will be looked upon with contempt by their own fellowmen and even by their own progeny. But if they espouse the popular cause, they will be hailed as leaders by thousands of people and earn their everlasting gratitude. Then follows an exhortation to the Hindus to imitate the glorious deeds of their Aryan ancestors and try to live and die free men and thus prove to the world, especially America, Transvaal and Australia, that they are men and deserve to be treated as such. In conclusion the editor exhorts the people to be brave, patriotic and determined to hold their own against the heaviest odds. If they persevere in doing so, Australia will not be closed to them, Transvaal will not be able to impose upon them the ignominy of thumb-impressions, no Curzon will have the audacity to call them and their ancestors untruthful, and no one will be able to look upon them with contempt.

29. "Now that the portals of the India Office have been thrown open to Indians," says the editor of the Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), writing in the issue of the 30th November, "it is necessary that their claims for representation on the Viceroy's Executive Council should be carefully considered. The appointment of two Indians to the Council has decisively proved that race or creed can be no bar to official preferment. This victory of principle is due to the systematic agitation which is enjoined even by Christ, when he says 'Knock and it shall be opened, Seek and ye shall find.'"

The appointment of an Indian member to the Viceroy's Executive Council.

OUDH AKHBAR, 30th November 1908.

Referring to the rumours that Mr. Justice Mukharji of the Calcutta High Court will be appointed a member of the Viceroy's Executive Council, and to the technical objection raised by the Englishman of his not being a Barrister, remarks that this is the usual way in which Anglo-Indian papers comment on such appointments, and therefore deserve little attention. The editor expresses the opinion that the man selected for the post must be one who combines ability with patriotism, and not one who barters his talents for the loaves and fishes of office. He moreover says that the race question should not be emphasized at this critical moment, as the agitation is for the recognition of a principle, which is that of the ability of Indians to hold the highest and the most responsible appointments in the administration of the country.

30. With reference to His Excellency's remarks in the reply to the Taluqdars' address at Lucknow that His Lordship himself being a landowner can well appreciate the difficulties which mistaken legislation may impose upon both the landlord and tenant, the editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), in the issue of the 1st December, observes:—

The Viceroy and the Taluqdars' address.

HINDOSTHAN, 1st December 1908.

"Surely this is not a compliment at all for the Deputy of the King-Emperor to confine his interest to the community of landowners. His Excellency's unbounded clemency should be one and the same for every Indian subject individually, whether poor or rich, and therefore the Taluqdari Association should have alluded only to those acts of generosity and benevolence of the Viceroy which have benefited the whole country and all castes and creeds; but their gratitude should not have been confined to the special acts of kindness which has been shown to their own Taluqdari community."

As to the Taluqdars' assurance to His Excellency that His Majesty the King-Emperor had no subjects more devoted, dutiful and loyal than the Taluqdars of Oudh, he remarks:—

"Bravo, a true loyal subject could never think that he was second to anybody in the world. But if the anarchists had been successful, which God forbid, then perhaps our address might have been differently worded."

31. In an article entitled "The Service Craze", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 3rd December, remarks that India, next to China, is the country where the craze for Government service is greatest. In India natives of all parts of the country, except of Gujrat, scramble for employment. This is so much the case in the Punjab that there are very few left to devote themselves to commercial enterprises. And this cannot be for the interests of the country. In Bengal, the province that has been so long the cradle of the ideal Government clerk, the pendulum has now taken a swing in the opposite direction, though Government itself, through eyeing all Bengalis with suspicion, may to some extent be responsible for this. The editor refers to a series of articles that recently appeared in a French paper pointing out that the damage to a country is inestimable when its youth and manhood fight for ill-paid Government posts instead of devoting themselves to developing the resources of the country. In conclusion the editor wonders if this matter came up before the Decentralization Commission for serious consideration.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 3rd December 1908.

The awakening of Islam.

32. In an article entitled "The Awakening of Islam", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 3rd December, discusses the relations between Turkey and Austria, and points out that Islam is awakening all over the world. In Turkey, Persia, and Egypt there are signs of the new spirit and sooner or later the leaven must reach the Musalmans of India. In India the spirit of the times asserted itself in the shape of passive resistance or boycott, and according to one official theory at least boycott is the first step in the direction of swaraj. In Turkey events occurred in the reverse order. The constitution came first and boycott is only now appearing. There boycott is not the active expression of passive resistance but a token of the people's strong resentment. The case, of course, is quite the contrary in India. The papers, the editor notes, accuse Great Britain of fomenting trouble in the Balkans and of inciting the Turkish boycott. One is tempted to speculate, he remarks, in conclusion, as to the feelings of British manufacturers in respect to the boycott movement in India.

ABHYUDAYA, 4th December 1908.

Bengalis and the Viceroy's visit to Lucknow.

33. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 4th December, referring to the notice which, it is said, was issued by the shopkeepers of Lucknow for providing accommodation to spectators in their shops on the occasion of the recent Viceregal procession in that city, and in which it is said that Bengalis were forbidden from applying for accommodation, says that this must have been done at the direction of some person or other, for otherwise there seems to be no reason why this invidious distinction should have been made. The editor remarks that to treat all Bengalis as suspects for the fault of a few misguided youths among them is contrary both to reason and justice, and that the officials who permit such a state of affairs are doing a good deal of harm to the Government, for, if all Bengalis are to be distrusted and put to unjustifiable trouble, the result will be that their entire community will turn against the Government, which is calculated to be equally detrimental to the interests of the rulers and the ruled.

II.—Afghanistan and Trans-Frontier.

MUSAFIR, 30th November 1908.

The inroads of Frontier tribes.

34. Referring to the inroads of the Pathans on the Frontier, the editor of the Musáfir (Agra), in the issue of the 30th November, remarks that the Government has now had sufficient experience of the doings of these tribesmen, and the only safeguard against their inroads is to drive these people out once for all and to annex the portion of the country inhabited by them.

III.—Native States.

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 24th November and 1st December 1908.

The Arya Samaj of Jodhpur.

35. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), has the following in its combined issue of the 24th November and 1st December :—

"Munshi Ram complains in the Arya Patrika that when the Viceroy visited Jodhpur the State Police ordered the Secretary of the Arya Samaj to remove the signboards of the Samaj and its Girls' School, so that His Excellency may not be displeased by seeing it when passing by that road, as the Arya Samajists are rebels. The policemen were asses. Great men never take note of insignificant things."

British justice in India.

36. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, while giving an account of the alleged ill-treatment of a tailor in Nowshera (Punjab) by a Magistrate, remarks that this will be a good example for those persons who believe in British justice.

37. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, thanks its constituents who had offered to subscribe for the defence of Babu Ram Hari, who is being tried for sedition, and says that the Babu does not like to waste the hard-earned money of his constituents in his defence, but would be pleased if they were to support the Swarajya more warmly.

The editor of the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), in the issue of the 26th November, invites attention of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces to the apology tendered by Fazl-ul-Hassan, Hasrat Mohani, the editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla (Aligarh), and requests that His Honour should exercise his prerogative of mercy and grant him a pardon.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 26th November 1908.

The case against the editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla.

39. Referring to the conviction of Jotendra Nath Roy Chaudhari for the attempt on Sir Andrew Fraser's life, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 29th November, remarks :—

ADVOCATE, 29th November 1908.

The trial of Jotendro Nath Roy Chaudhari.

"It must here be said that justice has been done pretty swiftly, though not summarily—a fact that should silence the hysteric cry for summary methods of trial which would mean no fair trial. In no cases more than in those where political offenders are tried is there so great need of following the adage : 'Let justice reign though the heavens fall.'"

40. While protesting against the order of the District Magistrate of Jhansi rejecting the surety offered for Pandit Daulat Ram from Agra, the editor of the Musáfir (Agra), in the issue of the 30th November, prays His Honour the Lieutenant Governor to take pity on the unfortunate prisoner and his family and to set aside the order of the Magistrate.

MUSAFIR, 30th November 1908.

Conviction of Daulat Ram at Jhansi.

41. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 2nd December, publishes a translation of the judgment of the District Magistrate of Jhansi in the case of King-Emperor versus Daulat Ram charged under section 109, Criminal Procedure Code, and reproduces the observations made by the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 22nd November on the case. The editor observes that there is nothing seditious in the so-called objectionable passage which can excite the native sepoys to withdraw their allegiance from British rule, as the sentence referred to is simply the statement of historical facts.

HINDUSTANI, 2nd December 1908.

Conviction of Daulat Ram at Jhansi.

He says that an appeal ought to be filed in the High Court at once by the Arya Samaj.

(b)—Police.

42. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 20th November (received on the 28th idem), says that the Midnapur conspiracy case is an apt illustration of the evil consequences of taking action merely on the reports of detectives. The editor refers to the breakdown of the case after Rakhal Chandra had retracted his statement and remarks that it is time to think over the consequences of this affair. Will not the people think, he asks, that now the honour and personal liberty of no individual can be safe and that the police can put handcuffs on any person and send him to a lock-up. It is needless to mention what will be the feelings of those persons towards the Government who were arrested in this case. It cannot be expected that they will be inspired with confidence and good feelings towards those who distrusted and put them to trouble. It is an unfortunate matter, he says, that authorities have begun to suspect respectable persons on the most flimsy grounds. In many places respectable persons are dogged by detectives as if they were thieves and bad characters. These detectives, he adds, do not generally belong to the higher classes of society. It is certainly their duty to carry sensational reports to the Government, but they should not manufacture them, though it is evident that several of them take it to be a part of their duty to do so. How is it to be expected from such persons, the editor asks, that they should make true reports to the Government. It is they who prejudice the authorities against the leaders of the people, with the result that the former distrust the latter, and rely solely on detectives for information. And what these detectives can do is evident from the Rawalpindi lawyers' case, the Etawah conspiracy and the Midnapur conspiracy cases. He remarks that these incidents would have never happened had there been mutual trust between officials and the representatives of the people, and had the words of the latter been given greater credence than the reports of the detectives.

The appointment of a paid Chairman for the Allahabad Municipality.

43. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, while referring to the appointment of a paid Chairman for the Allahabad Municipality, remarks that this post has only been created to support Europeans, as the Collector has been doing the work satisfactorily for so many years and there was no accumulation of work.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 24th November 1908.

The constitution of the Octroi Commission.

44. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 24th November, complains that the Octroi Commission sitting at Cawnpore is composed mainly of Europeans and Indians who are in no way representative of the tax-payers. The constitution of the Commission would suggest that it will recommend the enhancement of the octroi tax instead of its abolition. It would be a great calamity, says the writer, if the other necessities of life too were to become as dear as foodstuffs and he recommends the appointment of capable men as members of the Commission.

ADVOCATE, 26th November 1908.

Travelling allowance to non-official chairmen of district and local boards in Bengal.

45. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 26th November, has the following:—"Non-official chairmen of district and local boards, and non-official vice-chairmen of the latter in Bengal are to be allowed to draw travelling allowance for journeys undertaken in the interest of the boards and in the discharge of duties entrusted to them by the Act. This is a very sensible concession granted none too soon."

NASIM-I-AGRA, 30th November 1908.

Assessment of water-rates in the Agra Municipality.

46. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 30th November, complains that the recent assessment of water-rates in Agra is very heavy and that its collection has been commenced, although many people have preferred appeals to the higher authorities against the assessing officers. The editor further complains that the road leading to the Murdaghat (place of cremation) is in a very bad state of repair, and that people using the road at night are put to much trouble.

MASHRIQ, 1st December 1908.

Mischief by monkeys in towns.

47. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 1st December, complains that the number of monkeys in many towns such as Benares, Muttra and Ajodhya, is daily increasing, and recommends that, as they do a lot of mischief, their destruction should be undertaken by the municipalities concerned, without the least regard to the prejudices of uneducated Hindus.

Muhammadan students and the new rules regarding the admission of students in District Schools.

48. Referring to the new rules regarding the admission of a limited number of students in District Schools, the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), writing in the issue of the 24th November, suggests that the All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference should consider the advisability of asking the authorities to fix the number of Muhammadan students in each class with a view to preventing their being outnumbered by Hindu boys.

AL BASHIR, 24th November 1908.

Muhammadan Fellows of the Allahabad University.

49. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 24th November, remarks that, in view of the fact that Muhammadans are not sufficiently represented on the Syndicate of the Allahabad University, it is desirable that the three Muhammadan Fellows, whose terms have just expired, should be re-elected, and that the place of Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk should be filled up by the appointment of Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk as a Fellow of the Allahabad University.

50. The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 29th November, notes with approval the suggestion of the Calcutta Trades' Association that Indians should be given State technical scholarships abroad to be trained as mining and electrical engineers. This suggestion was made in reply to a question raised by the Bengal Government, which, the editor remarks, is always ready to consult competent opinion in deciding on new departures for the furtherance of industry. As young men cannot get a sound practical training in this country the editor hopes that all provincial Governments will soon recognize the necessity of founding scholarships for the technical training of young men abroad.

ADVOCATE, 29th November 1908.

State technical scholarships for training of young Indians abroad.

51. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 29th November, notes the remarkable apathy displayed by Muhammadans in the matter of technical education. The editor remarks that, when the Principal of the Roorkee Engineering College recently went out of his way to secure Muhammadan candidates for the technical scholarships tenable in the College, he was unable to obtain any applicants. This has naturally caused profound regret to the well-wishers of the country. Government, the editor notes, has done much to encourage education amongst Muhammadans by throwing open posts to members of that community, so that in the matter of special instruction he urges that the impetus should come from within, and that the leaders of the Muhammadan community should bestir themselves as regards technical education, particularly as the artizan and manufacturing classes are mainly recruited from that community and would find technical education of inestimable advantage to them in their business careers.

53. The following is from the Citizen (Allahabad), of the 3rd December :—

CITIZEN, 3rd December 1908.

Muhammadans and Indian Universities.

"Their extremely inadequate representation on the Senates of Indian Universities is one of the standing grievances of the Musalmans ; and though the attention of Government has been drawn to the complaint on more occasions than we can remember, it is no exaggeration to say that precious little has been done to effect an improvement in this respect. No one can deny that the Moslem community has been making steady progress in education ; and still their representation of the Universities continues as meagre as ever. And what is even more anomalous, in Provinces where they constitute a very important section of the community, and where their educational condition is not quite as unsatisfactory as it is in some other parts of the country, their representation is particularly inadequate. Take for instance the case of the Allahabad University. The fact is incontrovertible that whichever test of educational advancement you take into consideration, you will find that, in proportion to their numbers in the population of the Province, the Muhammadans are the most advanced section of the population, and yet the Allahabad Senate has seldom contained more than ten Muhammadan Fellows. Unhappily, Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk's death created a vacancy in their ranks, which has not been hitherto filled up by the nomination of a Musalman Fellow. For Dr. Zia-ud-din was appointed in Raja Naushad Ali Khan's place and not that of the late Nawab. And we are surprised to find that though of the Fellows recently ballotted out three were Musalmans, not one of them has so far been either elected or nominated to fill the seat vacated by them. Thus the number of Muhammadan Fellows of the Allahabad University has fallen to a ridiculously low figure, and this in a province where there is no paucity of competent and qualified Muhammadan gentlemen of light and leading and where the Musalmans are educationally ahead of every other community ! The state of affairs at Lahore is equally deplorable.

Nothing would so well demonstrate the hopelessly weak position of the Musalmans here than a reference to the personnel of the Syndicate and the various boards of studies. It is well known that the Syndicate is the chief executive body of the University, and while the Senate is the final administrative authority, the real work of the University is done by the Syndicate. And will the reader believe us when we say that the Moslem community of the Punjab, in spite of their diversified educational interests, will be shortly unrepresented on the Syndicate of the University? And yet the facts are as stated here. But that is not all. The various boards of studies, which, owing to the working of the new regulation, have acquired special importance, have for the next year been so constituted that excepting the single Board of Oriental Language, not one of them will have any Muhammadan member serving on it. The reason for this is not far to seek. So long as the existing regulations for the formation of these boards remain in force, Muhammadans, with their small numbers in the Senate, and consequently in its Faculties, have slight chance of being returned to the syndicate or boards. The sole remedy lies in strengthening the Moslem element in the University. We hope His Honour the Chancellor will consider the question and devise means to remove a state of things which has made it possible for the dominant party to oust the Musalman element from the working bodies of the University."

AL BASHIR, 24th November 1908.

The Husainabad High School.

54. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 24th November, notes with regret the decision of the trustees of the Husainabad Waqf Committee to hand over the management of the Husainabad High School to the Government. Such an act, in the opinion of the editor, is a standing disgrace to the Muhammadan community, for it clearly shows that even the best of its men are incapable of any independent work, although they may have all the resources they require at their command. The editor however hopes that the All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference may yet consider the question of retaining the school and its management in its own hands and thus save it from becoming a Government institution, where Muhammadans would count for nothing and where their boys would be no better cared for than they are in other Government schools. Failing in this, the Conference should move the Director to see to it that Muhammadan interests do not suffer by its being handed over to the Government.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 26th November 1908.

School masters and private tuition.

55. The editor of the Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), in the issue of the 26th November, complains that the course prescribed for the primary classes in Government schools is so very difficult that it is impossible for any student to manage it without the assistance of some private tutor.

He also questions the advisability of the order of the Director of Public Instructions in forbidding school masters from undertaking private tuition.

He further says that teachers in schools do not now take so much interest in the teaching and training of their students as in the swelling of the number on their attendance register.

In conclusion he warns parents to take special care in the choice of private tutors as most of them are very corrupt.

MASHRIQ, 1st December 1908.

Indian students in England.

56. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 1st December, while referring to a lecture delivered by Dr. J. Pollen at the East Indian Association, London, on the condition of Indian students in England, remarks that much could be done if the English people were to exercise a sympathetic control over the Indian students there, as the prevalence of Extremist ideas among them is mostly due to the undesirable influence they fall under in England.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 3rd December 1908.

Need for a Museum in Allahabad as a memorial to Sir John Hewett.

57. In a lengthy editorial article the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 3rd December, points out the urgent need of a Museum in Allahabad, as such an institution is of great importance for the education of students and the advancement of knowledge. A collection of objects of interest in Natural History, Geology, Arts and industries should be found at the headquarters of the provinces, and as the Lieutenant Governor takes such an interest in everything relating to the education of students, the Museum would naturally be called "The Hewett Museum." The aristocracy, and in fact the members of all classes, for whose advancement His Honour is doing so much, should combine and raise funds for the establishment of a Museum at Allahabad befitting the capital of the United Provinces. And libraries and museums being twin institutions, the Allahabad

Museum should be in close proximity to the Memorial Library. In this connection the editor suggests that this library should have a man of scholarly attainments as librarian, and not be left to the tender mercies of a graduate engaged in private studies as is the case at present.

58. Referring to the recent resolution upon Public Instruction in Bengal, the editor of the Citizen (Allahabad), in the issue of the 3rd December, expresses his approval of Sir Andrew Fraser's appeal for the co-operation of parents and guardians in restraining youths from meddling in politics; a good deal, too, he notes, depends on the teacher. A teacher who discourses in a political strain that is subsersive of law and order is guilty of a grave breach of trust and is plainly unfit for his responsible post. Commenting on the clause of the resolution that sets forth that the future progress of education in Bengal must be governed largely by private liberality, the editor expresses his inability to agree that Government should rely on generous benefactors to relieve it of one of its chief responsibilities. Money can be lavished on police reforms, sanitary improvements, &c., whilst that department, on which all the others depend, is cramped and confined for want of funds. The new Lieutenant Governor, the editor says, will have to devote his attention to increasing the revenue till it is able to meet the many claims on it in full. The concluding portion of the resolution setting forth that the funds at the disposal of the department should be allotted with the greatest care, and after consideration of the respective merits of the different schemes and institutions, the editor characterizes as superfluous and unusual.

CITIZEN, 3rd December 1908.

Sir Andrew Fraser's views on the educational question.

59. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 4th December, notes with satisfaction the grant-in-aid made by the Government to the Nadwat-ul-Ulama and remarks that this kindness of the Government will be more appreciated if it were to make the students of this institution eligible for service under it, if they qualified themselves in English.

OUDH AKHBAR, 4th December 1908.

Government and religious and moral education.

60. An article entitled "Indians and the Study of Law", appears in the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 3rd December, in which the editor points out that the high percentage of students who devote themselves to the legal profession is attributable partly to the fact that it offers them a very lucrative field, and partly to the fact that the course imposes very few restrictions, and that the necessary number of lectures can be attended with ease at any of the numerous law schools in the country. If degrees in Arts and sciences could be acquired with equal facility, the number of students who devote themselves to law would be considerably diminished. But it is generally believed, the editor remarks, that the present system for teaching law is not up-to-date, and that numerous law schools on more modern lines are to be established throughout the country. Unless the proposed law schools are to be a distinct improvement on the present ones, the editor says that industrial schools could be opened instead with much more advantage to the country.

(f)—Agriculture and questions affecting the land.

61. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 1st December, while referring to the agrarian troubles in Behar, remarks that they are due to the disinclination of the planters to pay the ryots their full wages. The editor advises the Government to remove the punitive police from the districts, and then to win the people over by conciliatory measures.

62. In a leading article entitled "Scarcity of Food", the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 26th November, remarks that in spite of the fact that the famine is over—officially at least—prices still continue to rule high. The market prices that appear in the Gazette from time to time are generally those that prevail at headquarters situated on railway lines and do not represent the rates that prevail in places far removed from the railway where distance and difficulties of carriage greatly add to the price of food. It follows accordingly that the pepole in most places are still suffering from famine food rates, though the famine has been declared over. Keen observers cannot but notice that for reasons not yet properly investigated famine conditions have become permanent features of the economic condition of the country. Everywhere the complaint about high prices is general. It is well known that since the famine of 1897 prices never returned to the rates that prevailed before then. A slight fall from the high rates of the acute stage occurs with the lessening of the distress, but there is never even a possible tendency to reach the normal condition of prices. The reason for this it is difficult to assign. The continued importation of rice into Calcutta shows that the area under paddy cultivation has sensibly decreased in Bengal, and the weekly crop reports in these provinces continually harp on the urgent need of rain. At the same time it must be admitted that kharif crops have been sown in a very large area under favourable conditions and should soon be ready for the harvester. And yet prices range high. The reason is probably to be found not so much in the scarcity or profusion of the commodities themselves, as in the absence of money wherewith to purchase them. "Who knows" the editor remarks "that the dacoities reported from Bengal and elsewhere and sought to be laid at the doors of the National Volunteers are but another form of the expression of the serious poverty that is grinding the people."

"As to the causes" the editor continues "it is no good laying the blame on the extensive prevalence of malaria, which has produced a temporary scarcity of labour, but the effect of which is rapidly passing away. The high prices did not even accompany much less follow malaria. There are districts and provinces where this troublesome disease does not prevail. And yet high prices prevail throughout. . . . . The cause or causes lie deeper still, and have to be tackled with care and determination, if the chronic condition of famine rates is to be amended. . . . . It is high time the attention of Government were seriously devoted to finding out the causes and applying a remedy."

HINDUSTANI, 2nd December 1908.

Scarcity of food in the United Provinces.

63. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 2nd December, reproduces the remarks of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 29th November, on the scarcity of food in the United Provinces, and asks the Government to find out the causes that have permanently led to the fall in the prices of food grains, with a view to remedying the grievances of the people which, the editor says, will remove of itself the present discontent.

ABHYUDAYA, 20th November 1908.

Desecration of the Queen's statue at Nagpur.

64. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 20th November, while referring to the outrage to the Queen Victoria's statue at Nagpur, remarks that no condemnation of such acts can be too strong, and that such acts do not have their origin in the noble quality of patriotism but in insanity and rascality.

RAHBAR, 28th November 1908.

Desecration of the Queen's statue at Nagpur.

65. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th November, severely condemns the desecration of the Queen's statue at Nagpur, and remarks that this dastardly deed will be looked upon with horror by right-minded people all over India, as the late Queen was esteemed and venerated by all.

VEDA PRAKASH, November 1908.

Precautionary measures against plague.

66. The Veda Prakash (Meerut), for November (received on the 2nd December), urges the necessity of the people getting themselves inoculated against plague, as the epidemic has reappeared in certain parts of the country. The editor deprecates the action of those designing persons who excite the masses by misrepresenting Government measures for the prevention of plague. He, however, expresses the opinion that the carrying out of the plague measures by the Indians should be under the strictest control and supervision of European officers, since sometime unscrupulous persons among them resort to such practices for the accomplishment of their selfish objects to make the ignorant masses misunderstand the benevolent intentions of the Government.

67. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, reports that a European accidentally killed two Police Inspectors in Calcutta while shooting. He was not arrested, only a report of the accident being made to the Magistrate.

68. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, severely condemns the action of the editor of the Hindi Kesari (Nagpur), in tendering an apology to the Government and calls him shameless and inhuman.

69. The Riyaz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 24th November, notes with satisfaction the excellent record of work shown by the District Co-operative Bank of Rae Bareli under the able management of Munshi Yusuf Ali and the efficient supervision of Mr. Dewhurst. The editor expresses the opinion that the Bank should extend its usefulness by advancing money to people requiring it for other than agricultural purposes; that it should have branches in the different tahsils of the district, and that it should have better paid men on its staff.

70. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 20th November (received on the 28th idem), while recognizing the necessity of a proper reception being given to the Viceroy, questions the advisability of a procession being led in Lucknow on the occasion of Lord Minto's visit to that city, seeing that a great deal of money was wasted in pomp and show, at a time when the people had not sufficiently recovered from the effects of the recent famine and were still distressed by the presence of malarial fever among them.

71. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th November, deprecates the ever-growing increase in the sale of court-fee stamps in the Punjab, and remarks that this may be looked upon by the Government as a proof of the increasing prosperity of the country, but to the people it only means that the Punjabis are becoming more and more selfish, which is an unmistakeable sign of decline.

RAHBAR, 28th November 1908.

72. Referring to Major Lamb's appeal for funds to erect a hostel for the Indians in connection with the Pasteur Institute at Kasauli, the editor of the Citizen (Allahabad), in the issue of the 29th November, notes that for all classes of Europeans and Eurasians and for the poorer classes of Indians attending the institute the arrangements are ample, but that there is no suitable accommodation for Indians of the upper and middle classes. A hostel for Indians of these classes, he points out, would be a great convenience, and steps ought to be taken to establish one, especially as the Cantonment Committee are prepared to present the institute with a suitable site.

73. Writing under the heading "Begar in Lucknow", the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 29th November, remarks that the visit of a high dignitary to a place is not without its seamy side to many of the residents. Recently in Lucknow many instances of impressed labour were brought to his notice and chaprasis could be seen here and there commandeering the services of Kahars and other menials for the visitors' camps, quite oblivious of the fact that these men were in many instances already bound to private employers of labour. Coolies were frequently spirited away before their masters came to know of it, causing serious trouble to families, dislocation of business, and loss for payment of high wages to new hands. Such a state of affairs, the editor says, embitters the minds of the people, and to prevent it he suggests that a contract system should be introduced to meet the demand for increased labour on such occasions, which, though probably involving more expenditure would, to compensate for that, induce general satisfaction.

74. The editor of the Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), writing in the issue of the 30th November, complains that the number of the unemployed is daily increasing in India, and makes the following proposals for its gradual reduction:—

(1) That people should make more effort to seek work.

(2) That they should support the swadeshi movement, that every one should make a vow to use only swadeshi articles, and that factories should be started in all towns.

(3) That there should be a technical school in every district.

VYAPARI AND KARIGAR, 1st December 1908.

75. The Vyápári and Karigar (Benares), of the 1st December, says that under the Government of Sir John Hewett every facility is being offered to the public to develop agriculture and industry of the United Provinces and the people will have to thank themselves alone if they fail to take advantage of these facilities, and do not start new factories and workshops under such favourable circumstances.

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 24th November and 1st December 1908.

76. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), in its combined issue of the 24th November and 1st December, draws the attention of the Government to the meritorious services of Messrs. Baillie and Lovett, Munshi Kanhaya Lal, the retired Deputy Collector of Benares, Babu Moti Chand and the Hon'ble Munshi Madho Lal of Benares, and expresses the hope that the Government will be pleased to acknowledge their disinterested services by conferring suitable decorations on them.

Meritorious services of Benares officials and gentlemen.

MASHRIQ, 1st December 1908.

77. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 1st December, deprecates the proposal for partitioning the Gorakhpur district, urging that it would be unpalatable to the people of the district and would be a heavy burden on the provincial finances. As to the pressure of work, it can be easily coped with, according to the editor, by allowing the Collector an assistant with full powers. He urges however that if a separate district is to be formed, Captainganj would be the best place for its headquarters.

Proposed partitioning of the Gorakhpur district.

HINDOSTHAN, 1st December 1908.

78. In a note on "Indian Grievances", the editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), in the issue of the 1st December, while discussing as being one of the real grievances of India, the imposition of excise duty on all coarse cotton goods spun at any Indian mill, which, he says, injuriously affected the Indian manufacturers of coarse cotton cloth, as well as the poor hand-loom weavers all over India, observes as follows:—

Comments on the fiscal system.

"So the melancholy fact remains that, whether it be under a Liberal or Conservative règime, the tale of India's fiscal history has been the same, the tariff being always adjusted more with an eye to the support of the powerful Lancashire millowners, than to the interests of India's indigenous industries."

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 1st December 1908.

79. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 1st December, while referring to the acquittal of a European Ticket Collector, who assaulted a Musalman lady on a running train on the Bombay-Baroda and Central India Railway, remarks that it will come as a shock not only to Musalmans but to all Indians. The editor says that such travesty of justice is the chief cause of the discontent in the country, and that it is necessary that British judicial officers should vindicate their reputation for justice at an early date.

Assault on a Musalman lady by a European.

HINDUSTANI, nd December 1908.

80. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 2nd December, deprecates the posting of fourteen Civilians to the United Provinces during the current year, urging that as only one Civilian is expected to retire during the next two years, the natural result will be that capable members of the Provincial Civil Service will find their promotion blocked. The editor cites the case of Mr. Muhammad Rafik, who, although on the eve of retirement, is still officiating as a Sessions Judge owing to the anxiety of the Government to find good berths for the junior members of the Indian Civil Service.

OUDH AKHBAR, 4th December 1908.

81. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 4th December, while referring to the determination of the Turks to boycott Austrian goods, urges Indian Musalmans to cease to use Austrian-made fez-caps in imitation of the Turks, and in conclusion exhorts them to support the swadeshi movement, which is a powerful weapon for bringing European countries to their senses.

SWARAJYA, 21st November 1908.

82. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 21st November, referring to the statement that a new law will be passed to deal with political crimes, remarks that the best way for putting down such crimes will be to hang all the people of India and thus prevent the possibility of their recurrence.

83. The Rahbar (Moradabad), of the 28th November, while referring to Dr. Rash Behari Ghose's Religious Endowment Bill, remarks that, although by its passing into law the Government will obtain some sort of control over the funds of temples and other religious institutions, yet this state of affairs is better than that the money should be squandered by the Mahants (priests) in drinking and debauchery.

RAHBAR, 28th November 1908.

84. The following is from the Citizen (Allahabad), of the 29th November:—

"The Englishman is given to understand that the revision of certain parts of the Code of Criminal Procedure will soon be taken up. It is anticipated that provision will be made to enable a magistrate to order any search or local perquisition to be made by word of mouth in his presence for which he is competent to issue a warrant. At present a magistrate enjoys this power as regards any person to be arrested, and it is absurd to refuse it to him when a mere search is in question, and to permit any tortuous legal reasoning to uphold that an order by word of mouth is invalid, whereas the same order, if scribbled with a pencil on the shirt cuff or on the back of an envelope, would be valid. It is anticipated that the law as to refusing bail in non-bailable cases will be strengthened, and it is even rumoured that recent events have established the necessity of formal legal restriction being placed on any officer exercising legal or judicial power in cases in which he is personally interested directly or indirectly. If the information is correct some such stipulation is necessary in future."

"The refusal of the Bengal and North-Western Railway Company to construct the Burhwal-Sitapur line is, by Colonel Gracey, a Director of the Company, ascribed to the terms offered by the Railway Board, which is accused of placing the interests of the State-owned lines before even-handed justice. This public condemnation does not appear to be fair; there is a tinge of petulance in the criticism because of a recent rebuff. Frantic efforts were at the last moment made by the Bengal and North-Western Railway to capture the broad guage railway entering Calcutta by a promise to build the proposed bridge across the Lower Ganges at its own cost. The bait did not hook the desired fish. The attempt failed, but left behind a feeling of irritation. The notoriously bad management of the existing line by the Company goes against any of its proposals in search of fresh fields and pastures new."

1. Commenting on the New Zealand Chinese Immigrants Amendment Act, 1907, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 10th December, remarks that British colonies, no matter where situated, are intended to be peopled by whites if not by Britons. This is a settled policy to which the Imperial Government does not object. He asks why it is not cordially admitted that the Asiatic is not wanted in the colonies, as it would be more straightforward to admit that the restriction has been put at the colour line, than to go on hedging in the adopting of a policy, the ultimate aim of which is obvious, though its promoters refuse to admit it.

2. "In spite of what their opponent might say to the contrary, the Bengalis are true to their faith", says the Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 24th November. "Their actions may border on madness, and their methods may be suicidal, but it is equally certain that they have refused to be cowed by repeated persecutions and prosecutions. And at last they have gained the attention of His Majesty the King-Emperor, for has he not promised reforms in the near future? But why have the Bengalis not relaxed their enthusiasm? Why are they as violent as ever they were before? It may be that expectation, and consequently enthusiasm, increases as the day of consummation approaches. Or it may be that the Bengalis are tired of waiting, and want an earnest of the promises immediately." "In any case," the editor remarks, "this much is certain that the Royal message has been hailed with delight by many in this land of unrest."

"Let us continue to hope that the British Government, which has always stood by the side of the weak in the cause of liberty, will vouchsafe the same help to India also. Besides, the Bengalis should be won over anyhow; for, in spite of all professions of loyalty, we make bold to say that twenty crores of Hindus inhabiting India to-day have entire sympathy for the methods and ideals of the Bengalis. Is it not dangerous, therefore, for a prudent and wise Government to ignore such a vast majority of the native population?"

The effect of repression upon the Bengalis.

SHAHNA-I-HIND 24th November 1908.

3. "The intensity of sentiment, particularly the sentiment of love, leads one to madness", says the Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 1st December, "and it is agreed on all hands that madmen cannot be subdued by coercion nor by mere physical strength. This is also true in the case of the patriot. His passionate love for the country, and above all his passionate desire to ameliorate her lot, lead him to excesses. But, like the madman, he too cannot be checked by mere repression. Some other method must be tried, for in his present mood he is really the most dangerous man living on the surface of the earth. We cannot agree with those who counsel persecution, and who say that leniency would be an admission of weakness. The strength of the Government is far too mighty to allow of any such interpretation, and the anarchists too are conscious of it. Apart from the necessity for granting political privileges (let Government) merely modify the partition, and see if this does not improve the situation."

Government and its repressive policy.

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 1st December 1908.

4. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 8th December, while referring to the speech of Lord Minto at Lucknow dealing with the necessity for fresh legislation for eradicating the seeds of anarchism from the country, remarks that without doubt the anarchists have given much trouble to Government and should be dealt with severely. Any measure calculated to mete out deterrent punishments to the disloyal section of the Indian population will be hailed with delight, but the editor doubts whether repressive policy will be of any avail against a class of desperate persons who are evidently bent on mischief and who are reckless of their lives. So far as their demands are concerned, the editor remarks that no one knows what they are, for the majority of Indians are in favour of the present Government and desire its permanence, wishing only to employ constitutional methods for obtaining their rights.

Proposed repressive measures and the English press.

MASHRIQ, 8th December 1908.

The editor incidently expresses the opinion that the Government has been led to resort to fresh legislation simply in deference to the opinion of Anglo-Indians and of the English press. He quotes a paragraph from the Times and remarks that in view of such strong expressions of opinion at home it is not surprising that the Viceroy of India is influenced.

ADVOCATE, 3rd December 1908.

The Arya Samaj and the attitude of the Government.

5. A correspondent, who signs himself "A Well-Wisher, Non-Samajist", contributes a letter to the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 3rd December, on "Government and Arya Samaj", in which he notices with regret the change of attitude on the part of Government officials towards the Arya Samaj. This change has been noticeable in an increasing degree since the disturbances in the Punjab a short time ago, and the alarming proportions that it has now reached have been fully demonstrated by the remarks made by the District Magistrate of Jhansi in his judgment in the Pandit Daulat Ram case. There is now no Arya Samajist gathering, the writer remarks, that is not attended by some of the secret police. This, he considers, most unfortunate and most detrimental to the progress of the country, as the Arya Samaj is the only institution of the kind that is doing good work in the interests of the country by its social, moral and religious teachings. Arya Samajists, he believes, owe it as a duty to themselves to form a committee and send a deputation to wait on the Lieutenant Governor in order to remove the misrepresentations that appear to have been made to him about them. In conclusion he counsels all Samajists to work with a greater spirit of toleration, as the stern attitude they have adopted has brought them under a cloud.

ADVOCATE, 6th December 1908.

The Arya Samaj and the attitude of the Government.

6. In an article in the issue of the 6th December, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), refers to the speech of Lala Munshi Ram on the last anniversary day of the Lahore Samaj, in which the latter expressed his views on the Arya Samaj and on politics, and makes the following observations:—

"We say this state of things is extremely dangerous and may lead to that bitterness and strong outburst of racial feeling which is at the present moment causing so much uneasiness in some other parts of India. We consider no blunder of the present day administration of greater magnitude than the one which would lead the Arya Samajist and along with him the educated Hindu to believe that the movement is under a cloud of suspicion. Not only the Government will loose the goodwill of thousands of the supporters and members of the Samaj, but rouse a bitterness of feeling in educated Hindus all over Upper India. If the Government is not aware of the fact, let it note that whatever may be the religious differences between the orthodox Hindu and the Arya Samajist—and we admit these differences are serious as far as religious beliefs are concerned—there is not one educated Hindu possessing even a touch of patriotism in the Punjab and the United Provinces who does not sympathize or support the several philanthropic movements started by the Arya Samaj and who does not feel interested in their advancement."

He says "that, as far as the philanthropic and educational programme is concerned, Hindus and Aryas are united, and there is nothing which will establish greater unity between the two than official persecution. Lala Munshi Ram had every reason to feel indignant at finding the movements of his preachers watched by detectives, his band of noble workers at Hardwar when they go out to appeal for funds shadowed by the police or Samaj meetings attended by detectives. He has rendered to his Samaj and the State a service by so prominently drawing the attention of higher officers of the Government to the present attitude of the secret police towards his movement. We cannot conceive that the Government can have any misgiving about the attitude of men whose activities are possible on the continuance of peace and order in the country, and whose very existence would come to an end with the first symptoms of a general chaos in the country." The editor concludes his observations with this remark:—"This suicidal policy must at once come to an end in the interest of both the State and the people."

HINDUSTANI, 9th December 1908.

The Arya Samaj and the attitude of the Government.

7. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 9th December, reproduces from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 6th December, an article headed "The Arya Samaj and the attitude of the Government."

8. The Arya Mitra (Agra), of the 8th December, has an article on Government and the Arya Samaj contributed by one G. R. Thakur. The writer says that it is a matter for the deepest regret and of the utmost concern that the Arya Samaj should be suspected to be a political body by that very Government to which it owes its origin and growth, as wells as many an act of kindness in the shape of pecuniary assistance to some of its institutions. He remarks that this suspicion has arisen because a number of leading Arya Samajists take part in politics, because the Muhammadans and missionaries who have been affected by the aggressive religious propaganda of the Arya Samaj have poisoned the ears of officials against it by false allegations about it, and because the persons deputed to make inquiries about it have made untrue reports, owing to their imperfect knowledge. He expresses the opinion that if Government wants to have correct information about the Arya Samaj, its high officials, such as Collectors and Superintendents of Police, should enroll themselves among its members, so as to be able to see closely its present work and future aspirations. The writer emphatically denies the allegation that the Arya Samaj is a political body, and affirms that it wants to carry on its work with the help of the Government, which alone can ensure its success. In conclusion he refers to the work of the Arya Samaj in the direction of educational, social and moral reforms, and to its repeated assertion of the necessity for harmonious relations between the rulers and the ruled, similar to those between a father and son, as indications of its intention to work in accordance with and not in opposition to the wishes of the Government.

ARYA MITRA, 8th December 1908.

The Arya Samaj and the attitude of the Government.

9. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 8th December, remarks that in spite of the declarations of the Arya Samajists to the contrary, some of the Anglo-Indian officials of His Majesty the King-Emperor have always fastened upon the members of the Samaj the blame of dabbling with politics, and have constantly represented them as the High Priests of Sedition and Anarchy. He expresses surprise that, in the face of such provoking circumstances as the arrest and subsequent conviction of Pandit Daulat Ram of Jhansi, the Arya Samajists could keep their patience so long, and remarks that there is a limit to every thing, and advises the Government to cease to suspect a body which is purely religious in its professions and acts.

MUSAFIR, 8th December 1908.

The Arya Samaj and politics.

10. The Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 24th November, while referring to the appearance of a new class of dacoits in Bengal, whose aim is to use their booty for financing the anarchist movement, remarks that no pains should be spared in exterminating these desperate men, whose existence is a serious menace to the safety of British rule in India. He remarks that it is very possible that this movement may spread throughout the whole of India, and that therefore the proper remedy should be applied at once.

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 24th November 1908.

Government and the anarchist movement.

"Besides, there is reason to fear danger from without also. The enemies of the British Government are lying in wait, and it is sheer folly to give them reason to believe that they would be welcome in the land which they think to be overflowing with milk and honey.

Therefore, in (view of) our loyalty to the Crown we make bold to say that the present political situation in India is very critical and dangerous indeed. It requires careful handling at the hands of those who are responsible to His Majesty the King-Emperor for the permanence of British rule. It is clear that these young and desperate men are not robbers and dacoits of the ordinary criminal type. On the contrary, they are men who have got their rights to demand, and who, if not actually sympathized with, are looked upon with respect by Indians of their ways of thinking.

The Royal Proclamation is based upon a commendable principle no doubt, which is the principle of recognition of public opinion. But, considering the circumstances of the times, we are constrained to say that the message has failed in allaying the popular discontent. We therefore urge again, what we have urged many times before, that the spirit of the message should be adhered to, and that substantial reforms should be granted at once. There need be no apprehension regarding the prestige of the Government. In the eyes of the people Government is too powerful to be suspected of having yielded to the popular discontent. A Royal act of amnesty and a proclamation of substantial privileges would bring the Bengalis, and all Indians for the matter of that, to their feet, and there would rise a chorus of 'Victory to the King' instead of Bande Mataram from the throats of twenty millions of the Indian population."

The editor in conclusion refers to the cowardly attempt on the life of Sir Andrew Fraser and remarks that this incident forebodes many other similar perils. "The hatred which prompted the man to hazard such a heinous crime is not based on personal enmity. It is the outcome of racial hatred. And racial hatred, as we know only too well, has sometimes been the cause of great revolutions. The mischief should therefore be nipped in the bud, not by a display of physical strength, but by the mild and more effective methods of conciliation. The organized force of the Government can be of little avail against an enemy who is scattered all over the land, and who, for the success of his cause, depends not upon a face to face struggle, but upon secret methods of doing away with a few here and a few there. We therefore say once more that, before the wound becomes more gaping (Government) should give up dallying with the lancet and should try the healing balm instead."

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 24th November 1908.

The reproduction of seditious articles itself sedition.

11. The Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 24th November, referring to the reappearance of the Yugantar, remarks that it refrains from reproducing the contents of this scurrilous rag, for the reproduction of articles of this nature is nothing but sedition. The editor hopes that others also will accept this view of reproducing seditious matter and refrain from doing so.

AL BASHIR, 1st December 1908.

Causes of the unrest in India during the years 1907-8.

12. In continuation of his article entitled "Causes of the Unrest in India During the Years 1907-8" (vide Selections No. 49, current, paragraph 5), the editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), writing in the issue of the 1st December, remarks that in the opinion of Major F. G. Herbert Dantey and of Colonel Malleson the mutineer army was, to a large extent, composed of Hindus, which fact, when considered in connection with the wicked machinations of Nana Rao, render it very probable that Hindus alone were active participators in the Mutiny. He also points out that the first man who objected to using greased cartridges was a Hindu, and that the first person who raised his hand against a European was also a Hindu.

The editor further remarks that if the Mutiny had been the outcome of outraged religious feelings, Muhammadans would have avoided acts forbidden by their religion, saying that Islam condemns in unequivocal terms the murder of women and children. He expresses the opinion that because women and children were murdered in the Mutiny it should be evident that there were men other than Muhammadans who committed these dastardly crimes, and that they were the Hindus who had an overwhelming majority in the rebellious army.

In support of this argument the editor quotes entries from the diary of Chunni Lal, informer, and also cites some statements of Mirza Muhammad Abbas and of Jattu Mal, informer, produced as evidence before the military tribunal appointed for the trial of Bahadur Shah.

BHARAT JIWAN, 7th December 1908.

Rumour regarding the quartering of a punitive police force at Calcutta.

13. Referring to a rumour that a punitive police force will be quartered at Calcutta for the suppression of anarchism, the Bharat Jiwan (Benares), of the 7th December, remarks that, while Government should in no way be deterred from taking measures for stamping out anarchism from the country, it is unjust that for the misdemeanour of a few individuals, the whole population of Calcutta should be burdened with the cost of maintaining a punitive police force.

OUDH AKHBAR, 9th December 1908.

Indian discontent the result of the absence of religious education.

14. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 9th December, questions the truth of the generally received opinion that the discontent prevailing among certain classes of Indians is due to the disregard of their demands by the Government or to the alleged partiality of the latter to Europeans, and remarks that it is mostly due to the absence of self-restraint which is the outcome of a sound moral and religious education. The editor notes with satisfaction the introduction of religious education in Mysore schools, and hopes that it may be given a trial by the Indian educational authorities, in case the experiment proves a success.

15. The Zamana (Cawnpore), in its combined issue for September and October (received on the 7th December), while referring to the persecution of the Indians in the Transvaal, remarks that it is a matter of great regret that the Parliament, and particularly Lord Elgin, "who has eaten the salt of India," do not interfere in the matter.

ZAMANA, September and October 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

16. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 7th December, while referring to the debate in the House of Commons some time ago on the position of Indians in the Transvaal, remarks that in spite of such meetings and debates the condition of Transvaal Indians has been growing from bad to worse and that no proper steps have yet been taken by the Imperial Government to ameliorate their lot.

OUDH AKHBAR, 7th December 1908.

Indians in the Transvaal.

17. Under the marginally noted heading, the Shahna-i-Hind (Meerut), of the 24th November, contains the following:—

SHAHNA-I-HIND, 24th November 1908.

Estrangement between the rulers and the ruled.

"Punishments should not be taken to mean the displeasure of the Government, for they serve as warnings to the would-be criminals and as deterrents to the accused themselves. In the same way the protests of the people should not be considered as the outcome of a dangerous hatred for the Government and suppressed accordingly. No Government, however mighty it be, can afford to disregard the wishes of the people, consistently with its safety. The Royal Proclamation should therefore be taken in the light of a promise of coming reforms and all unrest should consequently be put an end to; and indeed it is satisfactory to note that the darkness of the night is already melting away in the light of the coming dawn."

18. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 8th December, while discussing the recent professions of loyalty made by the Maharaja of Benares in the British press, sarcastically remarks that one great proof of his loyalty is that his Dewan, Private Secretary, Assistant Private Secretary, and other influential officials in his Darbar are Bengalis. Does the Maharaja, asks the editor, wish to impress upon the people that he is independent and impartial, while professing loyalty to the Government?

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 8th December 1908.

The Maharaja of Benares and his professions of loyalty.

19. Under the heading "If I Were the Viceroy of India", the Citizen (Allahabad), of the 6th December, reproduces from the Review of Reviews an account of the interview which the editor of the magazine had with Lala Lajpat Rai, in connection with the latter's deportation and with several other questions bearing on the administration of India.

CITIZEN, 6th December 1908.

Interview with Lala Lajpat Rai by the editor of the Review of Reviews.

20. Under the heading "Personal with a vengeance", the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 10th December, has the following:—

ADVOCATE, 10th December 1908.

Administration of Indian affairs and peoples by the British Government.

"The worst of the personal character of the British Government with reference to India lies in the fact that, if the Secretary of State in England or any Governor in India chooses not to give out any information, however important it may be from the people's point of view, or even from the standpoint of justice, there is nothing in the laws and rules to enforce the one or the other to open his lips. Herein comes the unconstitutional character of the British Government as to the administration of Indian affairs and peoples. On the recommendation of the Romer Committee Lord Morley agreed to impose an additional burden of £300,000 or 45 lakhs of rupees a year on India for military expenditure in England. While sanctioning this imposition his Lordship refused to publish the recommendations of the Committee. Nay more. He was sure the India Government was agreeable to the new burden. Then went a despatch from the Governor General in Council on the subject. When it reached London, our friends in the Commons elicited the information that it was a strong protest against the decision. Mr. Buchanan went however thus far and no further; he cut short the other interrogatories by a frank refusal to make public the despatch of the Government of India. Why? Because it could not be laid on the table without the report of the Romer Committee. Why this? No cogent reason. Under the circumstances, the coming increase in the pay of the sepoy soldier—a matter of a few lakhs not exceeding one digit—however advantageous individually, cannot but be treated as but a sop to the outraged feeling caused by an economic injustice."

ADVOCATE, 10th December 1908.

India in the House of Lords.

21. Writing under the heading "India and the Lords", the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 10th December, remarks that the representation of India in the House of Lords is a mystery. Indians were assured that their interests would be well guarded if ex-Viceroys, ex-Governors, ex-Lieutenant Governors and former heads of departments were allowed to sit in the House of Lords without election. So far, he notes, a good many ex-Viceroys and ex-Governors have sat there; but, with a few honourable exceptions, all have been but the mouthpieces of their English friends in India. "The gilded chamber is to India what the proposed advisory council of native princes and territorial magnates would be, a show and a sham." If India is to be represented it should be in the House of Commons.

OUDH AKHBAR, 12th December 1908.

The split in the Congress.

22. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 12th December, deprecates the split in the Congress camp, and fears that in this divided state it will not be able to command the same amount of confidence, but hopes that, as it has now become purged of its Extremist element, Lord Morley may be disposed to entertain some of its demands.

The trial and conviction of Mr. Tilak.

23. The editor of the Zamana (Cawnpore), writing in the combined issue for September and October (received on the 7th December), expresses his sympathy with Mr. Tilak, who, he thinks, was convicted very unjustly. He severely criticises the holding of the trial in Bombay, the constitution of the jury and other points. In conclusion, he says that the conviction of Mr. Tilak is to a great extent responsible for the tension of feeling between the Indians and Europeans at the present moment.

MASHRIQ, 8th December 1908.

Abolition of certain munsifs in these provinces.

24. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 8th December, deprecates the proposed abolition of the munsifs at Muhammadabad (district Azamgarh), Bansgaon (Gorakhpur) and Fatehpur (Bara Banki), urging that the people of these places would be put to much trouble if they have to attend courts situated at a distance. The editor express the opinion that their abolition has been recommended by the officials who have to inspect them, because they are put to much trouble by travelling on bad roads (to reach them).

25. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 7th December, reports that for some time past detectives have been noticed everywhere in Agra interrogating every person entering or leaving the city, which procedure, in the opinion of the editor, is not the way secret police should work, and its publicity defeats its object.

The Octroi Commission.

26. The Awaza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 8th December, while commenting on the inquiries to be undertaken by the Octroi Commission, deprecates the suggestion to abolish the tax as it will have to be made up by levying a terminal tax, as is done by the Cawnpore Municipality, which will have to be realized through the agency of the railways, who will probably charge at least three per cent. as the expenses of collection. The editor expresses the opinion that this sum can be profitably spent within the limits of the municipality concerned and suggests that the best method of improving the existing state of things would be to abolish the existing tax on grain and to assess heavily articles of luxury and merchandise.

In conclusion the editor emphatically condemns the abolition of the octroi tax and the imposition of what he calls "direct and terminal" taxes.

27. Commenting on the Municipal Administration Report, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 10th December, notes with approval that Government intends to introduce various reforms in the system of electing municipal members. The present system is highly unsatisfactory. Printed slips containing the names of candidates are circulated through the post office or distributed by municipal employés, and experience has shown that both methods are open to abuse. The primary factor in connection with elections is secrecy in voting, and this is impossible as long as the present method of voting remains in force. Voters should go to the polling booth and record their votes in the presence of a responsible officer, without fear of being molested by the followers of any particular candidate. If this were done, the editor thinks, there would be fewer attempts to influence electors, and the best men would be returned. The result would be that municipal members would be less anxious to secure their own personal aggrandizement, and would be more true and just in their dealings.

ADVOCATE, 10th December 1908.

Reform in the system of Municipal election in the United Provinces.

28. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 11th December, suggests the advisability of first warning by letter those house proprietors whose houses need repairs, before serving notices on them in accordance with the provisions of the Municipal Act and of the Cantonment Code.

(e)—Education.

29. The editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), in the issue of the 1st December, commenting on His Honour's Convocation address, remarks that it is the clearest exposition of the educational policy of the Government in the future ever placed before the public, and advises the members of the Muhammadan Educational Conference to read it carefully and to discuss the debatable points in it at the coming Conference.

AL BASHIR, 1st December 1908.

The Convocation address.

30. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 1st December, deprecates the proposal for appointing English-knowing men as teachers of vernaculars and classical languages (Oriental) in schools, as their knowledge of these languages is very poor. The editor suggests the advisability of establishing a training college for men who have passed examinations in Oriental languages with a view to their subsequent appointment as teachers of classical languages, and as deputy and sub-deputy inspectors of schools, whose duties they can perform better than English-knowing young men.

AL BASHIR, 1st December 1908.

The teaching of vernaculars and of classical languages in United Provinces schools.

31. Referring to Sir Andrew Fraser's resolution on the Report on Public Instruction in Bengal for 1907-8, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 3rd December, notes with approval the various measures adopted during the year to advance the cause of education in Bengal. The proposal however to place each division under the educational charge of an Inspector of Schools belonging to the Indian Educational Service, to be assisted by an additional Inspector of Schools from the Provincial Educational Service, will not, he thinks, meet with general approval, as there has been a well-grounded complaint in Bengal that Inspectors of Schools are usually men who have not been successful as lecturers, and who have been shunted off the main line into the inspecting siding. The innovation will mean the perpetuation of the old order, the evil effects of which it is sought to remove by associating members of the Provincial Service with Inspectors. Another matter, the editor notes, that is much to be regretted is the inability of the Government of Bengal to spend enough money on the recognized educational needs of Bengal. He fails to understood how Government disclaims all responsibility for lack of progress in education, unless assisted by private subscriptions, when money is forthcoming to meet the requirements of every other department in full.

ADVOCATE, 3rd December 1908.

Sir Andrew Fraser's views on the educational question.

ADVOCATE, 3rd December 1908.

The Allahabad University and the election of Fellows.

32. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 3rd December, publishes a letter from a correspondent who signs himself "A Graduate", in which the writer asks if the Allahabad University, in view of the recent decision of Sir Louis Dane in respect to the election of Fellows by graduates of the Punjab University, intends to enjoy the unenviable distinction of being the only University in India whose graduates have no voice in the election of Fellows to the University. He wonders if it is too much to ask the Hon'ble Pandit Sundar Lal, who has considerable influence in University affairs, to move in the matter.

ADVOCATE, 6th December 1908.

Teachers for zenana ladies.

33. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 6th December, has the following:—

"It is a happy sign of the times that both the Government and the people are keenly alive to the need of the spread of education among our women-folk. In every province steps are being taken to prepare a batch of lady teachers to work either in girls' schools or among ladies that live behind the parda. Baba Premananda Bharati, well-known in this city, who had been to America, has a scheme for supplying lady teachers for Hindu homes. These teachers will be selected from among his American lady disciples and educated Hindu ladies. The instruction will include lessons in reading and writing in Bengali, elementary arithmetic, dress-making, and so forth. But the special object of the Mission will be 'to keep up the Hindu religious spirit in our married women, which will be helped by their associating with these American ladies, who are thoroughly Hinduized in their consciousness and religion.' Influential men of Bengal have promised their support to Baba Bharati."

HINDI HINDOSTHAN, 8th December 1908.

A plea for compulsory primary education in India.

34. The Hindi Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 8th December, traces the cause of the present degraded condition of India to the gross ignorance of its masses, and says that they can make no substantial progress except as a result of a liberal extension of education among them. The editor hopes that the Government, in its desire to benefit the people, will certainly introduce the system of compulsory primary education in India, if it thinks this measure, after mature deliberation, to be conducive to the good of the country.

ADVOCATE, 10th December 1908.

Technical scholarships for the training of Indians abroad.

35. The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 10th December, notes with approval that the Society for the Advancement of Scientific Education in Bengal, has created a number of scholarships to enable students to go abroad for training at manufacturing centres. He remarks that this is a move in the right direction, and hopes that other associations will not be slow in following the lead of the Bengal society.

(f)—Agriculture and questions affecting the land.

HINDOSTHAN, 5th December 1908.

Co-operative Credit Societies of the United Provinces.

36. The following is an extract from the comments by the editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), in the issue of the 5th December, on the report of Mr. S. H. Fremantle, I.C.S., Registrar of Co-operative Credit Societies, United Provinces:—

"Why, when our country can manage without the bloodthirsty Shylocks of India, and can keep banks to supply the wants and requirements of the people at a reasonable rate of interest, then it can be said to have achieved a great principle of swadeshism. Administer the law by yourself, that is to say, by means of punchayat; take the money-lending business into your own hands; manage the Municipal and District Board business also by punchayat; keep militia and volunteers composed of Hindus, Muhammadans and Christians, as well as of the fighting loyal subjects of India, for the defence of the country, and then a Viceroy alone would be sufficient to govern the country with the help of his colleagues, the Governors, Lieutenant Governors, Chief Commissioners and other Local Governments. In this case, we may require a small standing army; but then, we should also join with those loyal Indians, Rajas and Maharajas, who are clamouring for the reduction of British soldiers."

HINDOSTHAN, 10th December 1908.

The use of modern agricultural implements.

37. In a note reviewing Mr. S. H. Fremantle's report on Co-operative Credit Societies, the editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), in the issue of the 10th December, observes that the statement that large farms are altogether unknown in India is not correct. As a matter of fact Indian cultivators have not yet learnt the European reformed way of ploughing, as only a few of the cultivators have sufficient money for the purpose of conducting agricultural operations. "The present practice in India is this: that the Indian revenue is chiefly derived from the product of the land, and, therefore, it is the bounden duty of the first lord of the soil, the Government, to help and encourage the second landlords, the landed proprietors, so that they may be always in a position to pay their land tax. In the same manner it is the duty of the landed proprietors to help their tenants so that they may be always able to pay their liabilities to their landlords."

(g)—General.

38. The Zamana (Cawnpore), publishes, in its combined issue for September and October (received on the 7th December), an article in which the writer, while discussing the swadeshi problem, remarks that it can progress only when there is the fullest co-operation between the Government and the people. The people should not make it a political matter, but should invest their money in industrial concerns instead of hoarding it or converting it into ornaments. He advises Government to try to find openings in foreign countries for the surplus labour of India and to make industrial and technical education popular in the country.

ZAMANA, September and October 1908.

Progress of the swadeshi movement.

39. Writing under the heading "Want of Indigenous Sugar in India", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 10th December regrets to note that by far the largest portion of the sugar consumed in India is imported. This is not as it ought to be, as India is happy in possessing the soil that is best suited for sugar cultivation. Bengal, the editor remarks, is the chief consumer of imported sugar. This appears incredible in view of the fact that the swadeshi movement originated in Bengal. As there is nothing to show that Bengal is not a sugar-growing province, the editor trusts that Bengalis will give their serious attention to sugar cultivation, and in the interests of the country thus give practical effect to their swadeshi views.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 10th December 1908.

Failure of Indians to extend the use of indigenous sugar in India.

40. The ceremony that recently took place at the Nadwat-ul-Ulma building, Lucknow, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 3rd December considers, furnishes an excellent proof of the fact that good work outlives misrepresentation. Like many other institutions of its kind the Nadwat-ul-Ulma was at first regarded with suspicion as a place likely to foster young fanatics. But its steady and consistent work has proved these suspicions unfounded and the Nadwat-ul-Ulma is now recognized as a power in the land. It is to the Muhammadans what the Gurukul movement is to the Hindus. It aims at imparting education on national lines, and at providing a trained band of young men well versed in theology to go forth and raise the people morally and educationally, and protect the valuable inheritance received from their ancestors. The circumstancss attending the founding and the final completion of the Nadwat-ul-Ulma show that even the most liberal minded rulers may be out of touch with popular feelings, and prove that in the interests of good government it is essential that Government and the people should be in close touch, so that Government may have other sources of information than the police, and those who bask in official smiles.

ADVOCATE, 3rd December 1908.

Official attitude towards popular movements.

41. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 9th December, reproduces from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 3rd December, an article headed "Official Attitude Towards Popular Movements."

HINDUSTANI, 9th December 1908.

Official attitude towards popular movements.

42. The Zamana (Cawnpore), in its combined issue for September and October (received on the 7th December), while referring to the frequent attempts on the lives of Indians by Europeans, remarks that these assaults are made deliberately by Europeans with the full knowledge that they will not be brought to book for their misdeeds. The editor calls upon the zamindars and others, who are always holding loyalty meetings, to draw the attention of the Government to this sad travesty of justice.

ZAMANA, September and October 1908.

ZAMANA, September and October 1908.

Plague, malaria and village sanitation.

43. The editor of the Zamana (Cawnpore), writing in the combined issue for September and October (received on the 7th December), draws the attention of the Government to the ever-growing ravages of plague and malaria in rural areas, and says that, if no attention is paid to the health of the agricultural labourers, a time will come when there will be very few people to till the soil, and the Government will find much difficulty in realizing its revenue.

AL BASHIR, 1st December 1908.

Musalman holidays.

44. A correspondent writing to Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 1st December, reports that a meeting of the Muhammadan gentry was held on the 7th November to draw the attention of the Government to the paucity of Musalman holidays, at which it was decided to ask the Government to allow the Musalmans two days' leave during the Id-ul-Fitr, Id-uz-Zuha and Shab-i-Barat instead of one, and to grant a day's holiday each on the last Friday of Ramzan and on the 12th of Muharram.

ZUL QARNAIN, 7th December 1908.

The attitude of the Government and the people towards the Nadwat-ul-Ulma.

45. While appreciating the annual grant of Rs. 6,000 by the Government for the maintenance of the Nadwat-ul-Ulma at Lucknow, the Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 7th December, deprecates the want of interest evinced by Muhammadans in this institution, and remarks that it is discretable that even a religious institution cannot be maintained independently of Government help. The editor points out that for the last fifty years the financial condition of the Muhammadan community as a whole has deteriorated rather than improved, that they have always looked up to Government for help in all they did, and that they never have done anything on their own initiative to benefit the community at large for fear of incurring the displeasure of officials, and remarks that the backward state of the Nadwat-ul-Ulma demonstrates this.

MASHRIQ, 8th December 1908.

The proposed partitioning of the Gorakhpur district.

46. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 8th December, deprecates the proposed partition of the Gorakhpur district, urging that it will lead to a considerable increase of expenditure which might well be utilized in irrigating some portions of the district which have suffered from want of rains for the last two or three years. If, however, the need of its partition is extremely urgent, the editor suggests that the Hata and Pandrauna tahsils, together with the northern portion of the Deoria tahsil and the eastern portion of the Maharajganj tahsil, may be formed into one district with Captainganj as its head quarters, and that the Sadar and Bansgaon tahsils, together with the portions of the district lying to the east of the Maharajganj and Bansi tahsils into another.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 9th December 1908.

Official attitude towards the Arya Samaj in the Punjab and in the United Provinces.

47. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 9th December, notes with satisfaction that on the occasion of the recent anniversary of the Lahore Arya Samaj, Arya and Hindu clerks of the Punjab Secretariat were given leave to attend it, and that various high officials sent polite and sympathetic letters in answer to invitations sent to them. The editor remarks that His Honour Sir John Hewett will do well to follow this example of the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab, thereby bringing about real peace in his province. He says that, if His Honour were to go through the records of the case of King-Emperor versus Daulat Ram, he would be convinced that the District Magistrate of Jhansi was misled by designing persons into doing injustice to the accused, and asks His Honour to give satisfaction to Arya Samajists by demonstrating his love of justice and generosity in this case.

ADVOCATE, 10th December 1908.

Forced labour in India.

48. A correspondent, who signs himself "Englishman", writes to the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 10th December, to complain of the system of forced labour in vogue in India. The custom, he notes, is one revolting to the instincts of any honest Englishman, and that it has prevailed so long is significant. The practice is wholly indefensible, as is proved by the fact that business firms, European as well as Indian, obtain all the labour and carriage they require on payment without the intervention of the tahsil chaprasi. It is a common practice, the writer says, to take possession of a number of carts and hold them till the owners pay ransom. Carts belonging to zamindars are frequently seized and their contents thrown on the road to meet the transport requirements of high officials. Even wealthy zamindars put up with this form of oppression, as they shrink from incurring the reputation of having brought official high-handedness to notice. This kind of thing could not go on, the writer thinks, if Government officials were more in sympathy with the people, and more easily approachable by the poor. As long as the system of forced labour continues, the Englishman's proud boast that the Union Jack is the emblem of freedom is a delusion and a snare, as far as India is concerned, for impressed labour is a form of slavery that frequently leads to imprisonment and death.

Causes of mortality among children.

49. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 11th December, while agreeing with the causes of the mortality among children, as set forth by the Sanitary Commissioner of Bengal in his report for the year 1907, remarks that poverty is the real cause of the high death-rate caused by epidemics such as plague and cholera, and he forebodes that unless education becomes general and arts and industries are revived, the future of India is very gloomy indeed.

Complaint regarding 3rd class accommodation in the Bombay-Baroda and Central India Railway mail train.

50. Mr. Sayid Abdul Kadir of the District Judge's Office, Fatehgarh, writes to the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 3rd December, to complain that the Bombay-Baroda and Central India mail train that leaves Ahmedabad for Delhi has no 3rd class accommodation for the servants of passengers travelling 1st and 2nd class.

ADVOCATE, 3rd December 1908.

Want of a ladies' waiting room at Gorakhpur Railway Station.

51. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 8th December, complains that at such an important Railway Station as Gorakhpur no waiting room has been provided for Indian ladies. He remarks that in other respects also the present building is unsuited to the growing requirements of an important railway junction, and he asks that the authorities should extend the buildings.

MASHRIQ, 8th December 1908.

Control of District Magistrates over railways.

52. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 11th December, makes the following proposals for the prevention of crime on railways:—

NASIM-I-AGRA, 11th December 1908.

"(1) That Commissioners and Collectors should be authorized to inspect railway lines within their jurisdiction and report to the Government on any irregularities they notice.

(2) That Ticket Collectors should be men of good character.

(3) That inspectors should be appointed to watch and report on the conduct and work of Ticket Collectors and other subordinates.

(4) That the tickets of female passengers should be checked by female Ticket Collectors only.

(5) That suspicious characters travelling by rail should be carefully watched."

VII.—Post Office.

Postmen and letter-boxes in Bijnor.

53. The Sahifa (Bijnor), of the 5th December, complains that the postmen in Bijnor are very much overworked, and that being only three in number, they take an unreasonably long time in distributing letters, which results in inconvenience to the public. The editor asks that their number be increased by two, and that two big letter-boxes of the new type be placed at convenient places in the town.

SAHIFA, 5th December 1908.

VIII.—Native Societies and Religious and Social matters.

Seditious passages in the Satyarth Prakash.

54. The Brahman Sarvaswa (Etawah), for November, says that although everybody knows that the Satyarth Prakash is a religious book, officials have lately discovered sedition in it also, as is apparent from certain remarks passed on the book by the District Magistrate of Jhansi in the course of his judgment in the case of King-Emperor versus Daulat Ram. The editor remarks that in this matter all Indians should sympathize with the Arya Samajists, for, as the Hitvarta says, if the Satyarth Prakash is considered seditious now, the Vedas and Shastras may also one day be held to be seditious, and as such their study prohibited.

BRAHMAN SARVASWA, November 1908.

MUSAFIR, 8th December 1908.

55. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 8th December, reports that, while some of the preachers of the Samaj are busy converting Muhammadans, one of the champions of our faith, a man of iron fortitude and will, has succeeded in releasing four men and ten educated girls from the hands of Christian Missonaries of Bareilly, and converting them to the new and sublime faith of Vedic religion. This, the editor remarks, has caused much havoc in the Christian camps of Rohilkhand, for as they had spent much in winning over these fourteen souls to their religion of cunning and deceit.

Conversion of Christians by the Arya Samaj in Rohilkhand.

MUSAFIR, 8th December 1908.

56. In making an appeal for funds to further the cause of the shudhi movement, the editor of the Musáfir (Agra), writing in the issue of the 8th December, remarks that the necessity for money has become all the more imperative since Christians and Muhammadans have roused themselves to activity, and are leaving no stone unturned to counteract the effect and influence of the Arya Samajists, in whom they have found a really formidable foe. Muhammadans have established their Anjuman Hidayat-i-Islam, and preachers are abroad to confirm the wavering and win over the sceptics. It is high time for the Arya Samajists also to realize their responsibilities.

An appeal for funds to help the shudhi cause.

ZUL QARNAIN, 7th December 1908.

57. Referring to the assault upon Mr. Birley, Joint Magistrate of Alipur, the Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 7th December, remarks that the Bengali elders have infused a spirit of anarchism into the minds of their children also, and suggests that a light punishment like a fine for such a grave offence as an assault on an officer is not calculated to put an end to such a state of affairs.

The punishment given to the boys who insulted Mr. Birley, the Magistrate at Alipur.

1. Al Bayan (Lucknow), for November, complains that the Indian subscribers of the Egyptian paper, Al Lewa (the late Mustafa Kamel Pacha's journal), do not get it regularly, that sometimes a subscriber receives only one out of the six issues in the week, and sometimes does not get it at all for months. The editor suggests that the reason of this is that Government is said to look upon the paper with disfavour, and has probably issued confidential instructions to postal officials not to deliver it to subscribers. He asks that, if this be true, Government should announce it publicly so that they may discontinue ordering it.

AL BAYAN, November 1908.

Non-receipt of Al Lewa newspaper by the Indian subscribers.

2. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 16th December, remarks that tension of feeling between Austria and Turkey is increasing every day, and it appears that both the countries are making preparations for war secretly. He notes that the internal condition of Turkey is far from satisfactory, and that there are rumours that the Sultan is about to be dethroned and that his successor has already been nominated. The editor expresses the hope that in view of the possibility of a war with Austria, the Turks will cease from quarrelling among themselves and close up their ranks to present a solid front to their common enemy in case war should be inevitable.

OUDH AKHBAR, 16th December 1908.

Turkey and Austria.

The editor then pays a warm tribute to the valour of the Turkish soldiers, and says that without doubt they will be formidable opponents for the Austrians, and closes with an expression of the desirablity of an amicable settlement.

(b)—Home.

3. Mr. Abbas S. Tyabji, Judge of the High Court, Baroda, contributes an article entitled "Indian Musalmans and the Indian National Congress" to the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for December, in which he notes with regret that the Muhammadans have so far refrained from joining the Congress movement in spite of the fact that it is non-sectarian, and has the interests of the country at heart. The Muhammadans, he remarks, profess not to be able to join the movement for two reasons—firstly because to do so would not be playing fair with the Muhammadan idea of loyalty; and, secondly because they thought that, the Congress being chiefly composed of Hindus, such demands would be made of Government as would tend to forward the interests of the Hindu community at the expense of Muhammadans. The essayist begins by pointing out that, though East is East and West is West, the East has latterly begun to recognize that the methods of the West are well worthy of imitation, and the result has been a general outcry against absolute rule, and a demand on the part of the people for a voice in the administration of the country. This is clearly seen in what has recently happened in Turkey. Turkish Muhammadans no longer consider that loyalty means unqualified submission to the powers-that-be. To be loyal is to pay due deference to constituted authority and to assist in every way in promoting the happiness of the people. And the objects the Congress has at heart are the happiness and welfare of the people. The Congress is not opposed to British rule in India; it merely wishes to be an advisory body capable of representing the feelings of the people to Government on all administrative matters. This being so the writer cannot understand why the Muhammadans should keep aloof from it. Instead of throwing in their lot with their Hindu brethren they prefer to form a separate league that has the same objects as the Congress but on a smaller scale. Nothing can be gained by splitting up India into several camps. If the Muhammadans had joined the Congress from the first a good deal of the present unrest would have been impossible, as the claims of a united people as expressed by the Congress could not have been overlooked. There is work for the Moslem League independent of the Congress, in so far as it gives expression to the requirements of the Muhammadan community, but why should not Muhammadans in general join the Congress and assist it in its endeavour to ameliorate the condition of the people of India? Again, the fact that some of the members of the Congress were found to have views that could not meet with the approval of a loyal Muhammadan does not imply that the Congress movement is opposed to Government. In reality, the writer says, the question of the loyalty of the Congress is but an excuse. The Muhammadans fear that they will not be fairly treated by the Hindu majority. But seeing that the Congress has never pressed for any rights that would benefit Hindus at the expense of their Muhammadan brethren, this idea is absurd. There may, he remarks, be some grounds for the fear of the Muhammadans that Hindus will receive the lion's share in the event of Government's throwing the higher appointments in the provinces open to Indians. But this is merely the fear of the weak who have not yet qualified themselves for the posts they seek. In conclusion the essayist hopes that the Muhammadans will soon see their way to join their Hindu brethren in a movement that has for its object the interests of the whole people of India.

HINDUSTAN REVIEW, December 1908.

Indian Musalmans and the Indian National Congress.

RAHBAR, 7th December 1908.

The Congress of Moderates and Extremists.

4. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th December (received on the 14th idem), referring to the reply given by Sir Pherozshah Mehta to the letter of the Hon'ble Babu Bhupendra Nath Bose, asking the opinion of Mr. Mehta on the question of a united Congress, remarks that two national Congresses in the same country are now inevitable, inasmuch as the proud aristocracy of the old Congress is determined to have its own way. But before our countrymen actually attend one or the other they owe it to themselves and to their nationalist brethren also that they should thoroughly consider the fact that, while the Moderates rely absolutely on Government, the Nationalists have faith in their own exertions. Their meetings may not be so attractive as those of the Moderates, still those that regard truth more than any other extraneous circumstances are not expected to consider that.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 13th December 1908.

The Madras Congress and the duty of the United Provinces.

5. The following is from the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 13th December :—

"We sincerely trust that these provinces will not fail in their duty at this critical moment. There is very little time before us and we beg our friends to be up and doing. Let District Committees be formed without delay. Delegates should be elected at once. It will be a sad commentary on our sense of public duty if a large number of delegates do not go from here to Madras. There is no doubt that the journey is long and expensive; but remember, the work that has to be done is great and noble. We request our friends, whose zeal for the Congress has never flagged, to do all that lies in their power to make the next Congress successful. They should go themselves and induce others to do the same. The proceedings of the Madras Congress will be anxiously watched, not only in India but also outside it, and we earnestly appeal to the Congressmen in these provinces to lose no time in taking practical steps to show their devotion to the Congress."

BHARAT SUDASHA PRAVARTAK, November 1908.

Reading of Sir John Hewett's speech at the Arya Samaj of Farrukhabad.

6. The Bhárat Sudashá Pravartak (Farrukhabad), for November, reports that at a meeting of the local Arya Samaj the translation of His Honour's speech delivered at Agra was read, and that the people assembled there were asked to take measures suggested in the speech for the suppression of sedition in the United Provinces.

RIYAZ-I-FAIZ, 12th December 1908.

Lala Munshi Ram's speech on the occasion of the Arya Samaj anniversary at Lahore on the Arya Samaj and politics.

7. In publishing an account of the proceedings of the anniversary of the Arya Samaj held at Lahore, the editor of the Riyaz-i-Faiz (Pilibhit), writing in the issue of the 12th December (received on the 17th December), makes the following observations in connection with the speech of Lala Munshi Ram on the occasion :—

"The speech of Lala Munshi Ram was hailed with much delight, for every one had come to realize the necessity of an emphatic declaration from an authorized exponent of Arya Samaj views regarding its attitude towards the political movements of the day. The necessity had become all the more pressing in view of the fact that Muhammadans and Christians have for the last few years been trying their utmost to create a misunderstanding between the Arya Samaj and the Government. Their motive is not very hard to discern; for even the casual observer knows it too well that by carrying on a vigorous proseletyzing campaign in their camps, the Samajists have very bitterly exasperated the Christians and Muhammadans of India.

Now these misrepresentations have succeeded in working incalculable mischief to the cause of Arya Samaj, for, led by them the officials have committed such improper acts as go to show that, to say the least of it, they look upon the Samajists with suspicion. The Jodhpur incident and the case of Pandit Daulat Ram and many other instances of a like nature confirm the opinion that the Arya Samaj is considered to be a dangerous institution which should be suppressed before its mischief becomes general.

The editor remarks that the speech of Lala Munshi Ram is very opportune as such a declaration has long been needed. The Arya Samaj, he says, is a purely religious movement, having for its object the religious emanicipation of the race. The realization of this ideal depends entirely upon the permanence of British rule in India; for they believe that no sooner the protecting hand of the British Government is withdrawn the Arya Samaj will be the first to fall a prey to the religious fanaticism of its opponents."

Despatch of troops to Dacca.

8. Under the heading "Some Trouble Brewing", the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 13th December, has the following :— ADVOCATE, 13th December 1908.

"The despatch of troops to Dacca has been simultaneous with some other incidents. It is said a strict system of surveillance has been instituted there as a result of the police activity noticed during the last few days. Some young men who are recognized members of the Samity, and some others who are outsiders,—173 all told,—are being watched in the night to find out whether they are at home or not. There were some conferences in which Mr. Stevenson-Moore and Mr. Halliday, who went down there for the occasion, attended. It seems all these are preparations for giving speedy effect to the Law passed day before yesterday at one sitting. The societies started to encourage physical culture have become the eyesore of the Government. So physical culture must in future be spelt as games of football, cricket, hockey and tennis, and other forms of exercise, particularly lathi-play, sword-play, &c., are to be tabooed."

Despatch of troops to Dacca.

9. The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 13th December, notes that four companies of troops were recently despatched to Dacca on practically twenty hours' notice, and that though mobilized on a peace scale, ball ammunition was served out on a liberal scale. The reason for this sudden mobilization, the editor says, was that trouble was apprehended in connection with the introduction of the new rules and regulations of the Educational department in Eastern Bengal and Assam. Is this the way, the editor asks, that Sir Lancelot Hare wants to announce his return to Eastern Bengal? ADVOCATE, 13th December 1908.

Political odes.

10. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 5th December (received on the 14th idem) publishes the following political odes:— SWARAJYA, 5th December 1908.

By Kabir:

"What shall I say of the doings of the inventors of tyranny,
They are ruining the people of India.
Those who tyrannize over righteous persons
Their boat sinks in the middle of the stream.
The sigh of the oppressed confounds the tyrant,
Let the tyrants remember this well.
The tyrants work oppression in the same way
As Curzon divided Bengal into two.
They shall wash their hands of glory
Who dishonour others.
Indians, it is the persons of whom you are demanding liberty,
Who liberate (others) only when they have knocked them down [or get knocked down (?)]
Be resolute and demand assistance from God only,
It is might and strength only which bring about freedom.
Put up (cheerfully) with hardships, misfortunes and sufferings,
Being men, it is not becoming for you to bewail (your lot).
The prey can escape only by breaking through the net,
Hunters never let go their prey.

Under this raj the hands and tongues of those persons are chopped off
Who (dare to) bewail or lament (their lot)."

By Shamim:

"Those who remember their native country when away from it,
They gratify the sorrowful heart.
Their passion for tyranny is always insatiate,
They are always inventing fresh methods of tyranny.
They never glance with pity.
The wretches, in the agony of death, go on crying and lamenting,
In this world it is only men who are generous and full of pity,
(And) who help the powerless.
Lovers who fall martyrs in the testing ground (lit.),
They complain in vain of the hangman.
How delicious, O! Shamim, is their (method of) causing trouble,
When they perpetrate a fresh act of tyranny every day."

By Anand:

"They oppress and they tyrannize,
They are ruining us in every way.
They are digging their own graves,
Who tyrannize over the down-trodden.
Boycott and the swadeshi (movement) are the only weapons
Which confer liberty on every nation.
They are tyrannizing over India.
We too are now adopting unconstitutional methods [or protesting against frequent acts of injustice (?)]
Whenever they hear of a swadeshi riot (lit.),
They at once hit upon (think it) sedition.
We can escape from the net by burning it with our (hot) sighs,
But we are simply humouring the hunter.
They at once fly to our throats
Whenever we complain of tyranny."

By Asar:

"We neither give ourselves up to lamenting nor complain,
We simply adopt [unconstitutional means (?)]
They tyrannize and they oppress;
In short they ruin India,
Those who try to impose upon others by false promises,
They themselves shall come to grief in the end.
When the oppressed are victorious, the tyrants are defeated,
This is the way in which unhappy hearts (men) console themselves.
Those who have sacrificed themselves for their country are immortal,
People shall remember them to the Day of Judgment,
These slaves have indeed made a grievous mistake,
They are knocked down, but still they complain.
They are foes of the nation, who hate the swadeshi (movement),
They are enriching others (at their own expense).
What (strange) times are these, that even our own kith and kin go over to the opposite camp,
And support the tyrannous policy of the foreigners.
We can be avenged for the tyranny of the flower-picker,
But we simply humour the hunter.
The cowards may be welcome to their fear of chains.
Men never complain of the forgers (of these chains).
Those whose interest it is to bleed India,
Those hangmen (tyrants) can never dispense justice.
Our misfortunes do not stop short at famine and poverty only,
They are inventing new misfortunes every day,
To drown the nation in the sea of slavery,
These clever rogues are launching new reforms.
Those who put up with the tyranny of the foreigners for the sake of their motherland

Will succeed in liberating the country some day.
They cannot crush the oppressed,
But the tyrants are laying the foundation of a compact nationality.
What a force is enacted to crush the swadeshi movement,
They are piling one act of tyranny on another.
There may be others who are afraid of the field of battle,
We, Asar, are going through 'iron exercises' [exercises with iron weapons (?)]"

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 8th December 1908.

Why are the Musalmans against the present political agitation in India ?

11. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 8th December (received on the 12th idem) remarks that the Hindus have the entire sympathy of the Muhammadans in their honest efforts for the economic regeneration of their country. But if the Muhammadans do not take part in political agitation, it is because they think that their own interests would suffer by doing so. They want to be reckoned as a separate class whose claims should not be allowed to be overlooked in the interest of the majority. And this is why they consider the permanence of British rule in India as synonymcus with their own national wellbeing.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 12th December 1908.

Mr. Gokhale on the present situation.

12. The Riyaz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 12th December, while commenting on the speech recently delivered by Mr. Gokhale at the New Reform Club, London, remarks that the annulling of the partition of Bengal is sure to give offence to the Musalmans of the province, and that the pardoning of political criminals is an expedient of doubtful value, as has been proved in the case of Lala Lajpat Rai and Ajit Singh.

ABHYUDAYA, 11th December 1908.

Necessity for the political emancipation of India.

13. In continuation of its article entitled "Necessity for the Political Emancipation of India" (vide paragraph 14, Selections no. 49, current), the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 11th December (received on the 16th idem), writes:—

"For the attainment of political enfranchisement as for that of spiritual salvation, not only an irrepressible desire for freedom is required but discrimination, 'passionlessness' (vairagya), and the 'six requisites' are equally necessary. The principle of no salvation without true knowledge holds good no less in the case of spiritual salvation than in that of political emancipation. That we should know our rights and privileges is the first condition of our political liberation, and to obtain them we should have discrimination, 'passionlessness' and the 'six requisites'? Nothing can be done without discrimination, which is the distinguishing of the real from the unreal, of right from wrong and of righteousness from unrighteousness. 'Passionlessness' is necessary along with discrimination. When we will ponder over our present condition and those bonds which impede our progress, there is a likelihood of our hating them . . . . . We should have a feeling of 'passionlessness' towards these bonds. We should clearly understand that these bonds, which have reduced us to this condition, are of our own making, and that they will break off themselves as soon as we engage in discharging our duties. On the contrary, if we lose sight of this fact, and, thinking these bonds to have been imposed (lit. made) by Government, we attempt to break them in a spirit of hatred and show hatred towards the Government, we shall be involved in great difficulties and our bonds will become more tightened. 'Passionlessness' will breed and foster among us a spirit of sacrifice, leading us to work in the cause of the country. Side by side with discrimination and 'passionlessness' the 'six requisites' are required. By these are meant tranquillity, self-control, desisting from several enjoyments, perseverance in endurance, faith and concentration of the mind. . . . . Self-concentration is absolutely essential for nation-building. Those alone can draw up the map of nation-building, those alone can piece together this machinery, who absorbed in self-concentration prepare it. Indeed, it is ideas which do the work of nation-building, and without self-concentration such ideas cannot be produced. Without righteous intention discrimination and 'passionlessness', and the other requisites, an irrepressible desire for freedom, far from acheiving its end, leads to harmful results. It is because of the want of these qualities in Khudi Ram and in those of his school that all thoughtful well-wishers of the country unanimously condemn and express abhorrence of their deeds. Had they been possessed of these qualities they would have never committed heinous and sinful murders Those desirous of political enfranchisement should cultivate these qualities. They should bear in mind that subjection alone (lit. dependence upon others) is not the cause of the degradation of the country. It is rather the result and a symptom of that degradation. That country, the inhabitants of which have been demoralized by selfishness, idleness and moral depravity is reduced to a state of subjection and bondage, and cannot break its bonds until these flaws in the character of its people are replaced by patriotism and by a constant endeavour to uplift themselves. We admit that political subjection is a cause of the degradation of a country, but this is also true that degradation equally brings about political subjection. . . . . The degradation of a country is a natural phenomenon just like that of the growth and decay of a man. Just as a country takes time to decline and to fall into a state of subjection, in the same way it takes time to rise and to be free. . . . . It takes generations for the seed of liberty to fructify. Several generations have to water and protect it with their self-sacrifices. There is no method which can secure us our desired end in a short time. History and the scrutiny of our present condition convince us that neither rebellion nor secret murders nor any other methods of violence can take us to the path leading to freedom. There are several instances in history which show that a country even after attaining independence by methods of violence like assassination, cannot retain it without that natural strength which is produced by the cultivation of education, righteousness, unity, and patriotism. The autocratic despotism of Napoleon after the French Revolution of 1789 and the despotic rule of Emperors subsequent to the murder of Julius Caesar are a few instances of the truth of this. If the driving out of rulers by means of secret murders were possible and in accordance with religion, even then could ignorance, poverty, epidemics, disunion and the social evils of our country be removed? Certainly not. And unless these evils are removed, the salvation of the country is impossible. Even in our degraded condition religion was (always) our greatest asset and we were very proud of it. It is a matter for the deepest regret that some people are disgracing themselves by flaunting its precepts openly and are in this way doing incalculable harm to their country. 'The man who does not fight should not be killed' says Bhishma Pitama. It is a sin to commit murders. Sin can never bring us victory (or success), for there alone is victory where is righteousness and truth. What else could be our highest duty than to remove the ignorance, poverty, cowardice and mutual strife of our innumerable countrymen, and to serve them heart and soul. These defects cannot be removed by hating the rulers nor by attempting to assassinate them. They (defects) can be removed only by fostering education, unity, patriotism and similar good qualities among the people by means of disinterested work. We therefore urge upon those who are desirous of political emancipation (or enfranchisement) that, if they want to sacrifice their life for their country, they should dedicate it rather to the service of their countrymen than to the perpetration of murders, and that, if they want to show their self-sacrifice and energy, they should do so by cheerful service of their country and not by assassinations."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 13th December 1908.

Adoption of measures for the suppression of political crime.

14. Writing under the heading "Dealing with Terrorism", the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 13th December, remarks that, as long as it does not entail any hardship on the people in general, any measure for the suppression of political crime will receive the cordial support of the public. But some of the steps that are being taken seem to indicate that Government has become so nervous that it is prepared to accept any advice that is offered to it. Signs are not wanting that even healthy patriotism is considered dangerous and is being confounded with sedition and anarchism. What else can be said of patriotic songs, the authors of which are known to be loyal? The whole world has recognized that great events are happening in India and that a nation is coming to birth. Some excesses are unavoidable in connection with an upheaval of this kind, but a wrong construction should not be put on them. An attempt should be made to take a dispassionate view of the whole situation. Unless it is assumed that the whole country is imbued with the spirit of anarchism, it is wrong to call for or to expect protestations of loyalty from every part of the country. Neither terrorism nor ultra-loyalty will lead to the dignity of self-reliance, which is the first virtue to be cultivated. There is not a mutiny in sight, but there is a grave question as to the direction in which the minds of the people are moving. Things wholly unexpected and almost impossible have happened, and it is not difficult to conceive that repression in the wrong direction may lead to further complications and to new developments. The growth of a national spirit cannot be suppressed, and, in a crisis like the present, isolation is more dangerous than anything else. Anything that may tend to establish a better understanding between the Government and the people should be welcomed.

Unrest in India and its causes by Pandit Rambhuj Dutt of Punjab.

15. A correspondent of the Agra Akhbár, in the issue of the 14th December, while expressing his satisfaction at the fact that the United Provinces have remained practically free from the taint of unrest, refutes in decided terms the causes of the discontent as set forth by Pandit Rambhuj Dutt, pleader of the Punjab Chief Court, in England.

AGRA AKHBAR, 14th December 1908.

Anglo-Indian papers the cause of the present situation in India.

16. The Pioneer, says the Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 16th December, has ridiculed the suggestion of the Bangbasi that if educated and religious police officers were appointed, much of the present unrest would cease to exist. We will add one more suggestion to this, namely that the greatest reforms of Lord Morley will not succeed in relieving the present situation, unless the Anglo-Indian papers, such as the Pioneer, the Civil and Military Gazette and the Englishman be muzzled, and that the best way to accomplish this will be to appoint religious editors to these papers.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 16th December 1908.

The Bengali anarchists.

17. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 16th December, says that it is no wonder that the Bengalis, the worshippers of the goddess Kali, should forget themselves (or be in a fury), considering that there are rumours of war and disorder in the civilized world itself, in the shape of the tension of feeling between Austria and Turkey, the revolt in Haiyti and the skirmishes between Italians and dervishes in Somaliland.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 16th December 1908.

House searches in Eastern and Western Bengal.

18. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 17th December, has the following :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th December 1908.

"Quite an epidemic of house searches has broken out in the two Bengals. Hundreds of houses in towns and villages are being searched every day for conspiracy, dacoity and the discovery of loot. All the searches are for the purpose of finding the root of that upas tree, which is known as terrorism and anarchism. There can be no objection to wholesale house searches in which disaffection undoubtedly exists, though its extent may not be known. If the theory is correct that robbery and terrorism have a common origin, then the danger is even greater to Society than to the State, and everything that can be done to suppress political dacoity as well as political murder will be welcomed. All the traditions of the people are being violated by these fanatical criminals and there is already a feeling of strong revulsion in the country. As Dr. Rash Behari Ghose said, anarchism is bound to die out in India not only by the strong arm of the law, but by the intensity of popular reaction."

Deportations in Bengal.

19. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 17th December, gives a list of the men recently arrested in Bengal under the Act of 1818, and makes a few remarks regarding each of them. Referring to Kristo Kumar Mitra he says :—

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th December 1908.

"This is the most astonishing of all the deportations. The Sanjibani is the cleanest and soberest of all vernacular papers in Calcutta. It has never been warned or proceeded against for sedition; it has consistently refused to publish indecent advertisements, or to offer presents of books, which is the secret of success of most of the vernacular papers in Calcutta. Even when Babu Krishna Kumar's house was searched in connection with the arrest of Mr. Arabinda Ghose, he wrote in the Sanjibani about it with perfect restraint and calm dignity. He is an elderly man of the highest character, a minister of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, devout, disinclined to use strong expressions or forcible language, God-fearing, loyal, and absolutely without personal or any other ambition. As Babu Bhupendranath Bose told the Commissioner of Police, Babu Krishna Kumar Mitra is a Moderate of the Moderates, and he is about the last person in India to create a 'commotion' in the country. A few hours before his arrest he was cheerfully accepted as a search witness by the Calcutta Police. The Criminal Investigation Department may have certain grievances against him. He has married Mr. Arabinda Ghose's aunt and Miss Sarojini Ghose is staying with him after her brother's arrest. It is likely also that he may have been in consultation with Mr. Arabinda Ghose's solicitors. Besides these facts, there is nothing against him to the knowledge of the public. He is a member of the National Convention Committee which met at Allahabad in April last and he attended the committee meeting in this city. There never was anything of the firebrand about him, and he is undoubtedly one of the Moderates who would have rallied round the Government."

ADVOCATE, 17th December 1908.

Deportations in Bengal.

20. The following is from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 17th December :—

"Bengal—with it the rest of India—has heard the news of nine Bengali gentlemen's deportation with feelings of surprise and shock. That a quiet man like Babu Krishna Kumar Mitra has been considered dangerous to the State, that a public-spirited zamindar like Babu Subodh Chandra Mallick of the National College fame, living quietly at Benares, was considered responsible for the present unrest in Bengal, that Babu Aswini Kumar Dutt is considered responsible for dacoities in East Bengal are premises which demonstrate that the Government of Bengal is yet out of touch with Bengal public opinion. If they were guilty of crime the Government ought to have produced evidence of their guilt. Otherwise the countrymen of Babu Krishna Kumar, who have known him for the last 20 or 25 years, as we have the pleasure of knowing him, as a social, religious and educational reformer, will consider his humiliation as a great political blunder. To-day Lord Morley might by annulling or modifying partition in the same manner extinguish the fire of bitterness and hatred against the Government, as he did last year after the Punjab deportations. If no reconciliation follows these deportations, then we can only say that, if Extremists among the people have lost their head, Extremists on the Government side are no better."

UNION GAZETTE, 28th November 1908.

The Royal Proclamation.

21. The Union Gazette (Bareilly), of the 28th November (received on the 16th December), reproduces translations of two articles published in the Amrita Bazar Patrika in connection with the recent Proclamation of His Majesty the King-Emperor.

SWARAJYA, 5th December 1908.

The teachings of the Bhagwat Gita.

22. In continuation of his article on the teachings of the Bhagwat Gita (vide Selections no. 49, paragraph 28), the editor of the Swarajya (Allahabad), writing in the issue of the 5th December (received on the 14th idem), takes for his text some verses of the Gita in which Arjuna is described as showing extreme reluctance in raising his arm against Bhishma and Drona, his preceptors and the sons of Dhritrashtra, his kinsmen, and seeks to draw a parallel between the mental condition of Arjuna, and an ardent but conscientious Indian patriot.

The governing class, he says, whether of an alien origin or indigenous, always tries to keep in the dark its tyrannous proclivities and poses to be benevolent and anxious for the public good. It is only far-seeing men who can fathom their intentions. The ordinary mind is generally charmed with their professions of sympathy.

Arjuna's hesitation was natural, and in the same way an Indian patriot is tormented with many doubts when he places himself in a position antagonistic to the Government. He remembers that the British have given India a peaceful and settled government, have uprooted anarchy and have established an efficient system of justice. Besides this, they have introduced into India the arts and sciences of the West, which have dispelled ignorance and superstition from the country. Thus the English are at the same time the benefactors and educators of India. The Hindu accords more respect to his teacher than to his own father. Will a man be justified in raising his voice or in using his pen to the detriment of such a benefactor? Will not Indians be more like thankless vipers than grateful human beings? Even if the Indians were to succeed in their objects, the charge of moral obliquity will always attach to them seeing that they have risen to greatness by ousting their benefactors and teachers. (The editor promises to continue the article in future issues.)

Conviction of Indian journalists for incitement to racial hatred.

23. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 5th December (received on the 14th idem), deprecates the frequent conviction of Indian journalists for sedition and for inciting race hatred, and says it is the improper administration of justice which is mainly responsible for it. The editor points out that gambling is carried on with impunity in almost all the English clubs while respectable Indian gentlemen are challanned when caught in the act, and asks if such partiality is not calculated to incite hatred towards the English.

SWARAJYA, 5th December 1908.

Government and repression.

24. The Government is very mighty indeed, says the Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th December (received on the 14th idem). "It can stop any movement in no time by a mere effort of its will. Pleaders and vakils have lately taken a prominent part in political agitation. The attention of the officials is therefore now turned towards them. Only the other day the Madras High Court asked the Government to make it impossible for the members of the Bar to interest themselves in politics. The result is not known yet. Let us, however, ask the advocates of the swadeshi movement what they would do if, for instance, Government were to monopolize cotton cultivation".

RAHBAR, 7th December 1908.

Government and the Muhammadans.

25. Referring to Sir Bampfylde Fuller's article in an English magazine regarding the loyalty of Muhammadans, the Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 8th December, (received on the 12th idem) complains that, while Government has been yielding to the agitation for reforms and granting privileges to the Hindus, the Muhammadans have received no such consideration at the hands of their rulers. It is really to be regretted that Government has done very little justice to the "silence" of the Musalmans of India.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 8th December 1908.

How the usefulness of Darbars can be enhanced.

26. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 15th December, while referring to the Darbars which His Honour intends to hold next year at Lucknow, Meerut and Agra, remarks that their usefulness will be much enhanced if, after reviewing the progress during the last year he announce some substantial reforms and confer medals, titles, khillats and even jagirs, which is the most tangible form of the recognition of merit, to those persons who have remained steadfastly loyal to Government.

MASHRIQ, 15th December 1908.

Boycott of Indian goods in England in the 18th Century.

27. The Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 11th December (received on the 16th idem), quotes an extract from Lists' National System of Economics showing how English statesmen prohibited the consumption of Indian goods in England in the 18th Century with a view to prevent the crippling of her own indigenous industries.

ABHYUDAYA, 11th December 1908.

Mr. Stead's interview with Lala Lajpat Rai.

28. The Riyaz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 12th December, referring to the opinion expressed by Lala Lajpat Rai in his interview with Mr. W. T. Stead, remarks:—

"The drift of his opinion clearly shows what the Hindus are aiming at, and in what way they want to take advantage of their numerical majority in the country, and that they have little or no regard for the well-being of the Musalmans, who are in a helpless minority. Taking into consideration the perturbed state of the country at the present juncture, the British Government would be surely 'digging its grave' if it were to listen to the advice of Lala Lajpat Rai. Such opinions may deter Lord Morley from announcing his reforms in the near future."

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 12th December 1908.

How can swaraj be obtained ?

29. The following is from the Áwáza-i-Khalq (Benares), of the 16th December:—

"How can swaraj be obtained? By being rebellious? By attacking a Lieutenant Governor? By holding loyalty meetings? By passing resolutions? By hating the Bengalis? Or by going to England and by appealing to its public and the Secretary of State?

No, sir (not by these means).

Then how? By the withdrawal of the Arms Act? By the annulling of the partition? By writing inflammatory articles? By shouting Bande Mataram?

AWAZA-I-KHALQ, 16th December 1908.

By calling Tilak the uncrowned King or Surendra Nath—Surrender Not? By studying law? Or by presenting addresses to the Governors?

No, sir (not by these means).

Then how? By the sacrifice of lives on the part of National Volunteers? By studying the works of Vivekanand? By reciting the Gita? By starting National Colleges and Schools? By becoming anarchists? By manufacturing bombs? By ladies making appeals for funds to carry on litigation? Or by a reunion between Hindus and Musalmans?

No, sir (not by these means).

Then how? By winning over some foreign Power? By waking up Japan? By the supremacy of China in Tibet? By teaching boys in Bengal lathi and mugdar play? By setting Extremists against Moderates? Or by bathing in the Ganges in the month of Kartick!

No, sir (not by these means).

Then how? Listen: There is a story in Yoga Vashishth that there lived in a certain city a man who possessed both knowledge and wealth, although the combination of these is a most difficult thing. In spite of all this excellence (in him) he got possessed of a desire to get the Chintaman Mohra (jewel on the head of serpents). In order to get it he practised austerities. After giving away much (money in) alms, he one day came across the mohra (the jewel). He picked it up indeed, but did not know what it was. He (then) met a jeweller who (wished to) take the Chintaman Mohra from him, and the foolish man, not knowing its worth, gave it up to the former who, when possessed of it, began to cogitate in the following strain:—"It is possible any one may take it away from me, for worldly men are treacherous and tyrannous. It is of no advantage to me to continue in their company when I have got a precious jewel like the Chintaman as I will be able to get whatever I like just as I require it."

He therefore went away to a jungle leaving behind all his property.

Hearing this the [Raja (?)] asked: "If by Chintaman is meant that All-pervading Providence, why did I not get it, especially when I left my wife, my children and everything in the desire to possess it."

He got the following reply:—

"O! Raja, thou hast not renounced anything yet, and of this the proof is that even now thou sayest that thou hast renounced thy kingdom and all. Thou hast yet to cast off thy pomp, glory, kingdom, thy illusions and thy desires. For wealth and kingdom thou hadst none from the beginning. (All thy rennuciation) would be no avail so long as thy self is with thee and is not abandoned. For

'When I get rid of self
In truth I am God then.'

Now it is worth considering what would be the result if we do get swaraj. Swaraj was not unknown to India (for there was swaraj in India before), but it is our 'self' which has deprived us of it. And there is no means of doing away with this 'self' other than this:—

'Make fast your eyes and close your ears and mouth,
Should you then not see the mysteries of Heaven then call me false'

Dear countrymen! You search your swaraj in bombs, revolver shots, anarchist conspiracies, messages of the King, speeches of Lord Morley in Parliament, Khudi Ram's sacrifice, and in deportation? Swaraj, which means your political emancipation, is present in your own house, in your body and in your very hair, (the only thing wanting is) that you do not act up to and follow the spirit of the verses quoted above (but allow yourself to be led astray in wrong directions).

You become rebellious in vain and get a bad name.

Considering your condition, the learned Rishi no doubt said well:

'Although present in ourselves we cannot see
Any curse on such a life.
O, Nanak! the world is suffering from a cataract."

OUDH AKHBAR, 19th December 1908.

Religious neutrality in Turkey and in India.

30. The Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 19th December, while referring to the inclusion of two Christians in the newly-formed Turkish Cabinet, sarcatically asks the Musalmans to point out any Musalman who has risen to be a Minister under a Christian ruler.

The editor then goes on to prove that while the British Government is pledged to a policy of religious neutrality, it seldom puts it into practice, and is very loth to allow others to hold responsible appointments in the State. On the other hand, Turks have frankly stated in their constitution that the State religion of Turkey would be Islam, but it would be no bar to official preferment.

Then follows an appeal to the Musalmans to follow the lead of the Congressmen, who are working for the uplifting of India and with a view to persuading the Government to repose greater confidence in Indians.

If they were to join hands with the Congress leaders then Lords Morley and Minto would be sure to grant their prayers.

The Arya Samaj in Jodhpur.

31. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 5th December (received on the 14th idem), referring to the removal of the signboard of the Arya Samaj by the police in Jodhpur on the occasion of His Excellency the Viceroy's recent visit, notes with regret that the Jodhpur State, which was at one time the sole defender of the Hindu religion, now smells sedition in the Vedas, simply to please the Government. In conclusion, the editor says, that it is not the fault of the ruler of the State but of the spirit of slavery which dominates India at the present day.

The police and the Midnapur case.

32. The Swarajya (Allahabad), for the 5th December (received on the 14th idem), referring to the release of a large number of the accused in the Midnapur case, remarks that the whole case was concocted by the police and had no reality, the motive being reward and perhaps titles. In conclusion the editor says: "Friends, the Day of Judgment is near, how long will the blood of the murdered remain hidden (murder will be out). If the edge of the sword keeps quiet, the drops of blood on the sleeves will speak (for themselves)."

SWARAJYA 5th December 1908.

A plea for the increase of the pay of Tahsildars and Naib Tahsildars.

33. The Union Gazette (Bareilly), of the 7th December (received on 16th December), remarks that now that the cost of living has considerably increased the pay of the Tahsildars, Naib Tahsildars and other revenue officials should be increased accordingly. If this is not done it is improper to expect that they will be very particular as to how they maintain their status as responsible and respectable Government officials.

UNION GAZETTE, 7th December 1908.

Conviction of the editor of the Swarajya at Allahabad.

34. The Riyaz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 16th December, referring to the conviction of the editor of the Swarajya at Allahabad, remarks:—"The opponents of the Government deserve severe punishments of this nature. The only effect of the conviction of the first editor was that his successor followed in his steps. If the Swarajya and Urdu-i-Mualla had been more careful, our province would have been free from the taint of sedition."

In continuation of the same, the editor recommends the editor of the Urdu-i-Mualla to the mercy of the Government, urging that he has tendered an apology.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 16th December 1908.

Conviction of the editor of the Swarajya at Allahabad.

35. The following is from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 17th December:—

"Lala Hari Ram, editor of the Swarajya, is not a resident of these provinces; nobody knows him. The paper had a very limited circulation in these provinces. Hence his seditious writings and his prosecution for them could not excite any interest in the people. The trash which was published in the paper seldom attracted any notice. His prosecution had therefore caused no surprise. If there has been any surprise at all, it is due to the severity of the sentence passed on the man. True, he had deliberately taken upon himself the editing of a paper whose first editor was convicted of sedition; but that ought not to have led the Judge to inflict a vindictive sentence of deportation for seven years on Hari Ram, particularly when the fact was before him that the writings—however condemnable they were—had not produced any effect on the people of these provinces."

ADVOCATE, 17th December 1908.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th December 1908.

Conviction of the editor of the Swarajya at Allahabad.

36. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 17th December, notes with approval the conviction of the editor of the Swarajya. There is no sedition on a large scale, he remarks, in these provinces, and it is highly desirable that an organized attempt to spread sedition should not be made in the provinces. Thanks to the firmness of Sir John Hewett, and to his persistent refusal to have recourse to repressive measures when such measures were uncalled for, many a score has been averted. And this being the case it is only right that a paper like the Swarajya should not be allowed to disturb the general peace and harmony that prevails.

BHARAT SUDASHA PRAVARTAK, November 1908.

Conviction of Daulat Ram under section 109, Criminal Procedure Code, and chapter XI of the Satyarth Prakash.

37. The Bhárat Sudasha Pravartak (Farrukhabad), for November (received on the 14th idem), declares the conviction of Daulat Ram under section 109, Criminal Procedure Code, at Jhansi, to be unjust in view of the fact that the accused had long been deriving his livelihood from public subscriptions and that he had no blot upon his character, and expresses a hope that the Arya Samaj public will take steps to get his conviction set aside. The editor says that although the Satyarth Prakash has been before the public for the last twenty-six years, yet even the enemies of the Arya Samaj have not been able to find anything seditious in it, and remarks that in view of this fact it is strange that the District Magistrate of Jhansi should have found its eleventh chapter to be objectionable. He says that the passage impugned is a statement of a historical fact, and contains no reflection whatever upon the present Government. He urges the Arya Samajists to get the unfavourable remarks of the Magistrate cancelled, inasmuch as they are based upon a misunderstanding and are quite unmerited.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 16th December 1908.

Conviction of Daulat Ram under section 109, Criminal Procedure Code.

38. The Saddharm Prachárak (Kanjri, Bijnor), of the 16th December, reproduces the evidence of Dhan Singh, constable, in the case of King-Emperor versus Daulat Ram at Jhansi, and characterizes it as being unreliable and manufactured. The editor next quotes from the evidence of Sub Ram, Subedar, to show that the sepoys were prohibited from attending the Arya Samaj, and expresses his surprise that this should be allowed, in contravention of the King-Emperor's Proclamation which lays down that none of his subjects will be molested or interfered with on account of his creed.

He respectfully asks if His Honour Sir John Hewett will himself go through the papers of this case, and, if not, whether he will issue an order laying down clearly that Arya Samajists do not possess the rights of a British subject, so that they may decide whether they will prefer religion or worldly prosperity.

JEDD-O-JEHAD, 14th December 1908.

Conviction of Chaudhri Mehdi Hassan.

39. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 14th December, notes with regret the sentence of death passed on Chaudhri Mehdi Hasan, an Oudh talukdar, and remarks that it is the spirit of the time that no distinction is made in courts of justice between the high and the low.

In the end he insinuates that his conviction may perhaps be due to the machinations of the police.

UNION GAZETTE, 28th November 1908.

Abolition of Octroi duties.

40. The Union Gazette (Bareilly), of the 28th November (received on the 10th December), objects to the abolition of octroi duties and to the proposed imposition of a house-tax instead, on the ground that this will benefit traders and merchants only while it will entail unnecessary hardships on the public at large. Under ordinary circumstances, it is traders alone who have to pay octroi duties, hence it is that they are welcoming the proposal of the abolition so warmly. The average man has very little to do with octroi duties, and therefore the imposition of a house-tax upon him is nothing short of an injustice.

Levying of Octroi duty on articles of daily use.

41. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th December (received on the 14th idem), complains that octroi duties are charged even on articles of daily use and that inspecting officers of the municipalities also are not above corruption. The authorities should not repose absolute reliance on any particular person, but should personally supervise the working of their department with a view to preventing unfair practises.

RAHBAR, 7th December 1908.

The Octroi Commission.

42. The Tohfa-i-Hind (Bijnor), of the 11th December (received on the 14th idem), takes exception to the resolution that the Octroi Commission should sit at Cawnpore, where those interested in the question may go to give their evidence. This, in the opinion of the editor, would entail much hardship on those willing to give their evidence. Besides it would serve as a deterrent, for nobody would like to impose upon himself the trouble and annoyance of railway travelling during this cold weather. It would be much better if the members of the Commission make a tour round the province visiting important towns and ascertaining local opinion on the spot.

TOHFA-I-HIND, 11th December 1908.

The Octroi Commission.

43. Referring to the inquiries to be made by the Octroi Commission as to the best way of securing a constant income to municipalities in the United Provinces, the Vyápári and Karigar (Benares), of the 15th December, expresses the opinion that the first and the third methods laid down in the Government resolution for the assessment of octroi will help it little in removing the present difficulties, and will at the same time fall somewhat hardly on those connected with growing industries and handicrafts. The editor approves of the second method, the abolition of the present system of assessment by levying a terminal tax, as more convenient to the public. But in the first place the heads of assessable articles should be reduced, by several articles being grouped under one head and the rates of duty should be fixed at half of the present rates. This will not, he says, diminish the income, inasmuch as refunds will not have to be made; those goods will also be assessed which were hitherto exempted from duty; for example those goods which go to cantonments and other places outside the limits of municipalities, and the cost of collecting the dues will be saved.

VYAPARI AND KARIGAR, 15th December 1908.

Reform in the system of municipal election.

44. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 16th December, reproduces the remarks and the suggestions of the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 10th December, regarding the system of municipal election in these provinces. (Vide paragraph 27, Selections no. 50.)

HINDUSTANI, 16th December 1908.

Reform in the system of municipal election.

45. The Anand (Lucknow), of the 17th December, notes with gratification that the Government intends to introduce certain reforms in the system of electing municipal members. The editor, after pointing out the various abuses existing under the present system, suggests that literate persons should be appointed voters, and that they should give their votes in the presence of a responsible officer so that no attempts could be made to influence them, and that in this way the best men would be returned.

ANAND, 17th December 1908.

Municipal institutions in India.

46. Lala Har Dayal, M.A., "the pride of the nation", contributes the first of a series of articles on the introduction of the growth of municipal institutions in India to the Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 5th December (received on the 14th idem). He says: "All Indians are eagerly waiting for the grains that are being parched in the India Office, and Mr. Gokhale, the prince of beggars, is there with hands outstretched to get the best of the lot. But we know the worth of these grains; Mr. Gokhale will simply burn his hands and get nothing. The grains (reforms) which will be distributed to Indian beggars next month contain, among other things, municipal reforms; the object being to put innocent Indians off the track, so that they may forget their dream of swaraj. Municipal institutions are not only of no use to India but are calculated to injure its interests. So we would discuss the origin of these institutions. Lord Ripon, who founded them, was the most determined enemy of India, and he did so in order to make the foundation of British Government stronger in India.

No one would believe that the British introduced it into this country to foster self-government in the face of the ruthless cruelty with which they destroyed the corporate life of Indian villages and their panchayats. Can we believe that a Government which did so could willingly foster self-government in towns. When municipal institutions were introduced, the Congress had not come into existence and constitutional agitation had not yet begun. Then how is it possible that a foreign Government granted to Indians such a boon; for it cannot do so unless under compulsion. So we see that "these committees are of the same nature as false lace, counterfeit coins or poisonous pills coated with sugar."

(e)—Education.

RAHBAR, 7th December 1908.

Moradabad District School.

47. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th December (received on the 14th idem), contains the following in its local columns:—

"The District School affair has ended in this way. Master Jalal-ud-din, father of the offending student, has resigned his post, and master Ganga Prasad has been transferred to Allahabad on the same pay. Now the fact of the student receiving such a light punishment and of the master being transferred to such a far off place leads to the only possible conclusion, that instead of the student the master has been punished. The Director is requested to consider this and to do whatever he thinks proper immediately; for we have had sufficient delay in this case."

MASHRIQ, 15th December 1908.

The Convocation speech.

48. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 15th December, while publishing a full translation of the text of His Honour's Convocation speech, remarks that it is of great interest to those interested in education and in the industrial development of the country. The editor, however, takes exception to the restriction of age imposed on candidates going up for the Entrance examination. He thanks His Honour for his remarks about Tom Brown's School Days and on industrial education.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th December 1908.

Agricultural education in the United Provinces.

49. Discussing the subject of agricultural education, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 17th December, remarks that the United Provinces compare very unfavourably with Bengal in the study of agriculture, as Bengal has by far the larger number of agricultural colleges. The systematic study of improved agricultural methods is a most important one and merits more attention than it receives at present. The editor is of opinion that if some of the larger schools and colleges in these provinces opened classes for the study of the elementary principles of agriculture, the Cawnpore Agricultural College would not have such difficulty in obtaining students. A feature of the Bengal programme is that their agricultural education has not been confined to a particular class. The result is that many are induced to devote themselves to agriculture who otherwise would have adopted another profession in life. In these provinces outsiders have very little chance of being admitted to the training college till Collectors' nominees for kanungoships and zamindars' nominees for land agents' posts have been provided for. The superiority of the Bengal system is obvious from the fact that the first student in order of merit at the final examination of the Sibpur agricultural class was appointed a Deputy Collector and the second was made a Sub-Deputy Collector while another was given an appointment in the Educational Department. If a first class agricultural college could be established in these provinces and recruited from among the under-graduates of the University, with prospects of good billets in the Revenue and Agricultural Departments for all who joined, it would be of immense benefit to both these departments. The editor notes with satisfaction Sir John Hewett's interest in agricultural matters and trusts that he will see the advantage of adopting the Bengal system in an improved form.

ADVOCATE, 17th December 1908.

An All-India Educational Conference.

50. The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 17th December, notes with approval Mr. Sadashiva M. Dixit's proposal to convene an All-India Educational Conference with a view to securing the co-operation of the leading educational men in the country. Such a conference would aim at exciting interest in the people in the matter of education and at securing the benevolent co-operation of the Government. Three things have been put forward as forming the constructive scheme. The foundation of infant schools, schools for adults and a machinery for working out the one-language problem. The one thing that should always be kept in view, the editor notes, is to prevent overlapping; all available energy should be devoted to supplementing State efforts so as to add to quantity and enhance quality.

(f)—Agriculture and questions affecting the land.

51. Referring to Mr. Fremantle's remark in his notes on the Co-operative Credit system to the effect that the poorer a cultivator is the higher the rate of interest he has to pay, the editor of the Hindosthan (Kalakankar), in the issue of the 11th December, remarks that a statement like this is a severe criticism on British rule in India. Where is the magnanimity or the even-handed justice, he asks, of the renowned British raj visible in this? The poor are ground down by exacting money-lenders and are sold out of house and home by men to whom they have pledged their little all in time of need. He says that all courts that are competent to issue ejectment orders should be empowered to cancel their order subsequently if they are convinced that the judgment-debtor is a pauper and unable to meet his liabilities.

Co-operative Credit Societies of the United Provinces.

HINDOSTHAN, 11th December 1908.

52. Referring to the Government resolution on Mr. Fremantle's report on the Co-operative Credit system in the United Provinces, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 17th December, remarks that the little indication of growing interest in the movement that there is is anything but complimentary to the patriotism of the provinces. Here is a machinery devised to help the peasant as well as the artizan, and Government is prepared to aid in the work and it is incumbent accordingly on the leading men of the provinces to point out to the masses the advantages of the system.

Co-operative Credit system of the United Provinces.

ADVOCATE, 17th December 1908.

(g)—General.

53. The Zia-ul-Islam (Moradabad), for the month of November (received on the 12th idem), contains an article from its manager in which he tries chiefly to criticise the Rajput Gazette for having represented the Muhammadans as hostile to the swadeshi movement. The writer denounces the swadeshism of the Hindus in scathing terms and holds it responsible for the atrocious crimes committed in Bengal. The swadeshism of the Muhammadans, on the contrary, he says, is an honest desire to revive Indian arts and industries. The boycott of Austrian fez-caps may be interpreted in any way, but it is no longer possible for the Hindus to mislead the British Government. It has thoroughly realized the treachery of a treacherous nation whose aim is simply to delude the Government with a view to secure its own ends.

Muhammadans and the swadeshi movement.

ZIA-UL-ISLAM, November 1908.

54. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th December (received on the 14th idem), while referring to the boycott of Austrian-made fez-caps in Turkey, remarks that in view of the Sultan's emphatic declarations on this subject of boycott, the so-called opposition of the Muhammadans to the swadeshi movement in India becomes unaccountable. The movement is as important from the economic as from the political point of view. Every one, therefore, who does not want to see his children dying and his country impoverished should sympathize with it and help its cause.

Muhammadans and the swadeshi movements.

RAHBAR, 7th December 1908.

55. The Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th December (received on the 14th idem), while referring to the success of the swadeshi movement, remarks that foreign capitalists are now coming out to India to invest their money in starting factories, &c. These factories would, no doubt, provide work to the Indian labourers. Nevertheless, let us hope that if the Government does not interfere, they too would come to be looked upon in course of time as bideshi and be boycotted accordingly.

56. The Sahifa (Bijnor), of the 12th December, draws the attention of the Government to the attempts which are being made by the Hindu press to incite the Musalmans to boycott British goods by instancing the example of Turkey, and warns the Musalmans to beware of the insidious machinations of their political opponents.

ADVOCATE, 17th December 1908.

Sir Edward Baker and the swadeshi movement.

57. The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 17th December, notes with approval that Sir Edward Baker has issued a circular letter calling on all district officers to help small capitalists engaged in industrial pursuits. "This," the editor remarks, "is surely a very practical step in order to help in the growth and development of the swadeshi movement, and it is hoped the officials concerned will display as much sympathy with the cause as has prompted Sir Edward Baker to formulate this good policy. In other provinces, too, the principle requires to be followed to the good name of the Government, profit of the manufacturer and furtherance of Indian industrialism."

UNION GAZETTE, 7th December 1908.

Indian Musalmans and the boycott of Austrian goods.

58. The Union Gazette (Bareilly), of the 7th December (received on the 16th December), while referring to the apathy of the Indian Musalmans towards the boycott of Austrian goods, remarks that those who oppose this movement on the ground that the British Government is against it are enemies alike of their nation, of their country and of their Government.

If the Muhammadans of India give up this false sense of loyalty and join Arabia and Egypt in declaring the boycott of Austrian goods, it would not be long before Austria would be brought to its senses and would yield to the demands of Turkey.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 8th December 1908.

Indian Musalmans and the boycott of Austrian goods.

59. In calling upon the Musalmans of India to boycott Austrian-made fez-caps, the editor of the Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), writing in the issue of the 8th December (received on the 12th idem), remarks that there need be no apprehension of any estrangement between the rulers and the ruled in India on this account, for the British Government has lent its cordial support to Turkey in the present crisis.

ZAMINDAR-O-KASHTKAR, October and November 1908.

Scarcity in India, its cause and the remedy.

60. The editor of the Zamindar-o-Kashtkar (Bijnor), writing in the combined issue for October and November (received on the 12th idem), refers to the valuable work done by the Government to mitigate the misery and hardships caused by the recent famine, and remarks that no doubt Government has done its duty thoroughly well and has succeeded in alleviating the distress of the poor to some extent. But human power could not be expected to meet successfully the ravages of nature, and so it is that the masses are in the grip of dire calamity even now. The poor cultivators already labouring under many other disadvantages have now to face the disastrous effect of scarcity prevailing everywhere.

The editor then goes on to say that in spite of what may be said to the contrary, it is pretty certain that railways in India have, by distributing the product of one place over the whole land, raised the prices of foodstuffs everywhere so that scarcity has become a permanent factor in the economic condition of India; but he remarks that if the irrigation scheme of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor is carried out there is much hope for a better state of affairs in the near future.

SARASWATI, December 1908.

Antiquarian research in India.

61. A correspondent in the Saraswati (Allahabad), for December, invites the attention of the Archæological Department to the desirability of ancient ruins in the neighbourhood of Allahabad, Ajodhia and Delhi being dug out, inasmuch as they promise a rich return for its activities.

SWARAJYA, 5th December 1908.

Arrests in connection with the desecration of the Queen's statue at Nagpur.

62. The Swarajya (Allahabad), of the 5th December(received on the 14th idem), while referring to the arrest of one Paranjpe and several others in connection with the desecration of the Queen's statue at Nagpur, and to the proclamation of a reward of Rs. 1,000 at the same time for the arrest of the real perpetrators of this dastardly crime, remarks that if the Government is not sure of these persons being implicated in the act, it should release them forthwith.

63. The Union Gazette (Bareilly), of the 7th December (received on the 16th December), reviewing the report of the Excise department for the year 1907, observes that the decrease in the consumption of Indian liquors is no doubt due to some extent to the increase of duties upon them. It is to be hoped, therefore, that in the two divisions of Benares and Gorakhpur also the duties will be increased as an experimental measure. The editor, in conclusion, disagreeing with the Pioneer, remarks that foreign liquor is also extensively used by the middle classes, and that, if the duty on it is increased, it will have much beneficial effect on the morals of Indians and Europeans as well.

The effect of enhanced excise duties on Indian and foreign liquors.

UNION GAZETTE, 7th December 1908.

64. Referring to the agrarian troubles in Bettiah, the Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th December (received on the 14th idem), remarks that up to now Government cared very little for the unrest, and rightly too, for it was confined to the educated classes alone. But if the news regarding the Bettiah incident be true the state of affairs is becoming very dangerous.

Agrarian troubles in Behar and unrest.

RAHBAR, 7th December 1908.

65. The Riyaz-i-Faiz (Pilibhit), of the 12th December, referring to the vexed problem of the unemployed in England, remarks that the poverty of the masses is due to a large extent to the fact that the advent of machinery has done away with manual labour and consequently with those who depended upon it for their employment. So long as the cotton industries are not revived under a protective tariff, there is no hope of a satisfactory solution of the problem.

The question of the unemployed.

RIYAZ-I-FAIZ, 12th December 1908.

66. Discussing higher appointments in the clerical service, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 13th December, remarks that he has had frequently to comment on the absence of Indian clerks in the better-paid appointments in the Civil Secretariat and other Government offices in these provinces. All the Registrarships in the Secretariat and all Superintendentships in its civil sections are held by Europeans or Eurasians. Head Assistants in the offices of Heads of departments and in Commissioners' offices are also filled from these classes. It would be a very serious charge to bring against the Government of India that when they declared statutory natives of India to be admissible to posts expressly reserved for Indians they did so with the intention of reserving a certain class of appointments for Eurasians and domiciled Europeans. But there appear to be grounds for such a charge when it is borne in mind that Indians are practically excluded from the best-paid appointments in all Government offices. This fact rather implies that the Local Government is not faithfully carrying out the orders of the Government of India and that the Proclamation of 1858 is receiving but little attention. True, all head clerkships in district offices are held by Indians, and the number of Indians in Government service far exceeds the combined number of Europeans and Eurasians, but as long as posts coveted by the latter classes are reserved for them, no protestations of impartiality on the part of the Government will convince Indians that the Great Queen's proclamation has not been lost sight of. The Registrarship in the Public Works Secretariat is shortly to be vacant, and now, the editor says, Government has an opportunity of showing that it is prepared to rise above the petty prejudices of colour. There are several Indians fully qualified for this post and one or two have a certain claim on it, and to fill it with a native will cause general satisfaction and content.

Higher appointments in the clerical service.

ADVOCATE, 13th December 1908.

67. Referring to the loss of money and life caused by recent conflagrations in a Bombay sugar factory and in the Dum Dum arsenal, the Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 16th December, says that such accidents very much perplex the weak-minded Hindus, and that in spite of the testimony of reason to the contrary (as to their causes), it is the belief of the masses that the intentions of a Sovereign have a great effect on the condition of his subjects.

SADDHARM PRACHARAK, 16th December 1908.

68. Referring to the divorce case in England in which Mr. Vena Gopal Chetty, a District Judge in the Madras Presidency, was respondent, the Saddharm Prachárak (Kangri, Bijnor), of the 16th December, expresses surprise that Government does not dismiss him for his moral depravity in disowning his English wife under the excuse of his caste prejudices, seeing that it suspended a Government pleader for delivering an ordinary speech. The editor says that even if Government takes no action against him, it is incumbent upon Hindu society to boycott him as a warning to its other members against such conduct.

He suggests, as a means of putting an end to such undesirable incidents, the advisability of Indian students not being sent to England for some time, or of a strong association being formed in London which should exercise a healthy influence over them.

V.—Legislation.

ZUL QARNAIN, 14th December 1908.

The new Anarchists Act.

69. Referring to the new Act for the speedy trial of anarchists and for the suppression of dangerous Samitis, the Zul Qarnain (Budaun), of the 14th December, remarks that the new Act is good so far as it goes, but observes that it does not go very far. The editor notes that the circumstances require the severest possible measures and he expresses regret that the Government has stopped short in the course of its repressive policy, and that it remains satisfied with half measures for the present.

BHARAT JIWAN, 14th December 1908.

The new Anarchists Act.

70. The Bhárat Jiwan (Benares), of the 14th December, expresses approval of the new Act passed for the suppression of anarchism in Bengal, but urges that every care should be taken to prevent innocent persons being involved in trouble along with the guilty.

ADVOCATE, 17th December 1908.

The new Anarchists Act.

71. Commenting on the new Act that became law at the last session of the Legislative Council, the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 17th December, remarks that when the executive Government feels that it should have larger power to put down an extraordinary form of crime and preserve peace in the country, it is the duty of every one to support Government in such legislation. It is at present incumbent on the State to impress on the minds of the anarchists that every effort will be made to put an end to their fiendish schemes. In the speeches on the occasion of the passing of the recent law there were broad hints that if constitutional methods fail Government will have no hesitation in adopting unconstitutional ones.

As regards Sir Harvey Adamson's speech, the editor finds it difficult to believe that all the associations for physical culture in Bengal are centres of crime or that many of the dacoities in Eastern Bengal were the work of youths of the middle class, who call themselves national volunteers.

Again, the suppression of all Samitis will, the editor thinks, extinguish the spark of life in the people and put a dangerous instrument into the hands of the police. This extraordinary provision may accordingly be turned into an engine of oppression. Extraordinary measures require extraordinary precautions and should only be enforced under exceptional circumstances. In conclusion the editor maintains that the weed of anarchy in India is an ephemeral one and cannot last long.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 17th December 1908.

The new Anarchist Act.

72. Discussing the speeches made at the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council in connection with the passing of the Anarchist Bill, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 17th December, remarks.—

"Not a single official member attempted to analyse the causes that have contributed to the appearance of anarchism in Bengal. The preaching of sedition, the springing up of unlawful associations were all mentioned in detail, but there was perfect silence as to the causes that preceded them. There was no sedition or anarchism four years ago. Why have they appeared now? We look in vain for an answer to this question in the many long speeches that were made. Sir Harvey Adamson has neither the breadth of view nor the open-mindedness of a statesman and his speech is not very convincing. Too much is taken for granted and the real evil that does exist is greatly exaggerated. If the organization of terrorism were as widespread as he seeks to make out, political crime would be far more frequent than appears in the list enumerated by him."

Referring to the possible extent of the Extremist movement the editor expresses the opinion that it is by no means as great as is feared by the rulers of the country. Indians have so far been the chief sufferers at the hands of the Extremists. Thousands of young men who belong to Samitis and National Volunteer corps, finding no outlet for their energies in the direction of service for their country, have turned their attention to highway robbery and have become the terror of certain districts of Bengal. Their methods have alienated the sympathies of the people from their cause, and they have thus adopted the best method they could to limit their recruiting ground so that there need be no apprehension as to the spread of the movement. To take too much notice of the movement, the editor notes, merely attracts public attention to it and causes its promoters to be lauded as heroes.

VI.—Railway.

73. Referring to the recent collision near Mustafabad on the North-Western Railway line, the Rahbár (Moradabad), of the 7th December (received on the 14th idem), remarks that since the trains that collided were mail trains, the number of casualties must be very alarming no doubt. But it is doubtful if the exact number of deaths would be available. It is advisable for the relatives concerned, therefore, to proclaim the names of the missing members of their families and other particulars through newspapers so that the leaders may get a chance of taking steps in the matter.

The Mustafabad railway collision.

RAHBAR, 7th December 1908.

74. Referring to the recent railway collision near Mustafabad on the North-Western Railway line, the Tohfa-i-Hind (Bijnor), of the 11th December (received on the 14th idem),remarks that railway travelling in India is becoming very unsafe owing to frequent accidents resulting in heavy loss of life. The editor is of opinion that such accidents are due to the fact that ill-paid railway employés have often to work day and night continually without any rest. It is useless to punish them for neglect, for, so long as the staff is insufficient and railway lines are not doubled, accidents will continue to occur. In the interest of the travelling public and of the railway companies themselves, it is high time now to consider measures for the prevention of such disastrous accidents.

The Mustafabad railway collision.

TOHFA-I-HIND, 11th December 1908.

75. The Riyaz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 12th December, while referring to the Mustafabad railway accident and other similar accidents during the year, remarks that it is high time that the Government should compel the railway authorities to double the railway tracks. It is much better that the railway fares should be raised a little, says the editor, than that there should be such frequent losses of precious human lives.

The Mustafabad railway collision.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 12th December 1908.

76. The following is from the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 13th December:--

"Why are accidents so frequent in these days? The obvious cause is said to be mistakes committed in giving 'line clear.' Some go to the length of putting it to the imperfect machinery known as the tablet system. Some put it to single tracks of railways, in spite of rise in the speed and number of trains running. Be that what it may, it seems the personal element is the most important thing to be taken into consideration, a fact that is very curiously overlooked in all such affairs. It is not very long ago that Rai Bahadur Ganga Ram traced the main cause of an accident to working the line with a station staff that was very poorly educated and much more poorly paid, but worked almost at a stretch for a period every day that was almost beyond human endurance. One is tempted to ask, what has been done to remedy this defect? On the other hand, in the North-Western Railway the running staff at least has got temptations placed before it to work harder still."

ADVOCATE, 13th December 1908.

77. A correspondent writing to the Union Gazette (Bareilly), of the 7th December (received on the 16th December), complains that the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway does not provide corresponding trains at Saharanpur for passengers travelling by the Shahdara-Saharanpur Light Railway.

NIZAM-UL-MULK, 8th December 1908.

Complaints about the Rohilkhand and Kumaun Railway.

78. The Nizam-ul-Mulk (Moradabad), of the 8th December (received on the 12th idem) draws the attention of the Agent of the Rohilkhand and Kumaun Railway to the following:—

"(1) That the train on the Kashipur-Moradabad branch, which reaches Moradabad in the evening, is not lighted at all, which causes great inconvenience to passengers.

(2) That Intermediate class accommodation on this branch is insufficient and the benches are without cushions, although the fare is double that of the third class.

(3) That Intermediate class tickets are not issued at the Katghar Railway Station.

(4) That this railway has no booking office in the Moradabad city, when other railways always open one for the convenience of passengers.

(5) That letters and other postal articles intended for villages near Aliganj are distributed from the Kashipur Railway Station, which causes considerable delay."

ADVOCATE, 3rd December 1908.

Circular by the Manager, North-Western Railway, re payment of overtime and extra work allowances.

79. Writing under the heading "Poverty and Overwork", the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 3rd December, quotes an extract from a circular, dated 25th November 1908, issued by the Manager of the North-Western Railway setting forth that railway employés were to receive a graduated scale of allowances for extra work and overtime, provided trains were not delayed owing to the fault or negligence of the running staff. A circular like this, the editor notes, is an invitation to run trains as swiftly as possible. It is in the interests of the running and station staffs to get trains away with the least amount of delay, and this leads to "line clear" being given before the usual formalities have been gone through.

VII.—Post Office.

BHARAT JIWAN, 14th December 1908.

A complaint about the Benares Head Post Office.

80. The Bhárat Jiwan (Benares), of the 14th December, complains of mismanagement in almost all the branches of the Benares Post Office, which frequently puts the public to unnecessary loss and inconvenience. The editor says that on several occasions money orders were not disbursed to their payees for several days, and that there is the worst possible confusion with regard to value-payable parcels. He further complains that a sufficient supply of postage stamps is not kept in stock in this office, which sometimes leads to a suspension of business, and asks the Postmaster-General to take steps to put an end to this deplorable state of affairs

Lala Hardayal on cow-killing.

81. The editor of Al Bashir (Etawah), writing in the issue of the 8th December (received on the 14th idem), refers to an article by Lala Hardayal published in the Hindustan (Lahore), of the 27th November, and remarks that there are sentences in the article, such as:—"the Hindu who does not hate the enemy of the cow, cannot love the cow", which suggest the only possible inference that the British Government should be replaced by a Hindu Government because Englishmen will not stop cow-killing in India.

JEDD-O-JEHAD, 14th December 1908.

The Wakf question.

82. The Jedd-o-Jehad (Shahabad), of the 14th December, while referring to the Wakf question which is being agitated by the Musalmans, remarks that Wakf (bequest) in favour of one's own progeny is sanctioned by Moslem law, and if English Judges have misinterpreted it, there is no reason why the mistake should not be rectified and justice done to a much-suffering community.

ARYA MITRA, 16th December 1908.

Chapter XI of the Satyarth Prakash.

83. The Arya Mitra (Agra), of the 16th December, reports that at the meetings of various Arya Samajes in the United Provinces, resolutions were passed expressing regret at the District Magistrate of Jhansi having characterized the eleventh chapter of the Satyarth Prakash as objectionable in the course of his judgment in the case of the King-Emperor versus Daulat Ram, and affirming that there is nothing objectionable in the Satyarth Prakash and asking the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha, United Provinces, to take proper steps in the matter.

84. The Arya Mitra (Agra), of the 16th December, complains that while Government professes strict religious neutrality, it subsidises European Churches with the money of the Indian taxpayer, who is generally a non-Christian. ARYA MITRA, 16th December 1908.

Subsidising of European Churches by the Government.

85. The following is an extract from a letter addressed by Madan Mohan Seth, member of the Bulandshahr Arya Samaj, to Dwarka Prasad, Assistant Secretary to the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha, Farrukhabad, which appears in the Arya Mitra (Agra), of the 16th December :— ARYA MITRA, 16th December 1908.

The Arya Samaj at Aligarh.

"1. Considering the apathy that has befallen the Aligarh Arya Samaj, and the crisis that has come in the history of that Samaj, it is necessary that the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha should do something to revive the work of the Samaj.

For this I propose :—

That two Updeshaks of the Sabha should be deputed to Aligarh and should reside there for at least two months. Their work should consist in removing the doubts that have arisen in the minds of the local officials, and principally to evoke enthusiasm in the hearts of the Samajists there. Every now and then officials of the Pratinidhi should visit the place with a view to helping the men on the spot.

2. The Vedic Ashram at Aligarh should be revived, and, if it be found impossible to have it recognized by the Aligarh school authorities, a Patshala, independent of the University regulations, should be opened there.

3. You know that the subordinate police officers are vexing and harassing unnecessarily the mufassil Arya Samajists and consequently, at many places, the Samajes are lapsing into inactivity. To revive the situation I propose that the Sabha should request the district Samajes to send deputations to every village and tahsil, which deputations should do two things.

In the first place the deputations should collect all the evidence connected with the police intimidation; and, secondly, they should encourage the mufassil Arya Samajists to carry on their Dharmic work with unabated zeal. For this purpose the Pratinidhi Sabha should allot some money to every district Samaj.

To supervise the work of the district Samajes the Updeshaks of the Sabha should be sent to each and every district with a view to collect evidence of police oppression of Arya Samajists, and to help the district deputations in their work.

The matter in question is of very great importance and if nothing would be done just now, it may imperil the very existence of the Arya Samaj."

RASIK MITRA, December 1908.

Poems on the reformation of India.

1. The Rasik Mitra (Cawnpore), for December, contains a number of poems on the reformation of India. A translation of some of them is given below :—

By Sardar Lal Biseshwar Singh of village Kandhwar (Rewah) :

"Since he ascended the throne he has been ruling righteously, and his brother, son or grandson will some day or other come to Delhi too. He will protect the people of India and will proclaim various statesmanlike acts from England, each surpassing the other in the wisdom of its measures. He will cut off the noses of oppressive and unjust officials and will banish them in a short time. In my opinion the King-Emperor intends to reform India by educating several hundreds of thousands of students."

By Nathu Ram Shankar of Harduaganj (Aligarh) :

"Those who have been born to perform acts of mercy (lit. to make gifts of mercy), they, the learned and the fortunate, are dear to the people like their (own) lives. They are being punished continually, still they befriend us. They, a glorious (or the valorous) people, even when confined in jails thus exclaim : 'We will not forsake the vedic religion, nor will we forget Shiva, we will not forget goodness, we will reform thee O India.' We do not take any lives by means of bombshells, nor do we roam forth to be called dacoits and anarchists. We are not frightened by the intimidations of the proud and partial. 'Let all be adherents of justice,' this only we preach. Tell us whom we are not to pity and take out of the ocean of misery. We will not forget goodness, we will, O India, reform thee. The discriminating, the brave and the energetic will not forsake truth. The resolute will rather lose their lives than break their vow. We will never turn away from the service of royalty beloved of the people (but) we will squeeze out the venom of the serpent of maladministration (lit.). We will fight with the robbers of avarice (lit.) and will not be overcome. We will not forget goodness, we will, O India, reform thee. We will scrutinize the administration of our wise Emperor. We will weigh the loyalty of the people (lit. subjects) on the scales of love. We (lit we will) expose imposters by laying a finger on their weak points we (lit. we will lay bare the hollowness of imposters by hammering on the right places). We will worship, love, and speak sweet words. We will not talk idle things like Society gossips. We will not forget goodness, we will, O India, reform thee."

By Lala Sharda Prasad of Maihar :

"They—who do not forget Sita Ram, Radha Krishna, &c., who do penances, perform religious sacrifices, &c., who always think of doing good to others, who sing songs of praise to their master, teacher and parents, who favour their friends but kill their enemies and who relieve the helpless people,—they shall reform India."

By Lakshman Prasad Singh Lumamow (Hardoi) :—

"They who bear like flower the thunder-bolt-like government of the foreign rulers of the country, devoid as they are of even the least political wisdom; those brave men who hold their lives, their wealth and their all as cheap as straw in the interests of their country, Lashan (nom-de-plume of the writer), those, who setting aside talkativeness think of doing work fraught with wisdom—they, the protectors of the good matchless servants of the country, religious-minded and deserving of all praise will reform India."

By Daya Shankar of Rewari :

In sowing, we sow the seed of unity. In removing, we hunt out traitors to the country and remove them. In learning, we learn the teachings of Shri Tilak. In losing, we are prepared to lose our life for the sake of the country. In aspiring, Shankar (nom-de-plume of the writer), we aspire for an auspicious swaraj. In burning, we shall consume selfishness, false hope and fear. In killing, we shall kill our enemies and in reforming, we shall reform India."

"Wealth and water are not immovable and so shall we always think this life.

The human beings who perform cruel acts will go to hell, although they think they will not be damned.

We have given up avarice, worldly attachment and sexual enjoyments and will sacrifice our several lives in philanthropic work. Shankar, we will make the Aryan race assume its true character, and will reform India, restoring her to her original glory."

By Shri Lal Lalé Singh of Ghoordang (Sutna) :

"He who lengthened the garments of Draupadi in the midst of the assembly will remove all misfortunes in a moment.

May he who saved the elephant from the crocodile by means of his disc grant that Krishna in his mercy will carry (us) safe over the ocean of worldly existence.

Son of Vasudeva (Krishna), Lalé Singh, don't be aggrieved. He will destroy all the enemies and consume all sin. He who will remove misfortune as soon as his name is uttered, will reform India."

Some of the writers of the remaining poems propose the reformation of India by means of the swadeshi movement and the boycott of foreign sugar, while others base their hopes of this consummation only on the advent of the millennum after the present Iron age as foretold in Hindu scriptures.

ADVOCATE, 20th December 1908.

Lord Morley's Reform scheme.

2. The editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), in the issue of the 20th December, refers to the elaborate details of the reform scheme and observes "there can be but one feeling in the country shared by all persons who believe in the gradual development of India: that feeling is one of extreme satisfaction that the long deferred reforms have after all come and come in a shape which will cheer every worker in the field of Indian progress. We congratulate Lord Minto here and Lord Morley in England on their being able to successfully launch the scheme. When the King-Emperor in his gracious Proclamation was pleased to tell his subjects that representative institutions would be established in India, people were led to entertain the hope that the reform would be real and not merely formal. This hope has been fully realized. That for the first time the Government has been pleased to admit the sons of the soil into its highest administrative chamber is an acknowledgement of Indian merit which will be rightly appreciated throughout the country. The people will have the satisfaction that in the highest Council of the Empire there will be at least one person who, if competent, will be able to place before the Government the Indian view of every question. But it is not only in the highest Council of the Empire that the people have been given a voice,—the lowest and the humblest will also have a voice in the administration through the rural organization."

Deferring a detailed criticism on the scheme for the present, the editor expresses his appreciation of what has been given to Indians and is pleased to note "that the sting from the Reform scheme has been taken away and those misgivings about class representation have been removed from the minds of Indian reformers which had not a little prejudiced them against the Simla scheme. The principle of class representation has been admitted; the Muhammadan minority shall have the right of returning a number of members according to its proportion in population, but this will not be done by class electorates; the electors will be composed of members of both communities and the man seeking the honour of a seat in the Council shall remain as hitherto responsible to both communities. The resentment which was excited owing to the plurality of votes will be removed."

In conclusion the editor thanks the Government of India for thus respecting public opinion in this matter and expresses the hope that when the time for the formation of the electoral colleges comes, these colleges will be living units. "The scheme," he says, "as enunciated by Lord Morley, will satisfy all classes of people; even those who expected more would admit that the Government has taken a step in advance and that the statement made by it is frank and honest and that it behoves public-spirited citizens to make the expanded councils so workable that Lord Morley's successors may have no hesitation in aspiring after the establishment of Parliamentary institutions in India."

3. The editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 20th December, expresses his satisfaction at the statement made by Lord Morley in connection with the reform scheme. He observes "there is no likelihood that the decision of the Government will be misunderstood. The bomb throwers themselves will not be conciliated by any reforms. The minds of the majority of them are so immature that they do not even understand what they are about, except that murder and robbery are high patriotism. What is hoped is that as the reforms are introduced the ranks of the disaffected will gradually get thinner and anarchical crime will disappear. As regards the reforms themselves nothing has been finally decided, but Lord Morley's important despatch indicates the lines on which the different schemes will be finally shaped. It is to be earnestly hoped that there will be no deviation from Lord Morley's suggestions and these will be carried out in their entirety. The Council of Notables and the Provincial Advisory Councils are not approved by the Secretary of State and the proposal will be dropped. This is an eminently satisfactory decision."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 20th December 1908.

Lord Morley's Reform scheme.

With regard to the dispensing of official majorities in Provincial Legislative Councils, the editor, remarks, that if a combination of all non-official members against the Government were to occur that might be a very good reason for thinking that the proposed measure was really open to objection and should not be proceeded with, but officials in this country are not accustomed to look at any question in this light, and "the partition of Bengal would never have been proceeded with in the manner in which it was done had the slightest heed been paid to the frantic protests of a whole population. We attach the greatest importance to Lord Morley's remarks about the urgent need of encouraging local self-government and of resuming the thread where it was broken in 1882." "The village," says Lord Morley, "should be the starting point of public life," and wiser words were never written. Lord Morley also proposes to ask for power to form Executive Councils for Lieutenant Governors from time to time. These Councils should be established with as little delay as possible. The reforms outlined in Lord Morley's despatch are substantial and far-reaching and ought to be carried out with promptitude.

4. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 23rd December, expresses satisfaction at the statement made by Lord Morley regarding the Reform scheme and reproduces the observations of the editor of the Advocate (Lucknow), on the subject in the issue of the 20th December.

Lord Morley's Reform scheme.

5. The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 24th December 1908, says that in referring briefly to the reforms announced in Parliament by Lord Morley the Viceroy used language which marks as great a departure as the reforms themselves. "His Excellency's words are statesmanlike and will appeal strongly to the country. The real leaders of the people are the makers and leaders of public opinion, not the titled magnate, or the perfervid loyalist. Is it too much to hope that the Government will now listen to one of the most sagacious leaders of the people, one in whom the Government and the people repose equal confidence? Is not this a fitting opportunity for granting amnesty to political prisoners? Such a step, combined with the reforms that are about to be introduced, will usher in a truly new era, and will go farther than any repressive law to put a speedy end to the cult of the bomb, and to turn misguided young men into useful citizens helping the cause of reform. The cause of disaffection being removed the folly of political crime will become self-evident and the sinister forces at work will become impotent. The Government can dare as much as any fanatic, and the assured co-operation of the people will deal the deathblow to anarchism and organized political crime."

INDIAN PEOPLE, 24th December 1908.

The Viceroy on the Reform scheme.

6. In its leader on the Reform scheme, its demand and fulfilment, in the issue of the 24th December 1908, the Advocate (Lucknow) says that the larger association of Indians in the government of the country, not only in matters of legislation, but also in the everyday administration of Indian affairs as now sanctioned is exactly what the Congress demanded, and it is not the newness of the thing that is a matter for congratulation but its near approach to what was demanded. This is the third occasion in the history of direct British rule in India that an honest endeavour has been made to give the people some rights in their substance.

ADVOCATE, 24th December 1908.

The Reform scheme.

The Congress wanted neither an Imperial Council of Indian ruling Princes and Chiefs nor Advisory Councils of territorial magnates, and it is a matter of great satisfaction that Lord Morley finds that the idea of Advisory Councils is generally condemned in that the extension of the powers of the Legislative Councils is likely to serve the purpose better and make the establishment of rival councils simply unnecessary.

The Congress laid stress upon allowing a larger and truly effective representation of the people and demanded something more than mere expansion, and it is satisfactory to note that Lord Morley has been impressed with this demand; he sees no sufficient reason for prohibiting supplementary questions arising out of formal interpellations and their replies.

As regards the creation of executive councils for Lieutenant Governors, the editor observes that here we must confess the Government has met us halfway; election of members for the India Council and a provision in law for an Indian in each of the two Presidency Executive Councils are but details of a principle already admitted.

What strikes us as very curious, he says, is the little or no use that is made by the Government of Congress literature. A careful perusal of Resolution IV of 1886 and Resolution II of 1889 would furnish a solution similar to what Lord Morley has prescribed in his memorable despatch on the question of class representation.

"Thus, it may safely be said that in the reforms about to be introduced Congress demands have been fairly met and in one or two minor points the concessions may be said to have exceeded the Congress programme. But what has thus been given makes a good starting for qualifying ourselves to demand more. And this more is the old story with the people. We have still to fight for a large substitution of the economic and equally efficient Indian agency in the public service, especially the judicial branch of the Indian Civil Service, and in the higher branches of what are known as the minor services, such as the educational, medical, police, excise, opium, customs, post office, telegraph, forest, survey, engineering, and other departments: cautious but steady improvement of the position of Indians in the army; decentralization of district administration and extension of municipal self-government; separation of judicial from executive functions; reduction of military expenditure; also of the heavy cost of the civil administration due to the higher branches of the public service being a virtual monopoly of Europeans, so as to set free funds to be devoted to the following objects:—(a) elementary education; which should be made free at once throughout India and gradually compulsory; (b) industrial education; (c) improved sanitation of the poor; (d) further reduction of the salt tax; (e) measures for the relief of agricultural indebtedness, and the improvement of the cultivator's material condition generally."

In concluding the article the editor says that the late Lord Dufferin, on his return to England from the Indian Viceroyalty, was reported to have pressed upon her late Majesty the Queen-Empress Victoria, in the presence of the then Prince of Wales, now His Majesty the King-Emperor, the urgent need of making large concessions to Indians who were well qualified for them in order to prevent the creation of discontent and unrest. It has taken about 20 years for a Secretary of State to rise above his reactionary surroundings and muster courage to grant some substantial rights. But we have still to secure a good deal of ground in order to make it impossible for Lord Morley's successors to refuse us further concessions. And for this orderly and organized work on all lines of activity for national advancement from day to day and year's end to year's end is the one thing needful.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 24th December 1908.

The Reform scheme.

7. In its leader entitled "The Long Expected Reforms" in the issue of the 24th December 1908, the Indian People (Allahabad) observes 'the Indian people are always thankful for small mercies and though the advent of the long expected reforms is not likely to evoke much enthusiasm, still it will serve the purpose of a weapon, though not very sharp, in the hands of the Moderate leaders against the attacks of the Extremists. The scheme of the Advisory Council of Notables has been knocked on the head and knowing as we do what a reception the scheme had at the hands of the thinking portion of the Indian community, this deathblow of the scheme must be considered as a distinct victory of native Indian public opinion. It is very seldom indeed that such opinion prevails in the councils of the Empire, and if this is only an earnest of many more similar occasions to come, then the Indian public will have very few causes of complaint in the near future.'

Referring to the expansion of the Legislative Council the editor observes that the Reform proposals that have just been sanctioned solely deal with the enlargement of the Legislative Council and the extension of its functions.

As regards class representations he remarks that ' in the new Reform scheme we find that the Muhammadans, landholders and mercantile communities among others are given the right of election to the council. Are we then to understand that landholder means only a non-Mussalman landholder and a merchant means a non-Musalman merchant? That is, when a landholder happens to be a Muhammadan shall he forfeit the right of being elected? This apotheosis of the minority, this dispensing of favour according to the backwardness of a community is likely to launch the administration into a sea of difficulties. Why should not Rajputs or Kshatryas all over India have a special suffrage? Why should not the non-Brahmanical Hindus, the so-called lower or depressed classes, have a special suffrage? What distinction, for instance, should be made, say between a Shia and a Sunni, between an Ahmaddya and a Wahabi? The Electoral College is all very well but would that college remove this difficulty?'

The allowing of a non-official majority in the Provincial Council is, the editor says, a really very bold step on the part of Lord Morley and the Indian public is sure to fully appreciate it.

Adverting to Lord Morley's remarks for the extension of local self-government upon popular lines, he observes that the words of Lord Morley will not be forgotten by the local authorities.

In conclusion he says 'at any rate let us hope that this is a real beginning and that it is the earnest of further conciliatory measures to come.'

Lord Morley's statement on the Reform scheme.

8. The editor of the Indian People, (Allahabad) in the issue of the 24th December 1908, referring to Lord Morley's statement with regard to the association of the people of India with the Government in the work of actual day-to-day administration, observes that this is real statesmanship. 'To think that any people will permanently remain in the same position is not statesmanship. An inelastic and rigid system is bound to come to grief; a progressive and beneficent system will endure.'

INDIAN PEOPLE 24th December 1908.

He then refers to Lord Morley's remark that India was passing through a stupendous transition and that " to guide that transition with sympathy, political wisdom and courage, with a sense of humanity, duty and national honour may well be called a glorious mission," and expresses the hope that Lord Morley and his colleagues will apply themselves with single-minded earnestness to the fulfilling of that glorious mission. Since there are two Indian members on the Secretary of State's Council the absence of an Indian Member of the Viceroy's Council, in Lord Morley's opinion, is no longer defensible. The editor trusts that the earliest opportunity will be taken for making such an appointment.

Deportations in Bengal.

9. " Never since the framing of Regulation III of 1818 has it been used for the deportation of so many persons simultaneously " says the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 20th December, " as was done the other day in Bengal. And the wonder is that the deportations were made almost immediately after a new and drastic law had been passed to suppress anarchism in Bengal." The only presumption that can be made regarding these deportations, he says, is that all the prisoners have been arrested for complicity in the anarchist conspiracy, and it would have been fairer to them if they had been placed on their trial on such evidence as there was against them. But Regulation III of 1818 does not contemplate the production of any evidence.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 24th December 1908.

Referring to the arrest and deportation of Babu Krishna Kumar Mitra, the editor says that it is utterly inexplicable and the Bengal press unanimously declares that a serious blunder has been committed.

As regards the period of detention of these nine State prisoners nothing is known, and if the intention of the Government is that they should be kept as State prisoners until the anarchist conspiracy is crushed then they are likely to be confined for an indefinite period, for no one knows whether they are in any way connected with the conspiracy and whether their liberty or imprisonment is of any consequence to the conspirators. As regards the effect of these deportations no result is as yet apparent. In the Punjab soon after Lala Lajpat Rai and Ajit Singh were deported there was a rush of deputations to the Lieutenant Governor to give him assurances of the loyalty of the Punjabis, but will similar deputations, the editor asks, wait upon the Lieutenant Governors of the two Bengals? "We do not know, but our apprehension is that Bengal will not follow the example of the Punjab. In the first place, no one knows who is suspected in Bengal and who is not, when a man like the Raja of Narajole, who owes his title to the Government, could be arrested and kept in prison on a charge of conspiracy, and another man like Babu Krishna Kumar Mitra, known to his countrymen as an inoffensive and quiet reformer, has been deported as dangerous to the State. In the next place the temper of Bengal is not likely to be improved by such measures and the feeling of desperation must grow when it is recognized that no one is safe. The new law should have been deemed sufficient to cope with anarchism, but when it is supplemented by wholesale deportations on charges unknown the majority of people are likely to become indifferent to what may be in store for them."

MASHRIQ, 22nd December 1908.

Deportations in Bengal.

10. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur) of the 22nd December, refering to the deportation of nine prominent Bengalis, remarks that this clearly shows that the Government's patience is now worn out and it has sought refuge in martial law in the shape of the time-worn Regulation of 1818. The Bengal Government in its anxiety to purge that province of all seditious elements has jeopardized the safety of these provinces by temporarily housing some of the disaffected Bengalis in its jails.

Bengali anarchists and their supporters in the House of Commons.

12. The Sahifa (Bijnor), of the 19th December, expresses the opinion that the Bengali anarchists would not have been so bold as to conspire against the Government, had they not counted upon the moral support of some disaffected members of the House of Commons, such as Mr. Keir Hardie. The editor believes that they will be more careful in the future and desist from their futile attempts to subvert the British Government.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 20th December 1908.

The pacification of Bengal.

13. Referring to Mr. Gokhale's remarks that the modification of the partition and amnesty to political prisoners will alone pacify Bengal, the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 20th December, says that "Bengal is one of the earliest British provinces in India and has been long pacified. Indeed, the people of that province were deemed incapable of being anything but peaceful. If a section of such a people suddenly becomes violent and desperate gentle methods are not to be wasted upon them. That is the line along which the Government is moving. But anarchism and terrorism cannot be pacified, because their demands cannot be met and consequently there must be perpetual war between established order and anarchism. How far anarchic ideas have permeated Bengali society is more or less a matter of conjecture. When however it is figuratively stated that anarchism is a poisonous plant which should be dug and cast out it is assumed that there is only a limited number which can be ascertained and which can all be brought to justice. If it were so the pacification of Bengal would be very easy. But it is quite evident that the number of terrorists, though small, is likely to increase on account of the very measures that have been taken to suppress them. If they are to be compared to ghazis it should be borne in mind that although every ghazi is brought to justice there are always others who are attracted by the morbid fascination of ghaza. Similarly, the terrorist does not look upon himself as a criminal, nor has he any fear of death. Until he is convinced that what he does is morally wrong and a crime mere punishment, however swift or complete, will not deter him. It is the evil teaching of anarchism that has to be fought, for it is not only necessary that anarchists should be brought to justice but that there should be no future converts to this perverse and criminal faith. Political crime is opposed to the teaching of every religion in India. The pacification of Bengal is about the most pressing problem of the present time. The Government thinks that it is strong enough to put down any revolutionary movement. True, but no Government which is engaged in a perpetual struggle of this kind can devote sufficient attention to progressive administration. It is the first duty of the Government to maintain order, is it right for the Government to do anything by which there may be any danger to order? To adapt itself to the change of circumstances, to carry the people along with it is the highest duty of the Government. Public opinion in India was not a great force some years ago, but it has grown immensely in volume. To give heed to public opinion is not a sign of weakness but of wisdom."

Lord MacDonnell on the Partition of Bengal.

14. Referring to Lord MacDonnell's observations in connection with the Reform scheme, the Indian People (Allahabad), of the 24th December 1908, says :— INDIAN PEOPLE, 24th December 1908.

"There is not another peer in the House of Lords who can speak with the same authority on Bengal. His opinion that the Partition of Bengal was the greatest blunder ever made will be emphatically endorsed to the echo throughout India. It is none the less an enormous blunder because it is a settled fact. Should Lord Morley see his way to modify the Partition it would pacify Bengal far more effectively than the reform measures. And this modification will not be attributed to bombs, or political outrages, but to the final recognition of the supreme fact that the Partition was the greatest blunder ever made in India and ought not to be upheld."

Modern Egypt and Modern India.

15. A lengthy review on various recent works on Egypt, the most notable of which are "Modern Egypt" by Lord Cromer and "The Making of Modern Egypt" by Sir Auckland Colvin, appears in the Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for December. The contribution which is entitled "Modern Egypt and Modern India" is from the pen of an Indian nationalist. The writer begins by pointing out that Egypt appeals in a peculiarly attractive manner to Indians of present day. The political condition of the two countries is very similar and Egypt is very akin to India in its joys and sorrows. In both countries it was the incompetency of native rulers that led to successful British interference. British rule in each country has led to certain material advantages and has brought peace and safety of life and property in its train. In both countries contact with Western civilization has created certain political aspirations which are not viewed in a favourable light by the bureaucracy of either country. The policy of divided rule has its advocates in both countries and efforts are not wanting to set class against class and community against community. In Egypt it is the educated Muhammadan who is treated as an enemy, while in India the babu is reviled as the source of all mischief. HINDUSTAN REVIEW, December 1908.

The writer then traces the rise of British rule in Egypt and points out that though the Khedive is the nominal ruler of the country, he has to be guided in everything by his British advisers. Lord Cromer, he says, was an autocrat it is true, but as absolute as the most absolute Khedive that ever ruled. Still he did a great deal for the country in organizing a trained army, cutting canals, opening up railways and developing the resources of the country. The result of Lord Cromer's powerful rule was that the administration of Egypt soon became as efficient as it could be under an alien despot. But its very efficiency naturally led to a recognition on the part of the people of their rights and capabilities. In this respect the analogy still holds good. Indians have also become conscious of their rights and are striving to realize them. In theory Egypt and India are governed in the interests of their respective peoples and to some extent this theory is realized in practice. But the people of both countries want the actual realization of this theory in its fullest extent by obtaining an active share in the control of their own affairs. In conclusion the writer regrets that Lord Cromer held the opinion that Egyptians being Muhammadans are incapable of self-government and trusts that some educated Muhammadan will feel it incumbent on him to reply to Lord Cromer's attack and hit hard and straight at the traducer of his creed.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 10th December 1908.

Martial law in India.

16. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 10th December, commenting on the suggestions of some English and Anglo-Indian papers that the Government should proclaim martial law in India, remarks that there is hardly any necessity for having recourse to any such measure, as the majority of the people are staunch in their loyalty; while the anarchists in the country are so desperate in their intentions that martial law would have no effect on them. The Government should adopt a conciliatory policy which, the editor thinks, would establish general peace and tranquillity in the land.

INDIAN PEOPLE, 20th December 1908.

Bengali boys in Allahabad.

17. Referring to the Lieutenant Governor's remark in the course of the address he delivered at the prize distribution of the Anglo-Bengali School, Allahabad, to the effect that "malignant emissaries from the East have been attempting to corrupt the minds of the Bengali boys in this city, and though their efforts have been generally unsuccessful yet they succeeded in doing some harm to some Bengali boys, who recently displayed very bad manners," the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 20th December, says :—

"We do not know whether the emissaries referred to in the speech are the same that were mentioned in His Honour's speech on the present political situation delivered to select audiences at Lucknow, Allahabad and Agra, or whether there is a reference to other and later emissaries. If the emissaries referred to are agents of the Secret Societies in Bengal we must own to a sense of astonishment that they were allowed to preach their propaganda without let or hindrance, or that any Bengali boys should have been allowed to come under their influence. As regards bad manners our information is, though we would not venture to pit it against the superior information of the Lieutenant Governor, that Hindustani and other boys were as conspicuous as Bengali boys and it would be invidious to make distinctions. However, Sir John Hewett's advice is kindly meant and we have no doubt teachers and parents will profit by it."

The Indian National Congress.

18. The Bharat Jiwan (Benares), of the 21st December, considers the holding of the Indian National Congress this year advisable only in case both Moderates and Extremists join it, otherwise, the editor adds, it would be better not to convene it at all, as from the very nature of things there cannot be two national assemblies.

The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 23rd December, complains that while Indian journalists are being sentenced to long terms of imprisonment for creating race hatred, no notice is taken of the conduct of the miscreants who telegraphed to England that Miss Taylor was murdered by Indians, and that the motive of the murder of Mr. Clough was political. The editor further alludes to the rumour started by the Englishman that a conspiracy was being hatched in Bengal and which was subsequently found to have no foundation in fact.

He hung a few of them to a tree with their heads downwards and afterwards lighted a fire immediately below them .In this way he succeeded in extorting Rs. 5,000 from them, which was subsequently deposited in the treasury.

21. The Musáfir (Agra), of the 15th December, referring to the sentence of seven years' transportation passed on Babu Ram Hari, the editor of the Swarajya (Allahabad), remarks that it is not the duty of a really loyal subject of the British Government to conceal the true facts and present a distorted version of every case before the Government, and that therefore he gives expression to the following opinion :—" We would like to tell Government very plainly that the country does not approve of such severe sentences. We do not sympathize with the policy of such violent newspapers as the Swarajya, but at the same time we are sure we are voicing public opinion when we say that repressive policy simply emphasises the already existing bitterness, and that, instead of having any deterrent effect, it only exasperates the people all the more."

He refuses to admit that there are objections to a student, after taking a diploma at the Chiefs' College, completing his education at one of the Indian Universities, and remarks that in England there is not a profession or a service of any note in which the nobility does not hold its own. He attributes this to the fact that young men are not allowed to stand on their dignity, but have to rub shoulders with young men from the middle classes in schools and colleges, and in that way fit themselves for taking a prominent part in the daily business of the world."

27. The Hindi Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 20th December, deprecates the proposal to increase the fee of primary and secondary education in the Punjab on the ground that such a step will restrict the spread of education among the lower middle classes. The editor remarks that, considering the low level of the material condition of Indians, it is absolutely necessary that primary education should be given free, and that, if this be impossible, the present rates should by no means be increased.

"In this connection we venture to hope that the department will not unduly hurry on the changes, but will give the existing institutions every chance for adapting themselves to altered circumstances with reference to local needs. It would be highly detrimental to the sacred cause of education if the schools were to be abolished or disaffiliated without adequate provision being previously made either by the State or private resources for the taking in of the students set free by the breaking up of a particular school. It would also be highly undesirable to see private schools run on unrecognized lines."

Female education in the United Provinces.

30. The Indian People, (Allahabad), of the 24th December, remarks that it is self-evident that the cause of female education has not made any appreciable headway in the United Provinces, and that this is a matter in which the initiative and action must come from the people themselves. "The classic discussion as to the advisability or otherwise of female education was abandoned long ago as senseless in a community having any pretensions to civilization or enlightenment. Government has been trying many experiments in this connection. Why should it not try the effect of calling for volunteers for a recognized corps of Indian lady teachers to work on the lines of the missionary organizations, barring their propaganda of religious teaching, the reward held out being all legitimate expenses, ample honorarium, and the Kaisar-i-Hind medal, the Order of Merit or a badge of honour? This, we believe, will appeal to many of our educated countrywomen, who, not having enough to do at home, may take up this sacred portion of public duty."

In a note reviewing the Annual Report for 1907-8 on the working of the Co-operative Credit Societies Act (X of 1904), the editor of the Indian People (Allahabad), in the issue of the 20th December, has the following remarks:—Unfortunately in India, although agriculture is our mainstay, it is not thriving. It is in the hands of the ryot. The ryots have no money and no credit, and without money and credit any efforts towards the amelioration of agricultural conditions in the land would be mere pursuing of chimeras. Efforts, we believe, should be mainly directed to obtain the co-operation of the money-lenders and the land-holding class, who of all others can understand in what way their interests in the long run will lie."

Indigo is a dying industry, and it would be more politic for district officers and the planters themselves if they behaved with moderation instead of harrassing the poor ryots.

Usurious Kabulis in India.

34. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 23rd December, publishes the following letter signed by some residents of Lucknow:—

HINDUSTANI, 23rd December 1908.

"Kabuli money-lenders are daily becoming more and more successful in their money-lending operations throughout the length and breadth of India, and the poorer classes who are the mainstay of the nation are suffering a good deal at their hands. Their machinations extend not only to the people, but they are inimically disposed to the Government as well, whose friends they pretend to be.

Jehád is an essential doctrine of their religion, and they are ever ready to practise it. They are trying to become acquainted with every village in the countryside. These are not the principles of trade.

Mr. Editor, if you have the least regard for the poor oppressed public, have it published in the paper which is read by the Amir. All the nations of Europe trade in India, but none of them practise deception or fraud, and when India is in the throes of a famine they send large amounts of money to relieve the suffering people. They do not trade (directly) with the poorer classes. We shall first mention the deception they (Kabulis) practise upon the Government. For a long time people have been wondering where the hundreds and thousands of counterfeit coins come from. The report that they are manufactured in Europe is quite false. One of us who took part in two wars and acted as a spy found out that in the range of mountains near Ghazni these Kabulis manufacture coin on a large scale in caves and cannot be found out. They bring these coins into India and the poor people of India and Europeans are blamed for it.

Another way in which they deceive the Government is that they do not pay any income-tax, although every individual among them has an average income of Rs. 2,000 a year. They smuggle into British territory goods worth thousands of rupees, and buy with impunity stolen articles, such as military uniforms, boots and cartridges.

The British Government pays an annual subsidy to the Amir, and if it is equally anxious for the welfare of his subjects, it should give a pension to every Afghan. India has become their happy hunting-ground. Interest at the rate of 12½ per cent. per mensem was unknown in the past and has come to pass only under the just Government of the British; and to crown all they do not carry on their work honestly. They do not give any receipt for the interest they receive, and when they sue their debtors in courts they do not make allowance for payments made to them.

They recover their money by a curious form of dunning, by beating their debtors and the police does not interfere. This silence on the part of the police is not without some meaning. Has any one inquired who are the fortunate recipients of Kabuli fruits as presents. They are not, as a matter of fact, despatched by parcel post but are taken personally. And this is the reason why they are so bold as to abuse people and beat them, sue them in court and obtain decrees against them.

If a neighbour tries to help another, a Kabuli sues him in court and on the false evidence of another obtains a decree against him as well, and so people living in the same muhalla do not help one another. Poor half-starved people have to suffer from the effects of such decrees obtained by the Kabulis with the help of their own neighbours. There could be thousands of testimonies to bear out our statements if the files of such cases were looked up and the witnesses re-examined.

On the 8th December 1908 a Kabuli broke a Nawab's head and there are hundreds of similar cases. The Kabulis allure people into their power by advancing them money. They get pro-notes printed, put down thumb impressions on them, do not enter any sum of money on them nor the lender's name, and when they want to blackmail a man they assess his property and put down the sum and a brother Kabuli's name as the lender. Then they file a suit and (they succeed in obtaining decrees) as the Magistrates do not bestow much thought on the handwriting.

They have a code of their own which is binding on all of them, and if a Kabuli does not abide by its provisions he is ejected from the fraternity. They have divided the various muhallas of a city among themselves and do not interfere in one another's sphere of work. But if there is a debtor who does not pay them back they all go to him in a body and attack his house, doing whatever they like, the belabouring of their victims being an ordinary thing. They say that if they are brought before a court they will be fined a few rupees and that there will be an end of it.

A respectable Kabuli, who came to Lucknow for study, stated that the so-called Kabulis who practise usury are not the subjects of the Amir, but are natives of the no-man's-land between India and Afghanistan and are reponsible to their Chiefs only. They enter India without any passports through secret routes and the Afghan Government cannot be held responsible for their misdeeds. They have become fully acquainted with the condition of India and one day they may rise against the Government. The Government ought therefore to be on its guard against them. According to the agreement between the two Governments the Kabulis can trade only on cash payment and are not allowed to practise usury or the selling of their goods on credit. The Amir does not want to have these men in his own country and they have been expelled from Persia. They are fully acquainted with the civil and criminal laws of India and have translated them into Pushtu, to enable themselves to keep within the bounds of law while plying their trade.

Another Kabuli we interviewed said that the president of his confederacy had decreed that, India being a country inhabited by infidels, it was lawful for them to deceive its people. If a man give him full information about the muhallas and streets (of a town) he will receive reward, as well as any man who can prove that he committed murders in India.

Will you (the editor) please go to the house of a Kabuli in disguise and pretend to obtain a loan, and then you will see their notes and the way in which they practice forgery. If an order be sent by the Government, they would get an inkling of it and correct their pro-notes, and if a fruit-eating (corrupt) sahib be deputed to make inquiries, nothing will come out of it. A high English official should be entrusted with the task. Seldom does a day pass without fifty or sixty innocent persons being enticed to their houses and beaten black and blue. How is (the victim) to complain of this and where can he get the money to lodge a complaint? How many of their oppressive acts can be recorded?

As forgers these Kabulis are hard to beat and no one can surpass them in forging thumb impressions and signatures. Once let them come across a signature or the marks of an illiterate man and they make their similar impressions on a thousand pro-notes.

If you, Mr. Editor, have the least sympathy for the poor famine-stricken people, please publish this article and impress upon the Government that it is easy to suppress the noisy Bengalis, but if these Kabulis revolt, it would be difficult to put them down.

These Kabulis have been conspiring together for the last ten years, and if they are not dealt with promptly, they may prove very dangerous in the future."

The editor admits that some of the statements in the letter may be exaggerated, but says that it is undoubtedly true that the people can no longer put up with the tyranny of the Kabulis, and that they generally resort to beating their debtors when they cannot realize the prices of the article sold to them on credit or the money advanced to them. The rate of interest, 12½ per cent. per mensem, which they generally extort, is very oppressive, and, instead of having recourse to courts of law, they belabour their poor debtors. The officials may plead that the people do not sue them in court, but the poor cannot afford the luxury of a law suit. Their misdeeds in Bengal led the Bengal Government to expel them and the United Provinces Government will have to do the same.

35. Under the heading "The Kabuli Nuisance" the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 24th December has the following :— ADVOCATE, 24th December 1908.

Usurious Kabulis in India.

"Two letters signed by four or five residents of Hussainganj have appeared in the Hindustani, the latest in the issue of 23rd December, to which we draw the attention of the local authorities as also of the Local Government. Sufferers from the nuisance are men from the poorer middle classes who complain bitterly of the treatment received from Kabuli traders and ask for protection from the hands of the usurious Kabulis. Their complaint is that several Kabulis have settled themselves in Lucknow and other large towns, who go among the poorer classes of labourers and artizans who have no credit, and advance money at the rate of two annas a month per rupee, and also sell articles of everyday use, particularly cloth, not necessarily products of Kabuli looms. Sometimes they get promissory notes executed with thumb marks. So long as the debtor manages to pay interest there is not much trouble, but his failure is followed by dispute. The usurers combine and proceed to the debtor's house and create rows there. The disturbance is greater when the debtor accuses the Aga of having forged his signature, of making a demand for the payment of a loan which he had never contracted. The general belief is that not unoften promissory notes are produced before men who stoutly deny having ever taken a loan. An ordinary crowd composed of low class people cannot stand Kabuli blows, and the debtor manages to meet the demand or come to some terms. The writers of the long letters say that often the debtors are induced to go to a Kabuli's residence and there they are subjected to great indignities. The writers go on advancing theories as to other sorts of mischief done by Kabulis. It is said they bring spurious coins into India and act as spies for the trans-frontier people and the Government. These assertions may be exaggerations or mere figment of excited brains; but one thing is certain, that to the people Kabuli doings have become unbearable, and the poorer classes of them suffer to such an extent at the hands of these men that it is now the duty of the magistracy to protect the people. That the Kabuli usurer uses physical force when he does not get his dues is known to everybody. It may be said that sufferers can bring charges of assault on them before courts. But the class of people who are given a good thrashing on failure to pay debts generally are loth to secure the help of the magistracy. What for the present should be done is to keep an eye on these usurers and when they create a disturbance they should be chalaned under the Police Act. If they are strongly dealt with and the police is directed to keep an eye over them, the nuisance will abate, and such of the Kabulis who wish to trade and carry on the profession of money-lending will quietly settle down to business methods, and in course of time unlearn the manner in which they are acting now. Without in any way interfering with the liberty of Kabulis, the Government can surely keep under control usurers who have no stake in the country, who do not pay any tax to the exchequer of the country, while they try to carry on their profession, not with the help of the law courts, but by the use of physical force. Voiceless lower classes are in great need of protection and this should be extended to them without any further delay.

But it is not Government officers alone who can render help in this matter. The educated classes can do a great deal. Branches after branches of banks are being opened in Lucknow, but few have tried to reach the classes who had been paying exorbitant rates of interest to Rustogi Mahajans whom the Kabuli usurers are now replacing. It is a pity that no attempts have been made to float a co-operative credit society in Lucknow. Had one been started to work among artizans and had capital been found for them, perhaps there would have been no Kabuli nuisance in Lucknow. In this matter an attempt should be made both from motives of philanthropy and those of business."

GARHWALI, November 1908.

The question of the system of coolie utar at the Bareilly Darbar.

36. Referring to His Honour's speech at the Bareilly Darbar held on the 2nd November, the Garhwali (Dehra Dun), for November (received on the 18th December), says that it was instinct with a spirit of sympathy and hopefulness that clearly showed the out-spokenness and sincerity of purpose of the speaker. The editor approves of the practice of holding darbars in various centres of these provinces, inasmuch as they establish a better feeling of understanding between the rulers and the ruled and strengthen the sentiment of loyalty in the latter. He cannot however agree with His Honour in his remarks about the system of coolie utar. His opinion and inquiries about it seem to be very much defective and unsatisfactory. Hitherto officials have admitted that this system is inconvenient to the people but that they could not do without it. It is most likely that the Brahman and Rajput coolies who praised it before His Honour, could either not understand him or were too afraid of subordinate officials to speak the truth, for the harshness and abuses of the system are well known to every traveller in the hills. He enumerates the following grievances in connection with the system of coolie utar :—

(a) That payment of wages at the rate of four annas per parao is insufficient at the present time, owing to the rise in the prices of the necessaries of life.

(b) That sometimes coolies are sent for from distant villages and it takes them two or three days to come to the appointed place, but they are paid only for that day on which they actually work.

(c) That sometimes they have to wait for several days for the arrival of officials, who often tour one after the other, and the cultivators have to leave their fields and attend upon each of them successively.

(d) That arrangements for the payment of wages are unsatisfactory, and that coolies do not get their full wages.

(e) That cultivators have to supply milk, ghi, fuel, &c., and do all menial work for which they are not paid at all, but are severely beaten for even the slightest carelessness.

He suggests the following remedies in this connection :—

(i) That mules should be employed to do transport work on Kotadwar-Badrinath road.

(ii) That a cart road should be constructed up to Srinagar so that luggage and other goods be conveyed on carts.

(iii) That wages for coolies should be raised from four annas to six annas per parao, and if they are sent for from distant villages they should be paid for the time occupied in coming from and going to their homes.

(iv) That officials should not tour in October, November, May and June, when the cultivators have to attend to their fields and that there should be no frequent changes in their tour programme.

(v) That paid coolies should be employed for all officials for two or three months in the winter when they are generally on tour. Their wages should be met from the grant allotted to coolie utar, and from that fund which has accumulated from the receipt of commissions from those exempted from coolie utar. Others will be only too glad to make this payment in lieu of personal service.

(vi) That cattle and mule breeding should be encouraged by the advance of takavi loans, so that these beasts of burden may be utilized for all transport work.

(vii) That village roads should be repaired to facilitate transport.
(viii) That banias should be employed to supply all provisions which should be purchased from villagers and that the latter should on no account be required to do menial work.

37. The Almora Akhbár, of the 30th November (received on the 18th December), says that a meeting was held in Almora in 1907 and a number of measures were then suggested to redress the grievances in connection with the system of coolie utar in the hills, but it notes with regret that Sir John Hewett's remarks on the subject in his Bareilly Darbar speech go to show that they have not met with a sympathetic consideration at the hands of His Honour. The editor says that a number of Brahmans and Rajputs work as coolies of their own free will, but that they cannot be representatives of their respective communities to assure His Honour that they are glad to earn extra money by working as coolies. He remarks that the system of coolie utar is really very inconvenient and troublesome to hillmen, and suggests that agencies for the supply of coolies who are willing to do transport work should be established, or that the system which was in force forty years ago and which is still prevalent in Naini Tal and Mussoorie, should be revived in the Almora district, so as to prevent detention of coolies for unnecessarily long periods and impressment of a larger number than is actually required. As to Forest regulations, he remarks that as times have become very hard people should be allowed to graze their cattle and enjoy various other privileges in the forests.

The coolie utar system and Forest regulations in the hills.

ALMORA AKHBAR, 30th November 1908.

38. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 19th December, observes that the months of October and November are the busiest part of the year for cultivators and peasants. They should not be required, therefore, to leave their work and help the tahsil officials in providing for the comfort and convenience of the officials on tour.

The editor also suggests that civil courts should remain closed during these two months, namely October and November, for the convenience of the litigant public.

The Begar system.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 19th December 1908.

39. The Almora Akhbár, of the 30th November (received on the 21st December), suggests the desirability of Government fixing the prices of foodstuffs in the hill districts, since village traders keep up arbitrary rates without reference to the amount available. The editor further urges the necessity of foodstuffs not being exported unless they are in excess of the quantity required for local consumption.

Fixing of prices of foodstuffs in the hills.

ALMORA AKHBAR, 30th November 1908.

40. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 15th December, complains that the number of Musalman holidays is few, compared to those of the Hindus and that the number of holidays granted on account of the Íd-ul-Fitr, Íd-uz-Zuha and Muharram be increased.

Musalman holidays.

AL BASHIR, 15th December 1908.

41. The Rohilkhand Gazette (Bareilly), of the 16th December, referring to the steps that are being taken by the authorities in England to give relief to the unemployed, remarks that similar means should be employed in India to utilize the surplus labour of this country.

The unemployed in India.

ROHILKHAND GAZETTE, 16th December 1908.

42. A correspondent writing from Mirzapur to the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 18th December, urges the boycott of foreign sugar on purely religious grounds with no reference either to the political or industrial aspects of the matter.

Boycott of foreign sugar.

ABHYUDAYA, 18th December 1908.

43. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 19th December, referring to the arrests of some Musalman arms and ammunition dealers in Calcutta for infringement of the Arms Act, remarks that their conduct is due to their ignorance and an unnatural desire for gain, and it should not be inferred from this that they have any sympathy for the Bengali anarchists.

Arrest of Muhammadan arms and ammunition dealers in Calcutta.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 19th Decebmer 1908.

ADVOCATE, 20th December 1908.

Indians in Medical Service.

44. The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 20th December, has the following:—

"It is very satisfactory to learn that Lord Morley is dissatisfied with the present system of recruitment for the Medical Service, inasmuch as the competition in England prevents many Indians from entering the service. This necessitates the filling in of posts in the Civil side with Military Surgeons whose equipment, it is no secret, cannot possibly be up to the mark. In this matter Indian medical graduates have a decided advantage over the average European Civil Surgeon lent by the Military Department. And this for two cogent reasons. The courses of studies in our Medical Colleges cover practically all branches of the healing art, and the training undergone is both theoretically as well as practically sounder than what a mere Military Surgeon gets at Netley. The shorter course both in subjects and period prescribed for military students in Indian Medical Colleges in conformity with the requirements of the Military Department is but an echo of what is done in England. Coming from and living among the people Indian graduates know the habits and social customs of the people—a knowledge of which is very much needed for proper diagnosis and effective prescription of remedies—and have thus a decided advantage over their superior officers."

HINDUSTANI, 23rd December 1908.

Indians in Medical Service.

45. The Hindustani (Lucknow), of the 23rd December, reproduces a translation of the note on Indians in Medical Service that appeared in the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 20th December.

MASHRIQ, 22nd December 1908.

The manufacture of fez-caps in India.

46. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 22nd December, urges Indian Musalmans to boycott things made in Austria, especially fez-caps made in that country, and thus show their sympathy with the Sultan of Turkey. A correspondent writing in the same paper advises Indian Musalmans to establish a factory for the manufacture of these caps, either in Calcutta or in Delhi, and so enrich their own country instead of importing from foreign countries.

V.—Legislation.

MUSAFIR, 15th December 1908.

The new Anarchist Act.

47. Referring to the new Act for the speedy trial of the anarchists, the Musáfir (Agra), of the 15th December, remarks that no doubt every peace-loving Indian will give his unqualified support to any measure directed for the suppression of violence and anarchism. But, the editor says, there is one feature about the present Act which fills us with apprehensions, that is it gives too much power to an already very corrupt police, and he expresses a wish that the innocent may not suffer along with the guilty.

ABHYUDAYA, 12th December 1908.

The new Anarchist Act.

48. "There is no difference of opinion", says the Abhyudaya (Allahabad), of the 18th December, "as to the necessity of anarchical crimes being put down in the country," and, unless we suggest other means we should support the Government in the measures it takes to that end. In all legislation sufficient safeguards should be provided for the protection of innocent persons, but this is impossible in the case of hurriedly enacted legislation. It cannot be admitted that it was proper and necessary to pass the new Anarchist Bill at a single sitting. Hurried enactments are not infrequently defective, and in spite of the well-meaning and impressive speech of the Viceroy "we" hold that it would have been productive of good rather than of harm to the Government and the people alike had this Bill been passed after its criticism by the public.

Evidently, this Act is based upon the Irish Prevention of Crimes Act of 1882 and Criminal Law and Procedure Act of 1887, but its rules are more stringent in many respects and it provides fewer safeguards for the protection of innocent persons. In those two Acts a shorthand writer also recorded evidence of witnesses independently of the Magistrate, and his notes were sent up to the commission of Judges along with those of the committing Magistrate. Moreover, in Ireland, the accused were not convicted unless the Judges had been unanimous in their verdict. Government has given no reasons for deviating from these principles in the case of the Indian Act. With regard to the provisions against societies and associations, the public has been given cause for greater suspicion and dissatisfaction. It would have been much better had the amendment of Dr. Rash Behari Ghose been adopted. Now that the Bill has been passed it is no use to point out its defects, but it is to be hoped that in the carrying out of the provisions of this Act care will be taken to see that only really guilty persons are punished, and that innocent persons are protected from falling into its clutches.

The new Anarchist Act.

49. The Riyaz-ul-Akhbár (Lucknow), of the 20th December, referring to the Hon'ble Dr. Rash Behari Ghose's speech in the Viceroy's Council at the passing of the new Anarchist Act, remarks that the learned doctor may have been perfectly justifiable in the line of criticism he adopted, but in view of the extreme seriousness of the situation his objections had to be ruled out of order. The editor admires the patience and coolness displayed by the Viceroy at this critical moment.

RIYAZ-UL-AKHBAR, 20th December 1908.

The new Anarchist Act.

50. The editor of the Oudh Akhbár (Lucknow), writing in the issue of the 22nd December, approves of the new Anarchist Act and remarks that the motive underlying it is really a desire to maintain peace and order in the country. No reasonable objection can be taken to its being passed at a single sitting, nor can it be said that it gives too much power to the police, for surely the authorities will exercise all possible discretion in deciding whether a man is really guilty or not.

OUDH AKHBAR, 22nd December 1908.

The editor further says that, if his countrymen behaved as good citizens in future, there was a fair chance of the present Act being withdrawn.

VI.—Railway.

Railway collisions.

51. In view of the frequency of railway collisions the Jain Gazette (Deoband), of the 8th and 16th December, suggests the desirability of tracks being doubled on all railways.

JAIN GAZETTE, 8th and 16th December 1908.

Railway collisions.

52. The Riyaz-i-Faiz (Pilibhit), of the 20th December, referring to the frequent occurrence of accidents on Indian passengers remarks that the sooner the railway tracks are doubled the better, and that if necessary railway fares should be raised for this purpose. The editor says that authorities at junction stations should be particularly careful that trains should be made to run to time, and that the time when two trains cross each other should be specified.

RIYAZ-I-FAIZ, 20th December 1908.

Arrogant behaviour of railway employes.

53. The Nasim-i-Agra, of the 23rd December, referring to the arrogant and provoking behaviour of subordinate railway officials towards passengers, advises the railway authorities to make them understand that they are appointed to minister to the wants of passengers and not to bully them.

NASIM-I-AGRA, 23rd December 1908.

VII.—Post Office.

Money-order forms.

54. Al Bashir (Etawah), of the 15th December, complains that in many post offices it is very difficult to obtain money order forms in Urdu, which causes considerable trouble to people who know only Urdu.

AL BASHIR, 15th December 1908.

The new value-payable system.

55. The Naiyar-i-Azam (Moradabad), of the 19th December, referring to the embezzlement of a large sum of money realized from value-payable parcels by a postal peon in Calcutta, remarks that all this is due to the defective working of the new system, as under the old system such a thing could never have occurred without being detected by the postal officials.

NAIYAR-I-AZAM, 19th December 1908.

The new Telegraph rates.

56. Referring to the two classes of telegrams, express and ordinary, that come in force from the beginning of the next year in place of the existing three, the Advocate (Lucknow), of the 24th December makes the following observations :—

ADVOCATE, 24th December 1908.

"We confess the new order of things is no great improvement, except in the matter of reducing the charge for each additional word in the lowest class, from one to one-half anna. The rise from four to six annas as the minimum cost will, it is feared, interfere with the popularity of this class of message; it will, at the least, make for marked development. The reduction of the unit number of words from sixteen to twelve and the retention of the old charge of two annas per additional word in the other class mark but a retrograde step. The changes introduced are least likely to help in popularizing the Telegraph department."

GARHWALI, November 1908.

Traffic in girls in Garhwal.

57. A correspondent in the Garhwali (Dehra Dun), for November, (received on the 21st December) complains of the ever-increasing evil of selling girls to strangers in Garhwal, and expresses the opinion that if the district authorities take no steps to put a stop to this practice, it will have a serious effect on the people of that district.

SAHIFA, 19th December 1908.

Wakfs* and their mismanagement.

58. The Sahifa (Bijnor), of the 12th December, referring to the gross mismanagement of Musalman wakfs, asks his co-religionists to form influential committees in different centres to supervise them and to prevent the trustees from misusing their authority. In support of this statement the editor says that the trustees of the Akbari Mosque in Ajmer have turned a part of it into a godown, that in Ahmedabad, Gujrat, the Pirzada managing the mosque has rented it to an Englishman, while in Ahmednagar a mosque is being used as a library of English and vernacular books.

MASHRIK, 22nd December 1908.

Prohibition of cow-killing in the Family Domains of the Maharaja of Benares.

59. The Mashriq (Gorakhpur), of the 22nd December, reports having received a long letter from the Musalmans of Khamaria, district Mirzapur in the Family Domains of the Maharaja of Benares, complaining that they were last year prevented from slaughtering cows by the Hindus. This year they applied to the Collector of the district for permission, and were allowed to slaughter cows in their houses.

But the Commissioner, who is the Superintendent of the Family Domains, has forbidden it altogether. The Musalmans have appealed to the Government.

The editor asks the Maharaja to remove the grievances of his Musalman tenants, as the sacrifice of cows is a religious ordinance.
